THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FORTY-NINTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

THIRTY-FOURTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 77

ELEVENTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1984-85

House of Commons

Monday 15 April 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Airports Inquiries

1. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning the report of the inspector on the airports inquiries 1981-83; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I wish, first, to convey the apologies to the House of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for his absence on export business in India.

The reply to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) is that between 10 December 1984, when the inspector's report was published, and 1 April 1985, my right hon. Friend received 1,164 written representations on this subject.

Mr. Cartwright: Does the Minister accept that airports policy has a major impact on wider issues of economic development? Will he therefore try to ensure that when the Secretary of State is making his decision, full account is taken of the need to encourage economic investment in parts of Britain other than south-east England?

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friend will take into account all the evidence that was put to, and the recommendations of, the inspector in respect of the regional dimension which the hon. Gentleman mentions.

Mr. Soames: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the main consideration that will be given when arriving at a conclusion will be that of the national interest?

Mr. Spicer: Certainly, Sir.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Will the Minister convey to his right hon. Friend the message that export business is no valid excuse for failing to be at the service of the House?

Mr. Spicer: I shall convey the right hon. Gentleman's view to my right hon. Friend. I must, however, remind hon. Members that India imports about £800 million worth of goods from this country and that it is the duty of a Minister of the Crown to assist that business.

Mr. McCrindle: Luton airport was outside the terms of reference of the inspector's inquiry, but will my hon. Friend confirm, nevertheless, that it will be in order for those who wish to see the expansion of that airport, perhaps rather than the contemplated expansion of Stansted, to make representations accordingly, and have any been so made?

Mr. Spicer: Luton is an integral part of the London airport system and was mentioned in the inspector's report. Any development there would be subject to the appropriate planning procedures.

Mr. Haselhurst: Will my right hon. Friend's decisions on the applications that are at the heart of the inspector's report be subject to the approval of the House?

Mr. Spicer: No, Sir. The Secretary of State has already said that there will be a debate on airports matters, including the matters to which my hon. Friend refers, subsequent to the announcement of the decision by him and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What proposals does the Minister have for the further development and expansion of Carlisle airport?

Mr. Spicer: Carlisle airport is a good airport, which the hon. Gentleman espouses rigorously and vigorously, and which I visited recently. It has certain problems, notably to do with Customs and Excise, into which we are currently looking.

Mr. Adley: Did my hon. Friend say that the House would not be further consulted by his Department about the development of Stansted? If so, is he aware that some of us will take no notice of that but will regard it as nothing less than our duty, in the national interest, to do what we believe to be right, when his Department has made up its mind, on an issue that affects the whole nation?

Mr. Spicer: The statutory planning procedure now requires the two Departments, of the Secretaries of State for Transport and of the Environment, to produce their decisions to the House.

Bus Services

2. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from Scotland in the last three months concerning the likely effects of the new policy on bus transport; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): I have received representations from several organisations and members of the public in Scotland.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Minister not understand that there is virtually unanimous opposition in Scotland to the terms of the Bill, not least among the old and the disabled, whose interests will be jeopardised severely by the privatisation of bus services? Does the Minister understand also that the Government have no mandate for the Bill and that there is opposition not only in rural areas in Scotland but elsewhere throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Mitchell: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman is correct in referring to widespread opposition to our proposals. That opposition is based largely upon misinformation, much of which has been distributed widely by the hon. Gentleman's parliamentary colleagues.

Mr. Viggers: Is my hon. Friend aware that the manager of the Gosport depot of the National Bus Company, Mr. McQuade——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question relates to Scotland.

Mr. Viggers: Mr. McQuade came from Scotland, Mr. Speaker. Is my hon. Friend aware that Mr. McQuade has made representations about guarantees for the ex-employee pensioners of the NBC after privatisation? Is he yet in a position to make a statement on this issue?

Mr. Mitchell: Like Mr. McQuade's family, my own and many others spread from Scotland south of the border. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to pensions, which is an area of some unease. The company will have to make proposals to the Government. We accept fully that the position of the staff has to be protected.

Mr. Flannery: Does the Minister realise that transport was municipalised in Scotland and in the rest of the United Kingdom after private ownership many years ago, which utterly failed the people? That is why it was municipalised and, ultimately, nationalised. That was done in the interests of the people.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman portrays the Labour party's ongoing approach, which is to look back instead of looking to the future. It is not prepared to face the challenges of the present and to recognise that past systems have failed and that the industry has been in a state of chronic decline. That decline is well demonstrated in Scotland by the fact that in the past 12 years no less than 43 per cent. of jobs in the Scottish NBC have been cut. If the hon. Gentleman wants to continue to defend a system which is declining as rapidly as that, he will not find much support.

Bus Safety

3. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received concerning the safety of the public on transport following deregulation of buses.

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): Since the publication of the Transport Bill at the end of January we have received about 800 letters and a number of petitions about various aspects of the policy, including the implications for safety.

Mr. Parry: Is the Minister aware of the great concern of the general public and of workers in the industry over the great dangers that will result from poor maintenance following the privatisation of the buses? Do the Government intend to employ more staff to keep tabs on cowboy operators, who will flourish when the Bill is enacted?

Mrs. Chalker: There is always concern about safety standards. It is because of that concern that, quite apart from the Bill, we have been reviewing numbers and priorities for both vehicle and traffic examiners. I shall be having meetings about the issue later this week. The Government are already committed to making additional resources available for vehicle and traffic examination. Following deregulation, the quality of long-distance services has improved immeasurably. There is no reason why services cannot improve, irrespective of the operator, provided that they are supervised properly, and that will be done.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that the safety standards of many municipal and public services leave much to be desired and that the steps that are being taken by herself and her ministerial colleagues will ensure that the safety standards of private operators in future will be an improvement on those which now exist in the public sector?

Mrs. Chalker: The comments of the chairman of the West Midlands traffic commissioners and others, which take into account the experience of private operators as against public and passenger transport executive operators, suggest that the private operator is generally no worse and no better than other operators. There is variability. In 1983, pass rates for private operators were about the same as the average pass rate but well above the rates of the PTEs and, at that time, of London Transport. I have no doubt that proper vehicle examinations annually and spot checks will ensure that safety can be as good as at present, if not better, and we shall ensure that it is improved.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister agree that the present regulations will not be able to cope adequately with both the large number of companies and the small companies? Does she agree that if the regulations are inadequate the spot checks will be completely useless, no matter how many more people are put into the inspectorate?

Mrs. Chalker I am aware of some concern about the regulations. I would review those regulations regularly in any case. Clause 31 of the Transport Bill, which is being considered in Standing Committee A, provides for the extension of the public service vehicles prohibition powers to those vehicles which are not for hire or reward. There are nearly 10,000 such vehicles. We are already doing what the hon. Gentleman asks.

Mr. Evans: Surely the Minister must acknowledge that there is growing concern about the fact that the deregulation of buses will result in a vast reduction in expensive maintenance services, especially in inner-city areas, and will be liable to cause breakdowns and accidents in busy city streets.

Mrs. Chalker: Just because the hon. Gentleman keeps on repeating his concern and keeps on whipping up concern among people who do not know the facts, he cannot expect—any more than I do—dead silence on the issue from the press. There is a need for improvements in maintenance standards, but that need is in no way restricted to private operators. We are in the business to ensure that the maintenance standards of all operators are improved.

Mr. Adley: Why are the safety requirements on carriage for hire and reward that are laid by the House on British Rail so much more stringent than those laid on coach operators?

Mrs. Chalker: In the past, more people—sadly, not as many today—chose to travel by British Rail, and I am sure that that aspect was considered in framing the original legislation. I have made it clear to the House this afternoon that the safety standards imposed on buses should not be lower than those imposed on British Rail. That is exactly what we are working for.

Mr. Snape: Did the Minister see the party political broadcast last week on behalf of the Conservative party? Does she agree that the bus shown in that broadcast does not operate in Hereford, despite the commentary? Is it a fact that one of the two passengers concerned is an active member of the Conservative party? Is it true that the other passenger admitted afterwards that she had never used a bus? Is it not disgraceful that the Conservative party should seek to mislead the country in this way? Bearing in mind this type of appalling conduct, how on earth is the House supposed to accept the hon. Lady's views on future safety standards?

Mrs. Chalker: I have sufficient confidence in my party not to have to be persuaded by party political broadcasts on its behalf. I did not watch the broadcast, but I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman did so. Conservatives and members of every other party, including many hon. Members, regularly travel by bus. There are others who do not travel by bus regularly, but do so at times. I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman analysed the antecedents of some of the actors in Labour party political broadcasts he would find them wanting. The hon. Gentleman knows well enough from past debates and discussions that what I have said about safety is absolutely correct. We are not prepared to have safety standards that do not meet the regulations. We shall increase the staff by the number necessary when we know how many private operators will come forward. Their buses will need to be checked on an annual and spot-check basis.

M25 Motorway

4. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the date of the completion of construction and opening of the last link of the M25 London orbital motorway.

Mrs. Chalker: The last contract, for the length from the A405 to the A6, is due for completion in November 1986.

Mr. Chapman: If there is no slippage in the timetable for the completion of London's orbital motorway, my hon. Friend will know that fate, if not, her Department has decreed that the last link to be completed will be near to my constituency and deeply affect my constituents. In view of the undoubted and exceptional congestion that will take place on the roads in that area during that period, may I have my hon. Friend's assurance that there will be personal monitoring at ministerial level of the congestion of those roads so that exceptional and temporary traffic management schemes can be introduced if necessary?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend may not be aware that last month I did a tour with the Hertfordshire police of the A405, the M25, the A1, the A1(M) and the new section that is being built. I have discussed traffic control and traffic signing with the police and my traffic engineers. I can assure my hon. Friend that we will check the matter regularly and, in particular, when the junction 8 works on the M1 have to take place for up to a fortnight at the beginning of July. I shall keep in touch with my hon. Friend and with the travelling public through the media about those works.

Mr. Tony Banks: As the Minister's Department will be able to "trunk" roads in London without a public inquiry, will the hon. Lady tell the House what motorway-style improvements are planned for London? Will she tell us something about the future of the west cross route?

Mrs. Chalker: First, let me make it clear for the umpteenth time that there are no proposals for motorway building in London. Secondly, the assessment studies currently being carried out, which include the possibility of a west cross route along the line of the railway, are not complete. Thorough consultations have been carried out and comments are still being received by the consultants. When I can make a statement about that, I shall do so. For the present, the hon. Gentleman knows, as well as I do, that there is a finite date by which the ownership of a limited 65 miles of road will be transferred. It means no more "trunking" than the transfer of ownership to my Department.

Mr. Higgins: Is my hon. Friend aware that, before its completion, the M25 has become a dangerous race track, in particular during the rush hour? What consultations has she had with the Home Secretary about the necessity for adequate policing of that motorway? Are the present resources being used less than those advocated by the chief constables involved?

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend is right about the standard of driving on some sections not just of the M25 but of other roads. Unfortunately, because people tend to use the M25 for short runs only, they do not adjust to motorway driving as quickly as they should. I have already had meetings with the chief constables of the home counties and with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office about adequate policing. I am in correspondence with them to ensure that there is adequate enforcement on the motorway.

Heathrow (Fifth Terminal)

5. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the extent of his responsibilities in relation to the decision on the application for the construction of a fifth terminal at Heathrow.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend has responsibility for overall policy on the future of Heathrow, but it is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment who will take the decision on the existing application from Uttlesford district council.

Mr. Jessel: Will the Government attach great weight to the strong feelings of large numbers of people around Heathrow, not just about aircraft noise, but about the huge traffic jams, to which the inquiry inspector had no satisfactory answer?

Mrs. Chalker: The feelings of the local people and the travelling public will be given proper weight in our considerations. The inspector made a number of recommendations for improvements to the roads in the vicinity of Heathrow. He also recommended that a working party be set up to study the improvements required to provide a satisfactory highway network to serve the airport, regardless of whether a fifth terminal is constructed. I assure my hon. Friend that those recommendations will be carefully considered.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend accept that for many years the people of Ealing and west London have suffered unbearable aircraft noise and pollution as well as the traffic congestion to which my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) referred, and that a fifth terminal would make life intolerable and must be resisted at all costs?

Mrs. Chalker: I cannot comment, as I think my hon. Friend knows. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction will make their decision as soon as they can.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister accept that the development of a fifth terminal will act as a positive incentive for regional airline operators such as Ecosse Air, which now flies from Carlisle to London? Because of the success of the airline on that route, will the Minister put it to Ecosse Air that the people of Cumbria need a jet link from Carlisle to London? Will the Minister support that principle?

Mrs. Chalker: I have noted very carefully what the hon. Gentleman said, but, as I said earlier, I am afraid that in the light of the decision to be taken on the Eyre inquiry I cannot comment further.

Mr. Tim Smith: What representations have been received by the Department of Transport from those living in the area around Heathrow? Is my hon. Friend aware of the deep concern about the environmental impact of a fifth terminal on an area of the green belt which is already under severe pressure?

Mrs. Chalker: Just as the inspector at the inquiry was well aware, so also are we well aware of those representations. However, I cannot comment further. All the representations will be borne in mind.

Bus Services

6. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further representations he has received regarding the Transport Bill.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since the publication of the Transport Bill at the end of January we have received around 800 letters and a number of petitions about various aspects of the policy.

Mr. Pike: If the Minister will not consider the widespread opposition to the Bill and drop it, will he at least give an assurance that no person who enjoys concessionary fares at present will be detrimentally affected by the passage of the Bill? Will he also assure the House that those employed in the industry will not find that their pay and conditions are worsened when the Bill becomes law?

Mr. Mitchell: Concessionary fares are a matter for local decision by locally elected people. The hon. Gentleman is already aware that it is not for the Government to dictate what pattern they choose to follow.

Mr. Lawrence: Is my hon. Friend aware that those who enjoy the meanest and most unsatisfactory of bus services are easy fodder for the distortions of the Oppostion, in particular since Labour councils have promised that when the Bill becomes an Act no financial support will be given by county councils to existing bus services? Is it not time for a more determined effort to be made to present the virtues of the bus policy nationwide so that people may be satisfied that their services, particularly in rural areas, are likely to be improved, not destroyed?

Mr. Mitchell: Ministers are undertaking a series of visits to explain the Government's policy and proposals in order to combat the widespread distrotion to which my hon. and learned Friend has referred. So widespread and so extensive is it in some parts of the country that local authorities have been spending not hundreds, not thousands, but in some cases over £100,000 of ratepayers' money on campaigns to distort and discredit the Government's proposals.

Mr. Madden: Is the Minister not aware that Conservative Members of Parliament have been telling those who are very concerned about losing their concessionary fares that they have nothing to worry about? The Minister seems to be peddling a new line from the Dispatch Box. Will he give a clear assurance that if the Transport Bill is enacted all bus operators will be required to preserve concessionary schemes in those areas which now operate them and that they will be no worse that existing schemes?

Mr. Mitchell: Two separate matters arise from this question: first, the scale of the concession; and, secondly, the operators through whom it is available. The Bill provides that concessions through operators will have to be available to all operators and not, as at present, be reserved to the municipal operator or to the other favoured son of the rating authority. As for the level of concessionary fares, I repeat the point that I made earlier: it is for the local authority to decide what it believes to be right in the light of its own local circumstances.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My hon. Friend has already said a little about the pension rights of the various bus operators' employees, but is he aware that there is great concern about pensions and that it must be a matter of principle for pension rights to be fully protected after the Bill is passed? Will he therefore say a little more about this matter?

Mr. Mitchell: It may be helpful if I say that I understand that the matter will be debated fully in the Committee examining the Bill. I am sure that all the more detailed points in which my hon. Friend is interested will be brought out then. It is for the National Bus Company to make the proposals which it believes to be appropriate in relation to its staff and their pensions. We fully accept that the position of the staff has to be protected.

Mr. Freud: As the Adam Smith Institute would appear to be the only organisation supporting the Transport Bill, will the Minister have another look at the 800 representations that he has had and heed the voices of more moderate groups such as the Women's Institute?

Mr. Mitchell: A number of groups, particularly those representing the consumer, have expressed support in principle for the Government's proposals. Moreover, the hon. Gentleman should be aware that there has been widespread misunderstanding and distortion as to what the Government's proposals actually envisage.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the Minister explain to the general public that, far from writing in safeguards either for those who work in the industry or for consumers who at present have concessionary fares, he is removing the few safeguards that exist? Why did he agree to remove from the Bill, more than two thirds of the way through the Committee stage, a safeguard which would have enabled the public to make representations to the traffic commissioners about the quality of the operators? Is that what the hon. Gentleman calls offering safeguards? Is he not just, as always in the Bill, seeking to perpetrate an enormous confidence trick on the public?

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Lady knows perfectly well that what she is suggesting is not true. The position is that we removed, under pressure from my hon. Friends, a clause in the Bill which was otiose, unnecessary and repetitive, and the right of being heard by the traffic commissioners that remains.

Channel Link

8. Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to be in a position to invite applications to build a fixed Channel link.

Mrs. Chalker: Guidance was issued to promoters on 2 April following a statement in the House.

Mr. King: Many colleagues on both sides of the House will welcome the statement that at long last, after nearly 200 years of discussion, something concrete will happen with regard to the Channel link. Will my hon. Friend give the House an indication as to how many people will be employed, not just pouring concrete, but in the steelworks?

Mrs. Chalker: I thank my hon. Friend for what he has said. However, it will depend on the project—if there is a project—as to how much employment the building and operation of the link, if it is to go ahead, will provide. The structure will also affect where the employment will be. However, steel, shipbuilding yards, traffic control, signal makers, for both road and rail routes, the construction industry, the heavy goods equipment industry—all such industries—could benefit if the decision is made to go ahead.

Mr. Anderson: What special efforts will the Department make to ensure that we get our fair share of the contracts involved?

Mrs. Chalker: I presume that the hon. Gentleman is referring not to the United Kingdom generally but to Wales in particular. Obviously, we are bound, if the project is going ahead, by the rules within Europe, but we shall do all that we can to make sure that the British tenders, if they are called for, are——

Mrs. Dunwoody: If they are called for?

Mrs. Chalker: If the project is to go ahead. Such a decision has not been taken, as the House is well aware. We shall do our best to ensure that all the British tenders are among the best tenders. That will ensure that the jobs will come to Britain if the project is to go ahead.

Mr. Skeet: Is my hon. Friend aware that between the French and British systems there is an entirely different trend in planning procedures, and that on the British side there will be no planning inquiry? Does my hon. Friend not regard that as a defect in the arrangements, and how will the ordinary people in the street be able to express their view if it is to be only by private Bill procedure?

Mrs. Chalker: The Bill procedure in the House, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said when he made his statement on 2 April, would be by a Government Bill, which would be a hybrid Bill. That would cover the planning procedures necessary. However, we are giving full consideration to the most appropriate form of consultation if and when proposals satisfying all the requirements in the guidelines have been received from the promoters.

St. Pancras to Sheffield Line

9. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has recently held discussions with the chairman of the British Railways Board regarding the further electrification of the St. Pancras to Sheffield line.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, Sir.

Mr. Flannery: Is the Minister aware that the deep, abiding, and growing concern about the future of this vital line has resulted in the past year alone in three conferences of all the councils along the line? Rather than accentuating people's fears by stating that the line is not in danger, when everyone knows that it is, will the Minister now allay those fears by stating that it is intended to carry out the planned electrification of the line beyond Bedford and gradually further up over the years?

Mr. Mitchell: If there is deep concern, it is because the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends have been peddling it. There is no cause whatever for such concern. British Rail has shown its faith in the line by introducing high speed trains on it only two years ago, resulting in a 20 minutes faster run to London and an increase in the number of passengers of between 15 and 20 per cent. Against that background, the hon. Gentleman should know that it is inconceivable that the ideas that he has been peddling should ever come to fruition.

Mr. Parris: Is my hon. Friend aware that Derbyshire county council, no doubt with local elections in mind, is planning yet another conference on electrification of the railway? Will he let the council know that there are cheaper ways of communicating with British Rail and with the Department?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right to point out that the future of the line, the way in which it is managed and operated and any investment proposed for it are entirely matters for British Rail. He is thus also right to suggest that if people are worried or concerned about the line they should address themselves to British Rail, which will provide the same reassurance as I have given today.

Air Traffic (Holland-United Kingdom)

10. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the effect of the more liberal air services agreement with the Dutch Government on traffic between Holland and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Excellent. In the first eight months, London-Amsterdam traffic was 16 per cent. higher than it was a year before, compared with an average growth in air traffic of 9 per cent. between London and Europe as a whole. Six more services have begun between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands and a further 10 are proposed.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer, which fully illustrates the beneficial effects of deregulation and competition. Having already achieved the same deal with Luxembourg, will he now try to negotiate similar arrangements with other countries, such as France and Italy? May we look forward to further progress in that respect?

Mr. Spicer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning the Luxembourg agreement, which we hope will be a model for future agreements with other countries. We are especially pleased with the arrangements whereby the airlines can set their own tariffs, subject only to the very rare cases in which both Governments disagree with them. In the case of Luxembourg, the lowest return fare has already fallen from £98 to £73.

Mrs. Dunwoody: If the Minister is really such a great believer in free enterprise, why has British Airways been offered a subsidy of £7 million to run a doubly expensive air service to the Falkland Islands? I should have thought that if the Royal Air Force could run services more cheaply than British Airways——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a little wide of the question—unless the Dutch aircraft go there, too.

Bus Services

12. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from Newport borough council and Gwent county council on the deregulation of bus services.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received representations from Gwent county council and Newport borough council opposing various aspects of the proposals in the White Paper.

Mr. Hughes: Is the Minister aware that the inadequate protection of pension benefits is a serious bone of contention? Does he agree that the Bill fails to provide the "no-worsening of protection" which employees and pensioners of local authority undertakings and the National Bus Company are entitled to expect?

Mr. Mitchell: I have already answered two similar questions. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's difficulty, but I can give him the assurance that we have fully in mind the pension needs to which he refers.

Bedford Midland to Leicester (Electrification)

14. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any proposals from British Rail for the electrification of the route from Bedford Midland to Leicester or for works to facilitate such electrification; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have received no such proposals from British Rail.

Mr. Bruinvels: Nevertheless, is my hon. Friend aware that a conference was held on 15 March at Leicestershire county hall to consider the future of electrification? Bearing in mind that there is already electrification as far as Bedford, will my hon. Friend talk to British Rail about the matter? The minutes of the conference show support for further electrification. The line is already electrified between London and Bedford, and there has been a doubling of the service.

Mr. Mitchell: British Rail is involved in the electrification of the east coast main line, the Cambridgeshire service, the Tonbridge-Hastings service and the East Anglia service. I understand that BR is considering a proposal for the electrification of the Bedford-Kettering section, with a possible link with Corby, but I have not yet received a formal proposal on the matter.

Mr. Snape: Will not the Minister accept that it was only pressure from Sheffield city council, Members of Parliament and others that persuaded BR to run high-speed trains in the first place? British Rail opposed the proposal for a considerable time. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House believe that the Midland main line is treated as the poor relation among BR's main line services and that if it is left to the BR management to make such proposals the citizens of Sheffield and other stations on the line will wait for a long time for an electrified service.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman says that the Midland line is a poor relation, but in view of the substantial investment, the introduction of modern rolling stock and HSTs and all the other ways in which BR has improved the service, I believe that many other parts of the country would be glad to be treated in a similar way.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Coal Industry Dispute

20. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Attorney-General if he will update the figures given to the hon. Member for Leicester, East on 18 March, Official Report, column 629, regarding cases heard by the courts and cases outstanding in connection with the recent coal mining dispute to the latest available date.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): My reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) on 18 March was based upon statistics compiled by the national reporting centre, which has now closed down. I am therefore unable to say exactly how many cases outstanding at the conclusion of the dispute have yet to be heard. The available figures, although not covering all courts, show that a very substantial number of cases have been dealt with, and I would like to congratulate the magistrates and the court officials on the magnificent way in which they have dealt with this extra burden.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer and join him in congratulating the magistrates who have handled that shocking catalogue of outstanding cases. May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to find out how many cases are still awaiting charge and trial? Victimisation is now occurring again at pits between working miners who never went on strike and miners who returned to work, and there is a need for a deterrent in future.

The Attorney-General: Where cases of harassment have occurred since the end of the strike, police inquiries are under way. In the case of Mrs. Watson, the Director of Public Prosecutions has advised that certain charges be preferred. If there is any continuing harassment, I do not want those who perpetrate it to feel that they will escape justice.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The latest available figures—those made available before the closure of the national reporting centre — show that out of 9,808 persons arrested only 7,917 have been charged to date, and that of those 1,335 have so far been acquitted. At least 1,000 cases remain to be heard. The overwhelming majority of the cases involve trivial charges against previously law-abiding persons. That being so, I urge the Attorney-General to think again about the answer that he gave me on the last occasion when the matter was raised at Question Time, and to make a general statement, which could provide guidance for those pursuing such prosecutions, at considerable expense to the taxpayer, and to the detriment of respect for the law in mining constituencies. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman issue a general statement telling those people to ease off?

The Attorney-General: The grant of an amnesty is not within my powers, as in most cases the chief constable is responsible. Even if it were within my powers, it would be highly inappropriate, and not conducive to the preservation of the peace during industrial disputes, for me to give such guidance. It would also be unfair to those already convicted. There must be a number of borderline cases. One saw that recently in Nottingham, when a number of cases were dropped.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Geoffrey Dickens.

Mr. Dickens: Might I ask my right hon. and learned Friend—did you say "Jester", Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, Mr. Geoffrey Dickens.

Mr. Dickens: I should like to ask my right hon. and learned Friend, without jesting, whether he agrees that incidents during the miners' strike rather tarnished the good name of the country? That being so, is it not important that justice is seen to be done and to be dispatched quickly? Was that not the very reason why our Prime Minister thought it necessary to assure our friends in the middle east that we had come to grips with this problem?

The Attorney-General: I also misheard you, Mr. Speaker, when you called my hon. Friend. I shall not discuss anything that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said abroad. There is no doubt that what happened during the picketing and the harassment during the strike did nothing for the good name of Britain. However, many people have been prosecuted — the conviction rate overall is about 75 per cent.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I simply say to the hon. Member that if I did say that, it was a term of endearment.

Administration of Justice

22. Mr. Spearing asked the Attorney-General if he is satisfied with the speed of the administration of justice in relation to civil cases; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Although I am satisfied that cases are heard as quickly as possible given the resources at present available and the existing procedural rules, the Lord Chancellor, with the full co-operation of the judges, is always seeking ways in which to improve procedure and administration and has recently set up the major inquiry known as the civil justice review. The speed with which a case comes to trial depends to a very substantial extent on the efforts made by the parties.

Mr. Spearing: I thank the Attorney-General for that answer and information. Is he aware that the legal procedures relating to the original collapse of Ronan Point in 1968 are still moving through the courts and have some way to run? Might the review that he has mentioned be of assistance in this matter, and does its ambit extend to the Official Referee, with whom I understand the case now stands?

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for telling me what he would follow his original question with, as I have been able to do a careful inquiry to give the detailed reply which I think he should have. In this case, as in all civil proceedings, the responsibility for carrying the action forward rests with the parties. Although the writ was issued in 1970, the case was not ready for trial for many years and, as late as November 1978, the defendants obtained leave to amend their defence. The trial took place on 25 February 1980—10 years after the writ. The judgment was appealed against, unsuccessfully, on 9 July 1981. The question of quantum was referred to an official referee. A preliminary issue raised by the defendant was dealt with by the official referee, but, here again, the decision was appealed against. Bundles of documents for the appeal were not approved until March this year. It is plain that the complexity and importance of the issues and the amount of documentation have made preparation a lengthy task. One explanation might be that an affidavit lodged by the defendants refers to the disclosure of more than 100,000 documents.

All of those matters are within the control of the parties, but procedure generally will be part of the civil justice review, and I hope that such matters will be looked into. There is a remedy for the plaintiff. No plaintiff needed to let this take 10 years to get to trial. He has certain remedies which could force the case on much earlier.

Mr. Viggers: Following the original question, might I put it to my right hon. and learned Friend that there is a delay of about two years in settling a date for trial for commercial cases in the commercial court? Bearing in mind the significance to our international trade of the availability of British justice, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider devoting more resources to this area of activity so that the trial process can be speeded up?

The Attorney-General: In a sense, the problem is rather ironic as it is a testament to the court's popularity that many contracts, parties to which—*[Interruption.]*It will be seen that that is right. Many entirely overseas contracts, neither party to which has any connection with Britain, have written into them a provision that any dispute is to be settled in accordance with English law. That is a great tribute to our commercial court, but it has led to an enormous increase in the court's work. The Lord Chancellor is well aware of this, and he and the commercial court committee are considering the question of delay with a view to reducing it.

Uninsured Defendants

23. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Attorney-General why it is intended by the proposed amendments to the Supreme Court rules submitted to the Supreme Court rule committee by the Lord Chancellor's Department to exclude from the operation of section 6 of the Administration of Justice Act 1982 plaintiffs taking action against uninsured defendants other than public authorities.

The Attorney-General: This restriction follows the recommendation in paragraph 240 of the report of the Law Commission, No. 56, which led to the enactment of section 6. A similar restriction applies in Scotland. The matter is now one for the Supreme Court rule committee, which is now considering it.

Mr. Brown: Surely the issue is that some defendants may be able to pay compensation even though they are not insured. There does not seem to be any good reason for securing the position of such people, because if it is secured they are better off than they would have been had they followed the law and got themselves insured.

The Attorney-General: The rule committee is looking at that and all the other attendant problems which follow —for example, who is to be exempted, should it be just those recommended by the Law Commission, or should we widen the scope? The probable thinking behind the Law Commission's recommendation is that there must be some finality, particularly for the uninsured defendant who has the possibility of an enormous claim hanging over him for perhaps the rest of his life. That is one of the matters which obviously caused the Law Commission to make that recommendation.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Food Aid

24. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the amount of food and aid currently being distributed in Eritrea and Tigre; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): Although food and other relief supplies are arriving in Ethiopia in large quantities, I believe that there is a serious shortfall in Eritrea and Tigre. The United Nations co-ordinator is discussing this with the Ethiopian authorities. At the United Nations conference in Geneva last month the Ethiopian Foreign Minister gave a solemn pledge that relief supplies would be distributed to all those in need, without diversion, delay or discrimination. Together with other donors, we are working to ensure that that pledge is honoured.

Mr. Parry: I thank the Minister for that reply, and I am glad to hear that the Government intend to maintain pressure on the Ethiopian Government. Is the Royal Air Force still dropping supplies in Eritrea and Tigre?

Mr. Raison: The RAF is still carrying out its food aid operation, and we shall carefully consider its continuation.

Mr. Prentice: May I ask about the impact of this programme on the rest of the aid programme? While we appreciate that my right hon. Friend has a contingency fund for emergencies, does not the size and scale of this year's disaster in east Africa and the length of time it is likely to last make a case for an upward revision of the entire programme? Is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be much support from some Conservative Members if that could be arranged?

Mr. Raison: I understand my right hon. Friend's point, but I have already announced at the Geneva conference a provisional figure for the quantity of emergency relief which we expect to provide as a minimum, and we can contain that figure within our aid budget.

Mr. Alton: Does not the present crisis and what the right hon. Gentleman said about the United Nations demonstrate the need for an overall strategic policy for the distribution of food? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there is now a need to turn loans into grants in respect of the 30 poorest countries, and does he further agree that there is a need to diversify in the nine African countries which rely on just one crop for 70 per cent. of their income?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman has asked a diversity of questions. This country and quite a number of other major donors already turn loans into grants, and quite right too. As to overall strategy, we are thinking very carefully about the totality of our policy in Africa, where many of the greatest problems clearly lie.

Ethiopia

25. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the famine in Ethiopia.

30. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the famine in Ethiopia and future United Kingdom Government plans for aid and assistance.

Mr. Raison: Several million Ethiopians remain at risk. Relief supplies are reaching many of those in need but distribution and other problems persist. Pledges of food aid to Ethiopia for 1985 total more than 1 million tonnes. We shall continue to provide emergency and food relief, both directly and through the European Community.

Mr. Jessel: What part in total has Britain played in bringing about any improvement, how great is the remaining need, and what more can we do?

Mr. Raison: In recent months we have made a significant contribution to Ethiopia amounting to some £34 million. We have provided food aid, the RAF Hercules detachments, trucks, other transport and other supplies. We have also met our share of the substantial European Community contribution. The needs remain considerable, and we intend to play our part for the remainder of this year.

Mr. Chapman: Is it not obvious that the problem in Ethiopia is not one of insufficient food—because there are ample supplies, at least until the end of this year—but of distribution? In commending both public and private contributions from the United Kingdom to that unfortunate country, is it not a matter for condemnation of the Ethiopian authorities that they cannot distribute the food? In many cases they have inhibited other countries which have offered to distribute that food to the people who need it.

Mr. Raison: My hon. Friend is broadly right. The overall quantities pledged to Ethiopia look as though they should be enough for this year, but there are serious problems about internal distribution. In our view the Ethiopian Government need to fulfil their promise of nearly 4,000 vehicles for relief and rescue operations on food movements. We also believe that too great a share of their resources are at present going on resettlement.

Mr. Deakins: Is the Minister aware that there are many lessons to be learnt from the handling of the famine in Ethiopia? Will he assure the House that those lessons will be appreciated by all the aid donors, the multinational organisations and volunteer agencies, in order to be ready for the next famine in another African country?

Mr. Raison: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have thought hard about what has been happening in Ethiopia and Sudan. Tragic though the experience is, I am sure that we shall learn from it.

Mr. Stuart Holland: The Minister will be aware that the problem in Ethiopia also relates to refugees in Sudan, whom the House debated earlier. The problem relates to debt. Recently we have seen a fall of the Government in Sudan largely because of the debt crisis. What advice has the Minister given the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who will attend a joint meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank about this issue later this month, to ensure that meeting Africa's needs is a priority issue and that there is a debt write-off or, at least, a grant funding of some of the debts so that those countries can tackle the appalling drought problem?

Mr. Raison: The debt problem in Sudan is a different matter from the famine in Ethiopia, to which the question relates. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be thinking hard about how to handle debts in the meetings which take place in Washington this month. No one doubts the importance of that, although, as I have already said, one of the positive features of our aid programme in Africa is that for poor countries aid takes the form of a grant and, therefore, does not generate debts.

European Development Fund (Contracts)

27. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the share of contracts from the European development fund won by British companies.

Mr. Raison: Twenty-five per cent. of EDF contracts are placed in African, Caribbean and Pacific countries. Of those placed in Europe, our cumulative share at the end of 1984 was 19·2 per cent. For the first time that exceeded our contribution of 17·76 per cent.

Mr. Baldry: I thank my right hon. Friend for what is essentially good news. How do the 1984 figures compare with those of previous years? Does he agree that Third world countries depend for their growth as much on vibrant trade with nations such as Britain as on development aid?

Mr. Raison: The 1984 figure of 19·2 per cent. was nearly 2 per cent. more than the 1983 figure. As my hon. Friend said, that is an encouraging tendency. He is absolutely right to stress the importance of trade.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister not regard it as a great tragedy that in places such as Bradford there are large numbers of skilled engineers who could be put to work manufacturing tractors, irrigation and agricultural equipment, trucks and other items which would help to combat the food crisis in Ethiopia and elsewhere? What are the Government doing to invest in manufacturing projects in the United Kingdom, which would put British engineers back to work and help to alleviate starvation in the world?

Mr. Raison: Almost 80 per cent. of the money that we spend through our bilateral aid programme finds its way back to Britain in the form of either goods or services. It is also a fact that the European development fund, the World Bank and other multilateral organisations offer many opportunities, which are often taken up, for British manufacturers to make goods to be sent to the Third world.

Leeward Islands Air Transport

28. Mr. Rhodes James asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Leeward Islands Air Transport has yet reached an agreement with British Aerospace for the purchase of Super 748s with an aid grant from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Raison: Leeward Islands Air Transport has entered into a contract with British Aerospace, subject to finalisation of ECGD support and the conclusion of a formal agreement between LIAT and Her Majesty's Government on the terms of the proposed aid grant for two Super 748s. LIAT has already accepted the broad terms of the Government's offer.

Mr. Rhodes James: While thanking my right hon. Friend for that useful and welcome reply, may I ask him, first, what is the sum of money involved and, secondly, whether there are any other sources of finance for this welcome order?

Mr. Raison: We have offered an aid grant from our aid-trade provision up to a maximum of £3·83 million. I understand that the Caribbean Development Bank is providing resources for two other 748 aircraft.

African Governments (Debt Burden)

29. Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with African Governments concerning the impact of their debt burden on the effectiveness of aid programmes.

Mr. Raison: My discussions wih African Governments about aid policy from time to time take into account, as appropriate, their debt burdens. Debt problems normally feature within the analysis of aid needs and economic policies considered at each World Bank-led consultative group.

Mr. Holland: The Minister will be aware that at least £42 billion worth of debt affects African countries as a whole. Since we have this useful chance to further the issue, would he now care to say whether and on what scale in the IMF and World Bank meetings there will be pressure from the Chancellor to write off a proportion of that debt, without which there will be no way in which countries such as Ethiopia or Sudan can overcome their debt problem?

Mr. Raison: I do not believe, and nor does my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the wholesale writing-off of debts is the right answer. However, we have made it clear that, to help countries with balance of payments difficulties, we are willing to consider providing programme aid if they can come to an agreement with the IMF.

Prime Minister's Questions (Printing)

3.30 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about the printing of Prime Minister's Questions. The House will wish to know that I have approved the recommendation in the first report from the Select Committee on Procedure regarding a shortened form of printing Oral Questions tabled for answer by the Prime Minister. I have also approved a resolution of the Services Committee which endorses the scheme that has been proposed. Arrangements are being made for the new format to apply to all notices of Questions given from tomorrow onwards. This means that the first Order Paper in the new form will appear on Tuesday 30 April. I am obliged to both Committees for their advice.

Gas (Northern Ireland)

3.31 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the rejection by the Government of the proposals of the gas industry joint working group and the consequences of that for the future of the gas industry in Northern Ireland."

The matter is specific. Last autumn, the Government announced that the project for the purchase of natural gas from the Kinsale field was not to proceed. The then Minister of State added that the Government were not prepared to continue to provide a subsidy for the industry and that since, as he said, the Kinsale project had appeared to offer the only prospect for a viable gas industry, they would have to take stock of the position. He meant that they were preparing legislation to wind up the industry, but he invited representations from the interests involved.

At once, the Northern Ireland Gas Employers Board and the gas trade union group established a joint working group, which produced a plan to rescue the industry. That plan was examined by two independent firms of consultants, which confirmed, first, that it would offer gas to the people of Belfast at a price 25 per cent. below the current price and, secondly, that no subsidy was involved, since over eight years it would be self-financing, with a positive overall profit of £261 million.

That plan was submitted to the Government. On Good Friday, the Minister of State gave his Easter offering to the people of Northern Ireland. He announced that he had rejected the plan and he confirmed that that would mean the end of the gas industry in Northern Ireland.

There is no doubt about the importance of the matter. The closure of the gas industry will cost more than 1,000 jobs in the industry itself, in addition to those which will be placed at risk in industries that depend on gas. The effect on consumers may be demonstrated briefly by the fact that the cost of electricity in Northern Ireland is, admittedly and unashamedly, held by the Government at the price level in the highest-priced region of Great Britain.

In considering whether the matter should have urgent consideration, Mr. Speaker, you may wish to have in mind the timing of the announcement. On Thursday 4 April, the House rose for the recess. On that day, Ministers were answering Northern Ireland questions and hon. Members from Northern Ireland were in the Chamber. If it was not considered appropriate to give the information in answer to a question, there would have been no difficulty in making a statement. No mention was made of the matter. The announcement was made the next day, after the House had risen. It would be difficult to recollect a more calculated or deliberate slap in the face for this House.

I believe that it is not yet too late to save the industry. Clearly, the Government intend those in that and other industries to make any future decisions on the basis that gas as a form of energy will no longer be an option. With every day that passes, the prospect of saving the industry recedes.

I invite you, Mr. Speaker, to permit the House an opportunity to make its voice known before the knife is finally driven home.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House to discuss a specific and important matter which he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the rejection by the Government of the proposals of the gas industry joint working group and the consequences of that for the future of the gas industry in Northern Ireland."

I listened with great care to what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said. As he knows, my sole duty in considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should have priority over the business already set down for this evening or for tomorrow.

I regret that I cannot find that the matter that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has raised meets all the criteria laid down in the Standing Order. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the three motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Town and Country Planning (Compensation for Restrictions on Mineral Working) Regulations 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Specialized Agencies of the United Nations (Immunities and Privileges) (Amendment) (No. 2) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Eumetsat (Legal Capacities) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. —[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Orders of the Day

Surrogacy Arrangements Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The first point that I should make about the Bill is that, although I believe that its aims are important and have been widely welcomed on both sides of the House, it is a measure that is strictly limited in its extent. Basically, it seeks to prohibit the operation in this country of commercial surrogacy agencies and the advertising of surrogacy services.

What it does not do is attempt to deal with all the issues raised in the Warnock report which I published last year. As the House knows, those issues range from the legal status of surrogate children to the proposals concerning a statutory licensing authority to oversee research. Many of the issues are complex, and there is deep division about some of the issues, which has been expressed in many of the responses that we have received to the Warnock report.

The Government accept that the proper way to handle these issues is by a comprehensive piece of legislation. Work on that is now taking place, with the intention of introducing such comprehensive legislation as soon as practicable and as soon as the parliamentary timetable permits.

On commercial surrogacy, the question that the Government had to consider was whether it would be better to leave that issue also to the main Bill or whether action could be taken ahead of it. We decided that legislation could and should be introduced. The main reason for that was the considerable concern following the Baby Cotton case in January. The House will recall that Mrs. Cotton received payment from a commercial agency acting on behalf of the commissioning couple. The baby was subsequently made a ward of court and, indeed, remains so. However, Mr. Justice Latey gave care and control of the child to the commissioning parents with permission to take the child out of the jurisdiction of the court.

The case illustrated the kind of difficulties and dangers that the Warnock committee had already drawn to the attention of the public. The Warnock committee was in no doubt about commercial surrogacy, and stated:

"We have considered whether the criminal law should have any part to play in the control of surrogacy and have concluded that it should. We recognise that there is a serious risk of commercial exploitation of surrogacy and that this would be difficult to prevent without the assistance of the criminal law."

Similar views have been expressed by many other bodies.

In the consultation which followed the publication of the Warnock report, the overwhelming response was to the effect that commercial arrangements should be prohibited. Over 90 per cent. of all comments received opposed surrogacy undertaken on a commercial basis. That included the churches, women's organisations and professional bodies such as the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, the Royal College of General Practitioners and the Royal College of Nursing.

The arguments against commercial surrogacy are overwhelming. When it comes to adoption, we do not allow commercial arrangements, for the good reason that the paramount concern must be the interests of the child. The same argument applies here. However sympathetic we may be to the commissioning parents, the interests of the child must come first.

Many would argue against all surrogacy arrangements, but it is clear that the presence of commercial agencies risks the exploitation of women by agencies with a financial incentive. Frankly, I believe that it is simply unacceptable to sell children, whether before or after birth.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the individual woman appears not to be covered by the Bill, because she would not, as an individual acting privately, be an agency? Could she not exploit herself by offering herself for gain as a surrogate mother? Does he agree that that would be wrong and that a provision to cover that possibility should be included in the Bill?

Mr. Fowler: The House will have to make a judgment on that. Our judgment is that it would be wrong to involve the woman in that way, first because of the possibility of the taint of criminality on the child and, secondly, because it is just as likely that the woman would herself be exploited. That is why we have not extended the concept of criminality to the mother. However, it is a point that the House can consider.

The case for acting now is overwhelming. If the Government were to wait to make regulations under a comprehensive Warnock Bill, the result would be a delay in which more births would be likely to take place into what everyone agrees is a lebal limbo. That could lead to one of the tragic cases which have occurred in the United States, for example, of a handicapped baby born and disowned by both his mother and the commissioning parents. A Bill now can do something to prevent such problems from arising.

The legislation therefore has the limited but vital objective of prohibiting the further development of commercial surrogacy in Britain. It will also ban the advertising of surrogacy services by agencies, surrogate mothers or commissioning parents.

Clause 1 defines a number of terms for the purposes of the Bill, in particular "surrogate mother" and "surrogacy arrangement". Clause 2 provides for the prohibition of commercial surrogacy agencies, and subsection (1) lists the activities in relation to surrogacy which the Bill prohibits if done on a commercial basis. These involve initiating, or taking part in, negotiations with a view to making a surrogacy arrangement or compiling information with such a view. An important provision of clause 2 is subsection (2), which excludes surrogate mothers — to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) just referred — and commissioning parents from an offence under subsection (1).

Our prime aim in this measure is to outlaw commercial agencies. It is not part of the purpose of the Bill to penalise the infertile couple who may be driven by their plight into making a surrogacy arrangement. Nor do we want to penalise the surrogate mother, who may genuinely consider that she is helping another woman who is unable to carry a child by making parenthood possible for her. We must guard against the possibility that such women might be exploited by commercial agencies. We have therefore concluded that it would be best not to penalise the surrogate mother.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Has my right hon. Friend considered that charities might be established for the express purpose of operating a surrogacy agency, which would not be covered by the Bill? Such organisations might even be funded by the GLC, for example.

Mr. Fowler: I shall leave aside the last part of my hon. Friend's intervention, as I do not particularly want to enter into that issue. The House has a choice, because we could leave the provisions that are set out in the Bill until a more major Bill is introduced that encompasses the recommendations of the Warnock committee. I think that it is right to take limited action now, as a matter of urgency. We have tried to frame a Bill that will find agreement on both sides of the House and I think that we have achieved that.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is concern about any kind of surrogacy, irrespective of whether money is passed? I have read the Bill carefully and I cannot find any provisions in it that cover non-commercial surrogacy. A woman might lend out her body, as it were, for a friend. Are there any plans to introduce provisions that will cover that circumstance?

Mr. Fowler: Many of the individuals and representatives of organisations which have given evidence to us believe that surrogacy generally should be prohibited. There are many issues, including the practical steps that can be taken to prevent it happening. That is part of the consideration that we are giving to the report of the Warnock committee.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Am I not right in saying that the Warnock committee recommended making all surrogacy arrangements illegal? The House would be more persuaded by my right hon. Friend if he could say when his comprehensive Bill is likely to come before us. It cannot be introduced until the next Session at the very earliest, which means that it cannot become law until the summer of 1986 at the very earliest. The present arrangements will continue until then unless my right hon. Friend is seized of the fact that many hon. Members and the country generally are deeply concerned about the distasteful practice of surrogacy.

Mr. Fowler: I hope that my right hon. Friend is seized of the fact that the Government are concerned about these matters and, as an exceptional measure, have introduced the Bill. It would be wrong for my right hon. Friend and me to fall out over this issue, as we both want to achieve the same result. The more major Bill that is to be introduced will be designed to implement many of the recommendations of the Warnock committee. I say to my right hon Friend, in the spirit of friendship, that it would be wrong to attack the Bill on the ground that it does not go far enough. As I said in my first sentence in introducing the Bill, it is a limited measure that has been introduced to deal with a specific abuse. The Government hope that it will receive the consent of both sides of the House.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew West and Inverclyde): Is my right hon. Friend suggesting that there are boundaries to the law within personal arrangements in society and that to go beyond certain boundaries could be construed as officious?

Mr. Fowler: I am suggesting that in the area covered by the Bill there is almost total unanimity. That is the impression that I was given by the evidence that I heard. The views on commercial surrogacy which have been expressed by the Warnock committee and by virtually all the organisations which have given evidence to us accord with the provisions set out in the Bill. We are trying to take action urgently following the Baby Cotton case. I do not think that any of us wants to see a repetition of that sort of case. That is why the Government are acting urgently. We are not pre-empting any further action that might be taken. I am entirely seized of the point expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), about the need for an urgent response.

I shall continue with my exposition of the Bill. The provisions in clause 2 to which I have not yet referred deal with offences. If a body of persons receives payment for a surrogacy arrangement or a person knowingly takes part in the management and control of a body which acts commercially in these matters, they or he will have committed an offence.

Clause 3 deals with advertising. It makes it an offence to advertise surrogacy services where the advertisement is made by an agency, by commissioning parents or by a surrogate mother. This provision is cast more widely than clause 2 and so applies to the commissioning parent and the surrogate mother. This is because advertising may well be a first step towards commercial activities of the kind that the Bill is designed to prohibit. We have framed this provision to catch all the main forms of advertising, whether in newspapers or periodicals published here or on radio or television intended to be received here.

Clause 4 deals with penalties and provides that an offence relating to agency activities carried out on a comercial basis—an offence under clause 2—carries a penalty of three months imprisonment or a fine not exceeding £2,000, or both. Offences under clause 3, relating to advertising, carry a penalty of a fine only not exceeding £2,000. Clause 4(2) provides that prosecutions need the consent, as appropriate, of the Director of Public Prosecutions in England and Wales or the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland for cases in Northern Ireland.

Clause 5 provides that the Bill shall extend to the whole of the United Kingdom. As there is no specific commencement provision, the legislation will come into force after receiving the Royal Assent.

We believe that the publicity that there has already been about our intentions in this measure will have been sufficient to forewarn many people who are already involved in the activities that the Bill will prohibit or any who might have been contemplating setting up commercial surrogacy agencies. I have been encouraged by reports that the major commercial surrogacy agency operating in Britain has already decided to stop functioning in the expectation of the enactment of the Bill.

We know that there are several surrogate pregnancies already arranged by commercial agencies which clearly cannot be affected by the Bill. To take account of these and other surrogate births, we recognise that there may be a need for guidance for local authorities on the action that they should consider if they become aware of a surrogate birth.

When I made my initial statement, my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) asked what could be done for those who are involved in a similar tangle to that of Baby Cotton's parents. A similar point has also been put by Mr. Justice Latey who dealt so expeditiously and sensitively with the case of Baby Cotton. The judgment in that case made it clear that the High Court has powers to protect the interests of children born as a result of surrogacy arrangements and that it will use the powers where necessary. In addition, local authorities have powers and duties to protect children who may be at risk.

My Department will therefore shortly issue a circular of guidance to local authorities. The guidance will set out the general principles on which local authorities should operate—not just in cases that this Bill seeks to prevent but in other cases where there is no commercial element. An authority that knows that a baby has been or is about to be born in its area as a result of a surrogacy arrangement will wish to make inquiries to satisfy itself that the baby is not or will not be at risk. Obviously, the circumstances can vary widely in individual cases. An authority's overriding concern in deciding what, if any, action is needed will be the child's welfare. In that sense, surrogacy does not differ from any other situation in which a local authority becomes aware that there is a possibility that a child needs protection.

The guidance will deal with the legal issues involved and the steps that a local authority should take where it believes that the child may be at risk. It will draw the attention of authorities to the court judgment in the Baby Cotton case. The judgment commended the advantages in similar unusual and complex cases of making a child a ward of court. We shall be sending this advice to authorities as soon as possible.

We hope that, because of this Bill, surrogacy cases where a local authority has to intervene—as it did in the case of Baby Cotton—will in future be rare, but there are difficult matters, and I hope that authorities will find it helpful to have that advice available.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): So that we can be clear about the nature of the measure, is the Secretary of State saying that he will not return to the House later with a measure to forbid surrogacy arrangements in which there are no financial gains for the parties involved?

Mr. Fowler: That matter is part of the consideration that the Government are giving to the wider issues raised in the Warnock report. As I have already made clear, the Government intend to bring forward a major Bill, which this does not pretend to be, to deal with all those issues. I believe that that would be in the interests of the public and is what the House would require to be done.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): When can we expect such a Bill?

Mr. Fowler: The Bill and its preparation are extremely complex and subject to the demands of the parliamentary timetable. No decision on that has been made. I cannot guarantee when it will take place, but I should like to see such legislation brought forward as soon as possible. I cannot give a guarantee, because there has not yet been full consideration of the legislation.

The purpose of the Bill is to tackle the issue of commercial agencies and the advertising of surrogacy services. The Bill does not tackle all the major issues raised in the Warnock report. The Government recognise that a major Bill will be necessary to achieve that. I emphasise that point. Nevertheless, action on commercial surrogacy is important and urgent. It has been supported by a range of outside bodies. It will go a long way towards preventing abuse and, above all, to placing the interests of the child first. It is upon that basis that I ask for the support of the House.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): As the Secretary of State has been at pains to point out, this is a limited Bill targeted exclusively at outlawing the commercial dimension of surrogacy about which, as he said, there seems to be widespread abhorrence. Let me say immediately, speaking as an individual on a moral issue which will be the subject of a free vote, that I accept and support the principle underlying the Bill.

I believe that the measure is, however, unfortunately motivated by some over-reaction to the Baby Cotton case. It is a pity that for that reason the commercial aspect of surrogacy is being divorced—if that is the word—from a wider consideration of the general framework within which surrogacy should be handled.

The case for criminalising commercial agencies that procure surrogate motherhood is clear. It is based upon the genuine risk of the exploitation of desperate couples and the risk that poor women would be induced into pregnancy, at least in some cases, for the money. To put it another way, the commercial inducement to offer one's womb for rent exposes low-income women to exploitation as rich peoples' baby farms. Not only is that utterly unacceptable in itself: it raises the likelihood that the natural mother may, in due course, argue that she was pressurised into parting with the baby.

I should be the first to agree that such distressing "tug-of-love" conflicts already occur in some adoptions and cannot be excluded in cases of non-commercial surrogacy. I am sure that the House will agree, however, that the cash pressure makes that far more likely in commercial cases.

There is another fundamental reason why I believe that commercial surrogate motherhood should be made illegal. It is that matters can easily go badly wrong. The commissioning father may come to believe that the child is not his—at least he cannot disprove that the surrogate mother was already pregnant at the time of impregnation; or the surrogate mother may refuse to hand over the baby after birth, as happened, as the Secretary of State mentioned, in the celebrated case in Pasadena, California, in 1981; or the baby may be severely handicapped at birth, with neither party willing to take it; or the surrogate mother may become ill during pregnancy and take certain drugs which damage the foetus.

For all these reasons, where the situation is exacerbated by impersonal surrogacy, undertaken for payment, it is wholly wrong to believe that commercial contracts, however carefully they may be drawn up by Miss Blankfield, who is the person we normally speak of in that regard, can be proof against highly damaging consequences not only for the parties to the contract but, more seriously, for the resulting child. For that reason, too, I should be glad if commercial surrogacy were ruled out.

Given my support for the Bill on those principles, I recognise that its drafting reflects some ingenious microsurgery on the part of the Department of Health and Social Security in separating out the commercial considerations from the wider moral issues. It performs well the technical function of closing loopholes which some had thought would make a ban unworkable. The case of Kirsty Stevens which The Observer, in a celebrated article of 13 January 1985, thought would be untouched by any likely legislation, will, if I am right, be prevented in future by the ban on advertising, even by private individuals. At the same time, family arrangements will not be affected by the Bill, which I am sure is right, but it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for strangers to become known to each other, given the constraints of the Bill, as willing participants.

I have one technical criticism about the drafting of the Bill. The imposition of strict criminal liability on newspaper proprietors and editors who unwittingly publish advertisements—I quote clause 3(1)— that surrogate arrangements may be sought or may be available seems to me to be unduly harsh and oppressive.

"containing an indication (however expressed)"

However, I confess to some unease about a legislative strategy which is geared to focusing upon a practice which may well be on the decline, anyway, while at the same time it defers, perhaps for longer than is now being suggested—I did not take too much heart from the reply of the Secretary of State to my question—the real issues which go to the heart of the matter.

It is perhaps significant that surrogate agencies in the United States recently have experienced a marked falling away in their trade. It was reported on 7 January 1985 in The Daily Telegraph that one non-profit-making group in the United States, which claimed at the end of 1982 that it had signed on 400 young women willing to serve as surrogate mothers, is no longer active. It was stated in the same report that in state legislatures right across the United States there is no longer any noticeable pressure to draw up laws to regulate this matter, partly because experience had shown how many things can go wrong, partly because there had been several disputes about paternity which wound up in the courts and partly because costs — amounting not just to £6,500, as in the Baby Cotton case, but to about £20,000, taking account of everything — were proving for many infertile couples to be a prohibitively expensive way to start a family. Britain is not, of course, the United States. However, all this suggests to me that over-reaction to the Baby Cotton case may have been a trifle premature and that there may be an element in the Bill of trying to bar the stable door after the horse has bolted.

Be that as it may—I am no more aware of the full statistics than are the Government—the real weakness of the Bill is that it still leaves unresolved the surrogacy issue. The questions asked by the Secretary of State's hon. Friends demonstrate that fact, and I agree with them. Even if surrogacy is not outlawed, it still leaves open the question whether professional involvement in surrogacy arrangements should be outlawed. If it were to be outlawed, parents would be left in a counselling and advice vacuum. The child could still be placed in a vulnerable position. I suspect that back-street networks would almost inevitably emerge. On the other hand, a doctor in private practice who offered to supply a surrogate and then took a consultation fee could be said to have acted in a way that was very little different from that of a commercial agency.

Having listened to the speech of the Secretary of State, it is disappointing that the Government have given no hint about their own views regarding the involvement of money in the surrogacy relationship. My view is that the involvement of money, other than for reimbursing the carrying mother for the necessary costs of nine months of pregnancy, is in principle undesirable and wrong. That view commands almost universal acceptance. However, the use of surrogacy where money is not involved as an option for the treatment of infertility should not, in my view, be wholly ruled out, although it should be considered only as a final resort.

Mr. John Ward (Poole): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: When I have finished this part of my speech.

For example, a woman with functioning ovaries but a damaged womb can achieve children who are genetically hers as well as those of her husband after laparoscopies for ovum recovery, in vitro fertilisation and then embryo transfer to a surrogate. Hon. Members may say that such examples are rare, and I am sure they are, but they seem to offer a significant warning against any law that is designed to suppress surrogate services altogether. I shall now give way.

Mr. Ward: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that in qualifying his approval of the Bill he is not assuming that all of us necessarily want legislation to be introduced for all forms of surrogacy. I believe that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) agrees with me. There are certain issues about which we should legislate only after long consideration and after having listened to all the relevant arguments. Because most of us are prepared to listen to those arguments it is important that this piece of holding legislation should be speedily put on to the statute book. That will give us time to listen to the other arguments to which the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) so rightly referred.

Mr. Meacher: I have already said that I am perfectly happy in principle to support the Bill, but the point I am trying to make is that it is not possible logically to disentangle some of these other wider issues. I am worried that this fairly modest measure may result in an unfortunately long period during which these other important issues are digested. That is why I should have preferred there to be one measure only.

I suspect that many people would choose a surrogate child who had a genetic relationship with them or with their partner rather than an adopted child with whom neither they nor their partner had a genetic relationship. Indeed, a minority on the Warnock committee recommended that a charitable body like an adoption society should be permitted to provide well-screened and suitable surrogates for infertile couples, that it should receive no money and that it should pass on only the minimum necessary payments for costs duly incurred by the surrogate.

Unless one adopts — some hon. Members might, judging by their questions — the prior attitude that surrogacy in principle is not to be condoned in any circumstances, even if, in the case of surrogacy for love, it cannot be wholly prevented, in the last analysis I believe that the Warnock minority view is reasonable, deserving further serious consideration. I am only sorry that on this matter, which is so close to the heart of the Bill, Ministers have been content simply to defer decisions without, in the meantime, giving any sign of their thinking. To say the least, it is regrettable that the Bill, without imposing an outright ban, conduces to amateurish or exploitative do-it-yourself arrangements in a procedure which, if it is to be used at all, should surely be attended by the advantage of full medical, legal and counselling services. But on that, regrettably, Ministers remain silent.

Mrs. McCurley: One thing worries me about the minority view in the Warnock report. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if we were to establish surrogacy, even through clinics in the National Health Service without any money being exchanged, we would still have the problems to which he referred, such as psychological and social problems? As a consequence, there would be additional bureaucracy and social workers, and all the other problems—I am not just getting at social workers, but I am saying that we are building up attendant problems which, frankly, this society can do without.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Lady may not have been getting at social workers, but she made a good fist at it. I do not see the NHS particularly as a bureaucratic organisation or social workers as a hindrance, although no doubt their performance and services could always be improved. However, I personally take the view that what makes surrogacy so distasteful is the pressures that commercialism introduces. In the absence of them, I can see that in a few highly exceptional cases, perhaps as a last resort, and certainly not as a frequent procedure, there may be some correct provision for a surrogate motherhood.

The other yawning gap in the Bill that cries out for attention concerns the vexed issue of legitimacy, which has not been mentioned. Answering questions on his statement on 7 March, the Secretary of State referred to the status of the child—and I agree—as "completely unsatisfactory at the moment."—[Official Report, 7 March 1985; Vol. 74, c. 1189.]

However, it does not seem unsatisfactory enough to prevent the Secretary of State passing by on the other side and postponing the issue indefinitely into the future. I hope that that the Bill will come forward soon, but I wonder.

This issue can and should be grasped sooner rather than later as virtually everyone accepts that, in vitro fertilisation and surrogate children need to have their legal status regularised and recognised. Some movement in the right direction was taken in the Law Commission report in 1982, which recommended that discrimination between legitimate and illegitimate children should be removed, and that children produced by means of artificial insemination by donor should be legitimate when born to a married couple. That is an advance, but it is unsatisfactory because it still leaves in limbo the child born to an unmarried woman or the child rejected by the husband.

Therefore, this might be a better solution. I offer it as a model for consideration. It lies in querying the whole concept of legitimacy in its traditional form and adopting the Warnock suggestion as to social parenthood, coupled with disallowing rights to donors. Parenthood, and parental rights, would then rest with the carrying mother, to be passed on, if appropriate, as at adoption. That woman would then register the child's birth on her own or with her partner, all parental rights and duties would be vested in those who registered in that way, and any handing over of parental rights subsequent to that could be arranged, as happens now in adoption. All inheritance and other legal rights would then accrue from those parents to the child in the normal way. That is only one model, but I believe that something along those lines is needed and would be a great improvement on the present highly unsatisfactory situation.

For all the reasons that I have given, I do not demur from the single issue underlying the Bill, but I am concerned that the Government have embarked on this brief measure without, as yet — I am sure that the Secretary of State will correct me if I am wrong — having thought through at all the implications of several other related issues which, logically, simply cannot be disentangled from the rationale of the Bill. Frankly, the history of short emergency Bills preceding a major and necessary piece of regularising legislation has never been happy in the House. We in the Opposition will do our best in Committee to make changes that improve the Bill. We believe that that needs to be done. However, I fear that in the peculiarly sensitive area of human infertility, the single-issue and disconnected Bill now being introduced may turn out to be no exception to that general rule.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): In introducing the Bill my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was at pains to say that it has only a limited object—to deal with commercial surrogacy only. The greater detail is to be left to a more comprehensive measure which, as I think I said in my intervention, is hardly likely to become law before the end of next year.

Speaking solely for myself, but probably for many others too, I would say that such a long delay in dealing with a subject that has caused considerable concern in the nation as a whole as well as in the House is not satisfactory and is leaving it for far too long. If the Government can carry the House with them and improve the Bill, well and good. I certainly go along with that. However, I do not approve of their approach. Either the practice of surrogacy is undesirable and antisocial, and carries considerable risks for the children concerned, or it does not—or does not in any substantial measure. If it is undesirable, I feel that it is not possible to accept the argument put before us so far.

The plain fact is that surrogacy is not outlawed in the Bill. I want to know why not. I should have liked to hear my right hon. Friend make the broad case against surrogacy. He did not do so. He left that in the air. He assumes that we understand it already. Perhaps that is correct in the House itself, but I should have thought that the country should be told why surrogacy as such is not being outlawed in this Bill, but will be in some subsequent Bill. Yet money may change hands between surrogate mothers and prospective parents. Surely we should serve notice now that that is not acceptable.

There are other difficulties. For example, my right hon. Friend did not refer to the legal problems surrounding the child of a surrogacy arrangement. Who, in law, is the mother? What safeguards are there for the child? I remember remarking in an earlier debate that clever, intelligent, far-reaching and searching as the Warnock report was, little consideration was given by its authors to the implications of what was recommended for the child. Therefore, I believe that before the debate is ended something should be said about those matters.

In paragraph 8.18 Warnock proposed that professionals knowingly assisting in surrogacy should be criminally liable. The Bill makes no mention of professional liability. Why not? If there are difficulties we should be told. We should be told that the matter cannot be dealt with now, but we shall most certainly deal with it in future legislation when ever that is brought before the House. Again, in paragraph 8.19, the Warnock report proposes that all surrogacy arrangements should be made illegal and any such contracts would thus be unenforceable in the courts, but the Bill completely ignores that firm proposal. I appreciate my right hon. Friend's argument that serious problems and difficulties arise that could not be dealt with in this Bill but which will certainly be dealt with in a later Bill. This should be spelled out now.

I shall be brief because many of my hon. Friends wish to contribute. Nevertheless, I give notice now that I do not like this method of proceeding and I hope that before we vote on the Bill my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health will answer some of the questions that I have raised. In my view, the matter is so important socially that not only Parliament but the public must be told why, if we cannot have the whole loaf, we must accept a crust at this juncture, knowing full well that a year or 18 months will elapse before the promised comprehensive legislation is introduced. Frankly, that is not good enough.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I do not share the confident predictions of the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) as to how long we shall have to wait for the coming of the great Bill which will roll all the moral issues into one and deal comprehensively with all the problems raised by Warnock and everyone else. I believe that the difficulties have been seriously underestimated. Indeed, Ministers have already hinted that the Bill may take a good deal longer than the right hon. Gentleman suggests. Therefore, those of us who feel strongly about these matters cannot assume that that legislation will be introduced even in this Parliament. Important and urgent matters such as surrogacy and experimentation on human embryos cannot wait for that legislation.

Many of the other issues dealt with in the Warnock report were cases in which advances in medical technology had brought new moral dilemmas which we have not previously had to face. It can scarcely be said, however, that the issue of surrogacy has suddenly landed upon us. In this context, I was amused to read the comments of Nature magazine on the Government's initial reaction and their statement that the Bill was to be introduced. It said:

> "The British government's guiding principle, well illustrated by last weekend's fuss and what may yet flow from it, is that the general opinion jumps most readily to prohibition when it is taken by surprise."

The country may have been taken a little by surprise at the sheer effrontery of the Baby Cotton case, but surrogacy has certainly not landed upon us as a result of modern technical advances. The issue has been with us for generations. Indeed, it is well developed in the book of Genesis, chapter 16. When Abraham's wife proved unable to have children she said to her husband:

> "I pray thee, go unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her."

And that is exactly what happened.

The book of Genesis, however, goes on to illustrate the problems that arise from surrogacy. Sarah was soon complaining that her bondservant was getting too proud and looking down on her because she was bearing a child and Sarah was not. Later, when Sarah produced a child of her own, she protested strongly that her son Isaac should not have to share his inheritance with Ishmael, the "bondswoman's son" who had come on to the scene as a result of the earlier surrogacy arrangement. So let us not pretend that the issue is new.

Mr. Greenway: I am impressed by the hon. Gentleman's biblical knowledge, but was not Sarah 99 years old at the time?

Mr. Beith: She was indeed, and it was thus quite reasonable for her to conclude that she was unlikely to produce a natural child thereafter. In fact, of course, she did. People are so often wrong about these things and subsequent events may then give rise to problems. My point is simply that the problems are not new. All that modern technology has done is in certain instances to remove the direct adulterous relationship between the commissioning father and the mother commissioned to carry the child, and even that intervention requires a fairly minimal level of medical technology.

It is true that more openly commercial transactions have recently come to the attention of the public, but such transactions are also not new. One does not have to look very deeply into the recesses of the 19th century to find extensive examples of commercial activity in procuring the birth of children for childless couples.

There is, however, good reason for concern about the possible development of commercial surrogacy agencies and it is right that a measure of this kind should be introduced. I believe that it is widely agreed that there is something morally wrong about the purchase of babies, especially the form that it takes in surrogacy arrangements. Nevertheless, surrogacy is not the only instance in which babies are purchased and legal safeguards are required. For instance, our adoption laws were altered fairly recently in an attempt further to limit the possibility of the purchase of babies. There is also the danger of exploitation of the mothers due to financial pressures. A further danger is that agencies will grow and surrogacy will become more common as a result of the commercial activities of agencies determined to make a living out of the practice.

I shall argue that we should not encourage surrogacy, but I first make this qualification. Whatever we do to try to restrict the practice, even if we were to follow the advice of the right hon. Member for Castle Point and seek to outlaw surrogacy altogether, we shall not be able to prohibit adultery or the arrangement entered into by Abraham to obtain a surrogate child. Artificial insemination by donor will also not be prohibited, although it involves a commercial element in that the donors are paid for their sperm. Despite the many problems that arise from those two forms of activity, it seems unlikely that Parliament will attempt to prohibit them. That situation should serve as a warning to us in deciding what it is reasonable or feasible to do in seeking to prevent surrogacy.

This is very much a personal issue and I do not personally believe that one can reasonably expect to achieve an effective ban on all kinds of surrogacy. Nevertheless, we should take steps to discourage the spread of such practices, for a number of good reasons. Those reasons, however, relate to the very issues that the Government felt unable to tackle and thus left out of the Bill. I realise why it was necessary to introduce a limited measure, but I believe that some of the problems left unresolved may continue to cause great difficulties and that not all of them need have been excluded from the Bill.

I shall not add to what has been said about the problems of legitimacy and I recognise that that subject is too wide for the scope of the Bill. There is, however, the somewhat narrower question of who is the legal mother of a child produced under a surrogacy arrangement and the application of general adoption law in this context. The law rightly makes certain provisions to protect the mother of a child which might be adopted from being subjected to great pressure at the time of adoption, providing for a breathing space or cooling-off period before a final decision can be made. The application of that law to surrogacy cases must be considered. We need more guidance from the Government on that subject.

Other aspects of adoption law are also relevant. There is the right of an adopted child, at the age of 18, to discover the identity of its natural mother. Parliament gave adopted children that right a few years ago. What would be the position of a surrogate child? I assume that it, too, would enjoy the right to learn the identity of its natural mother when it had reached the age of maturity. Surrogate mothers may not have realised that that would be so when they agreed to undertake surrogacy.

Mrs. McCurley: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that there would be an emotional problem? For a child to learn at the age of 18 that it had been given away under a surrogacy arrangement would be far more traumatic than discovering that it had been adopted. There may be good and heartrending reasons for giving over a child for adoption, but to have been handed over for money will surely have a profound effect even on an 18-year-old.

Mr. Beith: I am sure that there can be just such an effect. I am not sure that one can make an absolute qualitative distinction between the circumstances, but there are important factors to be borne in mind when we compare what happens to an adopted child under present arrangements and what would happen to a surrogate child. Children are normally adopted through an adoption agency which will counsel the parents to advise the child, from the earliest possible age, of the nature of its adoption. The adoption society would encourage the parents to make sure that the child understood from an early age that it had been adopted, and why. What advice would be given, and by whom, to people taking into their family a child borne by surrogacy? Would they be advised to tell the child, at the earliest possible age, of the circumstances? It is difficult to predict what the emotional outcome of that would be. That is an area of real difficulty.

When the Secretary of State made his initial statement to the House, I questioned him about another point. The Warnock committee recommended that surrogacy contracts should not be enforceable by law. The Secretary of State seemed to take the view that the law as it stood was quite clear and that no such contract—a contract to hand over the baby, or the money — would be enforceable in the courts. If the right hon. Gentleman has any doubts on that point, some provision should be included in the Bill. If he is wholly satisfied that the law provides no opportunity for enforcing contracts between the mother, the agency and the prospective parents, he should say so.

What is to be the fate of the children involved? That is the test that we must apply. I fear for the position of children born in this way, and that is why I believe that Parliament must make it clear that there are many dangers attached to the practice of surrogacy, and that many problems will be stored up for the children. We must make that clear even to people who are looking for a reasonable way of dealing with the problem of childlessness—to people who want to offer a home to a child and who may well have the emotional and material resources to give a child a good home and so to contribute to society. Like the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) I feel that there might be circumstances in which someone could persuade me that it was reasonable for such a couple to resort to surrogacy. I therefore do not agree with those who want a complete ban on surrogacy. However, I believe that such a couple should be left in no doubt about the dangers and the problems that they may face, just as those of us who adopt children know that serious problems and potential difficulties are involved.

Sir Bernard Braine: The hon. Gentleman refers to the effect upon the children. That is an extremely important point. The House needs to know what medical and psychiatric evidence has been given by people eminent in their field — some individual hon. Members have received such evidence—about the likely effects on a child who in later years demands the right to hear how it was born and who its real mother was. The effect upon a child must be incalculable, and the cost to the community is likely to be considerable.

Experts have already expressed views on the subject. Is not the House entitled to know what advice has been given to the Government on that point, following the Warnock report, and why there is no provision on that score in the Bill?

Mr. Beith: I hope that Ministers will be as frank as they can with all the information at their disposal. However, many circumstances of birth cause problems in later life, and surrogacy is only one of them. It would be dangerous to single out surrogate birth and to claim that anyone who finds out that he was born in this way will be uniquely liable to great emotional trauma in later life. Many circumstances of birth can cause psychological difficulties in later life.

As surrogacy is voluntarily and deliberately entered upon, those who resort to it should be given the clearest possible warning about future problems. They should be warned through the general attitude of the law. The attitude of Parliament and of the law towards a form of conduct considerably affects the attitude of citizens. There is no doubt that since the law on abortion was changed, public attitudes to abortion have been influenced in some measure. The law prevents certain categories of people from marrying each other because Parliament, over the years, has taken the view that some forms of marriage —for example, marriage between stepchild and step-parent—could, if they became at all widespread, pose a real danger for similar families. In many areas, the law on a matter seeks to exercise an influence wider than its basic provisions. This Bill should do so.

If Parliament did nothing at this stage, it might be assumed that surrogacy carried the blessing of the House and of informed opinion, when in fact it carries so many dangers that it should not be given that degree of encouragement. That is another reason for taking legislative steps, which are in any case justified, to prevent commercial surrogacy. We must examine the Bill in Committee to see whether it achieves that objective, and whether it does so without paying too high a price in some other directions. There are, for example, the legal aspects to which the hon. Member for Oldham, West referred and about which there has been some press comment. There are the questions of the burden of proof and of jury trial. However, the House should certainly make it clear that surrogacy brings with it serious problems and that the dangers attached to commercial operations in this field are so great that we should not permit them.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): It is right and proper for me to offer my warmest congratulations to the Secretary of State for bringing the Bill before the House, about 15 months since I introduced precisely such a measure. I was then careful to be very circumspect in my approach to the problem. I welcome the Government's sympathetic response not just in producing a Bill but in acknowledging the fact that grave difficulties surround the whole issue of surrogacy, not just its commercial aspects.

It is heart-warming to welcome a Bill that has had so much public response and support. The Government are to be congratulated on acting swiftly, especially following the Baby Cotton case. I am glad that the sale of children is to be banned, for that is what the Bill is about. I am also glad that the Government are considering the primary individual involved—the child. However, it is important to remember the surrogate mother. In the past few months I have had the opportunity to examine the conditions under which women become surrogates. I am ever more convinced that the attraction of the financial element is paramount—well and away above any of the altruism that might be talked about in press revelations.

As the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, we were expecting poor women to be exploited for the obvious desires of rich women. I am pleased that the activities of the Redhill clinic have now ceased. I have investigated the hard commercialism of that enterprise and its links with the United States and the fact that its activities have been abandoned shows the strength of the Bill.

Commercial surrogacy has been successful in the United States. We all admire many parts of the United States ethos, but we do not always try to emulate them. Although it is said that the morality of the United States reaches us in 10 or 20 years' time, I am glad that we have not waited that long this time and that we have taken a firm and British stand.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) identified an important problem concerning the identity of children and problems that are left with the surrogate's family—a matter that has not been discussed much here. Women who have taken on the job of bearing children for others go home without a baby and discover that their children feel a strange sense of bereavement because no child has been taken home. Occasionally, even a husband who has consented to the arrangement feels revulsion in his relationship with his wife. That causes deep problems in the existing family.

We are sympathetic to infertile couples but do not finance consultations for them properly. However, we must not pile more problems in society on to ourselves. We have enough family problems. The hon. Member for Oldham, West rather resented my reference to social workers, but their existence shows that there are problems enough. We shall only add to those problems if we accept surrogacy. I do not think that it will go underground if we ban commercial surrogacy. Between 6 per cent. and 10 per cent. of women of childbearing age are infertile—the figures vary from consultant to consultant and scientist to scientist—and less than 1 per cent. of them would benefit from surrogacy. The scale is small.

I should like all aspects of surrogacy to be banned, but I accept what the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed said. In the highlands of Scotland, sisters have frequently made surrogacy arrangements. We must ask ourselves whether we want to interfere with and criminalise informal family arrangements. Such interference worries me. Although I do not want surrogacy to exist as a trade, it would be invidious to interfere too far with family life. The medical profession would be grateful for clarification. I should like my right hon. Friend to consider other legislation as quickly as possible to deal with other aspects of surrogacy.

Many biblical quotations have been thrown about in connection with the question, "Who is the mother?" The judgment of Solomon in the dispute between the two women springs immediately to mind. Solomon the wise suggested that the child be split in two, half being given to each woman. The real mother gave up the child for the love of it. The story tells us much about motherhood. The mother who gives birth to the child must be the legal mother, irrespective of what the law might say.

I hope that the Bill goes through Committee speedily and that there will be consensus on the banning of commercial surrogacy. I hope that there will also be consensus on matters that cannot be seen in such hard and fast terms.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Bill is welcome to the extent that it attempts to deal with commercial agencies that profiteer from surrogacy. Unfortunately, it has been constructed in haste, primarily in response to the furore created in the recent and much publicised case of Baby Cotton. The sensationalism generated by the media and some hon. Members has influenced the Bill to its detriment.

There is a fundamental flaw in banning commercial surrogacy while allowing men to continue to buy private surrogacy arrangements without any legal safeguards. This can only result in more highly publicised baby wrangles, which could lead to Parliament banning surrogacy altogether. In these circumstances we should consider at length the full medical, legal and counselling services that Parliament needs to approve so that surrogacy can be properly regulated.

Despite Fleet Street's unhealthy obsession with what the newspaper headlines proclaimed as "Britain's first surrogate baby", the media were, as is often the case, quite wrong. Surrogacy did not begin with Baby Cotton—only a media interest and hysteria in the wake of the Warnock report.

Infertility has been an unhappily common problem for many families throughout the ages. Some of those families chose to deal with the problem by making private arrangements which actually amounted to what is now called surrogacy, without the matter being known outside the family circle. The drawbacks to these informal measures are myriad and have in their time brought strain and divisions within family relations. That is what the Warnock report was referring to when it said that public opinion was against surrogacy because "it could drive a wedge between a previously loving partnership".

This view fails to take account of the way in which modern medical technology and carefully considered legislation could overcome some of the drawbacks previously associated with surrogacy.

Fertilisation in surrogacy arrangements is no longer reliant on an intimate relationship, and the surrogate mother now conceives as a result of medical technique. The outcome of the pregnancy is a wanted baby for an unknown couple in circumstances similar to adoption. Therefore, the issues for me are not "if" we should use this new technology to fulfil the desires of men and women to have children, but how we avoid replacing the old drawbacks with ones that are new and even more dangerous and damaging. This the Bill has failed to do, by limiting itself only to one of the unfavourable aspects to be dealt with.

It is the duty of Parliament to legislate against the exploitative nature of commercial agencies which see women primarily as objects of profit. Hence, women's rights to control their bodies and fertility are cast aside and trampled on. Unhappily, while we live in a society that falls over itself to make a quick profit at the expense of the general good, medical knowledge will inevitably be misused by capitalist gangsterism. The director of the commercial surrogacy agency in Surrey has been quoted as saying that the company would like to become the Coca-Cola of the surrogate industry—in other words, a big profit industry like any other multinational, with no loyalties or commitment to prevent the expansion of its worldwide exploitative practices. I support provisions in the Bill to prevent Britain becoming a shareholder in this unsavoury global enterprise.

As a Socialist, it appears to me that any form of surrogacy cemented with large amounts of money perpetuates unequal capitalist relations between different social classes and men and women in new, insidious ways. In my view, the Bill fails to deal with this.

The media focus which has highlighted the financial gain made by the surrogate mother fails to mention that only a very small proportion of the money pocketed by the agency is paid to her. She is not paid to undergo twice-monthly artificial insemination, nor if she fails to conceive after six months of these medical ordeals. She is not paid to abstain from sexual relations with her partner, even though she must agree to this provision while conception and pregnancy are under way. She is not paid during pregnancy to ensure that she and the foetus enjoy optimum care, nor if she has a miscarriage. She is most definitely not paid should the baby be born with any handicap. Her only modest payment in this highly lucrative enterprise is on handing over a perfect specimen of a newborn baby. In my view, she is grossly underpaid, and the Bill must be criticised for neglecting to protect surrogate mothers' interests in any future private deals.

The ability of the donor father to pay large amounts of money confers immense power on him. As a result, a grossly unequal bond exists between him, the surrogate mother and his partner. As he has paid for the services of the surrogate mother, he is given personal details about her appearance, the colour of her hair and eyes, height, social class and the town where she lives. If he finds any of these details disagreeable, he can choose another woman. On the other hand, she knows nothing about him except his obvious financial clout. Such voyeuristic relations are not uncommon in Soho, but are usually condemned as deeply exploitative and insulting to women. There is an urgent need to legislate against these unequal arrangements based on immoral notions of men and women.

The power that the donor father's money carries is nowhere more cruelly emphasised than in the role allowed his partner. While making the preparations for the changes in her life when she will become the legal mother of her husband's baby, she is totally excluded from the rights he enjoys. He is kept in touch with the pregnancy by telephone, written progress reports and tapes of the foetal heartbeat, but whether he decides to share these with his partner is up to him alone. That is strange in a society such as ours, which stresses the importance of the role of parent for women. In the family, and in education, work and law, the primacy of the woman's role as chief caretaker of children is reinforced.

Equal rights legislation has hardly dented the unequal relations that working women experience when trying to combine successfully the roles of wage earner and mother, yet when the donor father reaches for his cheque book, his partner's rights as the prospective mother of a baby which she is most likely to nurture to adulthood are erased. The Bill fails to ensure her equal status with her partner during the entire surrogacy processes until the baby becomes legally hers.

For me the crucial issues do not centre on banning new medical technology which can help women and men to have wanted children. Rather, I seek to ensure the equal rights of those concerned when a woman agrees to carry a child for other parents so that surrogacy is free from commercial exploitation as well as from control by men with money. That is not to say that no payment should be involved. Consideration should have been given to the ways in which a surrogate mother could be paid by the state, just as maternity allowances and child benefit are paid. A small weekly allowance could be paid at the time of artificial insemination, increasing substantially as the pregnancy is confirmed and progresses. Setting these amounts would be complex, but for Socialists used to complicated pay negotiations, that should not prove too difficult. I believe that this issue must be tackled in a Socialist way so that people seeking these measures are not barred through lack of money or driven into becoming permanent surrogate mothers through financial desperation, just as in America financial considerations have caused people to become blood donors. As we have seen, there is very little evidence of personal care and concern in commercial or private arrangements, and these must be high priorities in the future.

I advocate a limited role for the state in surrogacy. Sadly, many of the welfare aspects of the state have in the past been experienced in a most repressive way by the very people whom we are seeking to help. The practical arrangements could be set up via a national network which is distinct from conventional hospital consultancies. That would save money on high salaries which would be better spent on financing local advice and technology through a network of well woman clinics, counselling services and general practice. Carefully considered, decentralised local provisions would then protect the personal needs of people closely, and transform innovative medical technology into caring national health services.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): First, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the speed and decisiveness with which he has introduced this measure. Unlike the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), I do not criticise him for reacting to public opinion, because it is most important that the Government should react speedily to it. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to criticise the Government if they did not react to public opinion.

I am not entirely happy with the measure. I welcome what the Government have done, but they have not gone far enough. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) that we should not bring into the scope of the law arrangements which are made within families and which have historically been made within families. However, when matters go outside the family, we have a duty to be interested and to ensure that what is done is for the good of those involved, especially of the child.

We legislate, rightly, for adoption and require that restrictive and stringent procedures are followed. In this case, we seem to take the view that that will not be necessary. That is wrong. The hon. Member for Oldham, West suggested that we might be protecting the surrogate mother from exploitation, but I do not think that the Bill does that. The Bill does not seek to outlaw any payment made to a surrogate mother, so she is equally susceptible to exploitation whether from a commercial or other form of agency.

The Bill's weakness is that it will permit surrogacy to be arranged by local authorities, local health authorities and charities set up for that purpose. Some of those organisations may not be what hon. Members would regard as charities. They may be covers for organisations which make substantial payments to employees and which are funded by all sorts of curious methods. Donations to such charities may not count as payments for the purpose of this legislation. Therefore, there is a grave danger in proceeding in this way. Unscrupulous people could drive a coach and horses through the legislation as it stands.

The only way to overcome the problem is to outlaw the procurement of surrogacy by a third person. That would still permit direct surrogacy arrangements between individuals. If we outlaw all procurement, we shall minimise the risk of exploitation as far as possible within the scope of legislation that could be reasonably enforced by the police. The Bill should be amended to achieve that. We would then protect mothers, and ensure the best possible family arrangements for the child.

5.3 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): On 7 March, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services announced to the House that the Bill would be prepared, I was attending the christening of the younger child of my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet). I thought that I was doing my bit to encourage childbirth by celebrating the birth of a child. It is a great asset to have children. It is not a right, but a bonus.

I welcome the Bill because it will cut out one of the most immoral practices that has ever occurred — commercial surrogacy. I remember when news of Baby Cotton was leaked, the furore that any mother would rent out her womb to make some money, and allow her child to shoot off to America. I congratulate my right hon. Friend sincerely on introducing the Bill. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) who has been campaigning and championing this cause, even before Baby Cotton appeared on the scene.

For many months, medical journals have expressed great anxiety about surrogate motherhood. When we debated the Warnock report, I was fortunate enough to be called and to put on record how I considered the position of a surrogate child. I considered it an oddity, although it was a scientific marvel.

The Bill will stop money changing hands. However, like my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), I am anxious about the charitable aspect, in that a charity could be set up and a surrogate mother paid many years after the birth. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will consider that point when he replies. Payment, no matter how much or when it is made, should not be tolerated.

I am particularly worried about the other three surrogate children who are due shortly. Unlike the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), I believe that the Government acted quickly because they had to. The legislation has not been rushed, but it is both sensible and sound. It has been introduced speedily because we knew of those three children and of the potential for further children being born in that way in America and elsewhere. We need to eradicate commercial surrogacy.

The practice is sick, as is any sort of womb leasing. I can understand that some women may be terribly hard up. For the first time in my life I agree with the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that women in poor income brackets may be easily tempted, not merely because they wish to buy a car but because they need money to survive. The financial gain was a serious temptation. Although I sympathise with those who were tempted down that indelicate route, I hope that the Bill will deter people from so doing in future.

Clause 2 adequately covers the full role of commercial surrogacy and particular practices. I understand the past system in Scotland, and the fact that many arrangements have been carried out within a family where one sister has had difficulty in bearing a child. When I criticised surrogate motherhood, I received a letter from a constituent who said that the first surrogate mother was the Virgin Mary. I do not know about that, but the practice continues.

I admire much that is done in America. It is a great innovator, but surrogate motherhood is one type of experiment that need never have arrived on our shores. I hope that one day we shall do away with surrogacy altogether. I hope that an opportunity to achieve that may arise with the follow-up to the Warnock report. I fully appreciate, however, that that will be some time in the future and that that would be a tremendous commitment for my right hon. and learned Friend to give the House today. But at least the Government have given some commitment and have encouraged motherhood within the family and within normal practices.

I ask the Secretary of State to consider the implications of deferred payments by charities. There is a definite risk that, perhaps six years later, a payment could be made to the surrogate mother. I welcome the offences created by the Bill, and the imprisonment terms and fines that it provides, which are realistic and which will act as a suitable deterrent. I should be interested to know when the legislation will be enacted, although I appreciate that it must go through further stages in the House and in another place.

Like the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), I believe that we should make provisions so that a child can find out the identity of his mother. Certainly all children at the age of 18 should be allowed to discover the identity of their natural mothers. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health will set out out the Government's thinking on that.

I am also a little worried about the woman who agrees, whether there is a contract or not, to carry a child and who, for nine months, is clearly pregnant. She may have other children at home, and I am worried about their reaction when she goes into hospital but then returns without a child. We must think carefully about how that will affect the other children. Will they be told exactly what happened? They may think that the child has died. They may have been extremely excited, looking forward to having a baby brother or sister. I am worried about the psychological problems that could be caused.

Today the Government have shown how much they care about children and childbirth. They have put the interests of the child above everything else. As I said earlier, it is a great privilege for anyone to have children. In my family, we are still waiting, but we shall be patient and carry on in the normal way. I welcome the Bill because it acts as a warning to prospective surrogate mothers that they must not succumb to the temptation of material and financial gain. I also welcome it because it will prohibit surrogacy agencies. I hope that American magazines will no longer advertise those agencies in Britain, which will prevent people from going to America and making such financial arrangements there.

This is a good Bill that will preserve family life, stabilise society and do away with this unnatural and unfortunate practice which has sickened so many decent-living and family-loving people. For that reason alone, I welcome the Bill.

5.12 pm

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Although I cannot follow the line of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels), I hope that he and his wife will have the joy of parenthood before very long. We are all delighted to hear that they intend to pursue normality. As the father of three wonderful children, I can testify to the joys of parenthood.

I, too, welcome the Bill, but I regard it as only a small first step in a most important area. Hon. Members have mentioned the position of childless couples, and rightly so. Athough the welfare of the child must come above all things—I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and most hon. Members who have spoken agree with that — the position of childless couples is also central to the issue. We must think carefully about childless couples who are anxious to have children by adoption or by other means, and I believe that the country has a sympathetic view of their problems.

Everyone who has had the privilege and honour of having a child must sympathise deeply with couples who are happy in their marriage and devoted to each other but who have not been blessed with the joy of children. Their position is central in the area to which the Bill relates. Will their needs be met more by individual surrogacy than hitherto? The answer is probably yes, but we must consider the morality of that.

I know from my long experience of and interest in children for adoption that there is an enormous shortage of such children, largely because of the consequences of the Abortion Act 1967. The present abortion rate—there have been more than 2 million since 1967—combined with more efficient birth control methods has meant that far fewer children are available for adoption. Therefore, not a council in the land, nor an agency dealing with the adoption of children, does not have an enormous waiting list of impressive couples who wish to adopt children but who are, for the most part, frustrated in that wish. The reduction in the number of children available, because of abortion and improved pregnancy prevention, may mean that couples will be tempted to seek surrogate mothers. However, I am glad to know that they will not be able to do so through agencies which wish to exploit them for gain.

The other day I read about an American agency which published somewhat grotesque advertising material for the services of surrogate mothers that it was offering at considerable expense to childless couples. It said, for example, that its women were better looking than many others, that they were tested for the quality of their health and tested for the quality of their brains. That is a terribly crude way of approaching the matter and is a great indignity to women. Few hon. Members would support such approaches, and I would certainly not be one of them.

The Bill will mean that we shall not have such advertising in Britain, and for that I am grateful. However, as I said in the first intervention in the debate, I am worried that some women will be tempted to exploit themselves as individuals. They will be tempted to offer themselves as surrogate mothers because they may need the money, or believe that they need money, for many things. The lady who acted as a surrogate mother for Baby Cotton said that she needed the £8,000 for a new three-piece suite, or something like that——

Mrs. McCurley: For an extension to her house.

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend is right. Everyone could find a use for some extra money that might come his or her way. I fear—I believe that the House will share my fear—that some women will be tempted to exploit themselves because they feel the need for new furniture, an extension to their homes, clothes or things for their existing children. Sadly, the Bill does not protect individual women against such self-exploitation, although it prevents their exploitation by an agency and, therefore, by society. It is a very doubtful moral proposition for a woman to be asked to carry a baby for financial gain. I am sorry that we have not heard the churches speaking out on that issue and giving a moral lead throughout the nation——

Mrs. McCurley: They have.

Mr. Greenway: I cannot accept what my hon. Friend says. They have not given the moral lead that would hit the headlines.

We must consider the delicate position of children born through individual surrogacy, which will be permitted by the Bill. Should they be told that they were born to surrogate mothers? What will be the effects of that knowledge? What will happen if they are not told about their background and the fact that their surrogate mothers may or may not have been paid for the job, to put it crudely?

Will those children be in the same position as adopted children who are rightly told about their adoption? There was a time when adopted children were not told about their background. There are many people in this country who were adopted from the cradle but who do not know that. Indeed, their adoptive parent may have forgotten that fact. What moral lesson should we learn from that which we can apply to a child born to a surrogate mother?

Who should be responsible for counselling couples seeking a child by surrogacy? Will it be the local council, the National Health Service local board, the local churches, a charity or the neighbours? Who will counsel the surrogate mothers? When the Bill is in Committee, it will need to be considered in some depth and the very important personal and moral points will need to be borne in mind.

I welcome the Government's leadership on this matter. However, if we do not bear in mind the personal and moral points the House may be guilty of producing a Bill that will rightly outlaw the hell and wickedness that exists in America—where women are exploited and handled in an undignified manner for gain—but at the same time forget that individual women are not covered, whether or not they are acting on their own behalf, in response to social or financial pressures or even in response to pressure from husbands who may see surrogacy as a way to make money. That whole area needs to be carefully considered. I hope that when my right hon. and learned Friend replies he will comment on the points that I have raised.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I apologise to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) for not having been present during their speeches. I was visiting a sewage works in my constituency in an attempt to ensure that the smells coming from the works will be more pleasant throughout the summer.

I join other hon. Members in wishing my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) and his wife every success in being blessed with a child. I wish gently to take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), who made one or two comments about the churches. I understand that my church —the Catholic church—the Council of Churches and the Church of Scotland have spoken out strongly against the whole concept of commercial surrogacy. The problem is that they have not received publicity. It is unfortunate that one or two members of the churches receive a great deal of publicity for the rather silly things they say——

Mr. Greenway: I accept what my hon. Friend says. I said that some churches have not spoken out strongly, but I accept that some have done so. They have not received the publicity that they should have received, so my hon. Friend has made a fair comment.

Mr. Amess: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments.

Those of us who are parents speak from a privileged position. We have been blessed and entrusted with the responsibility of parenthood, and with that the agony and ecstasy of bringing up children. We are unable completely to appreciate the anguish felt by many couples who cannot bear children. My support last year for the ten-minute rule Bill to outlaw surrogacy, introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), resulted in my learning at first hand of a number of distressing cases of couples unable to bear children. Their despair cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be over-estimated. Quite naturally, they are sometimes prepared to go to any length to have a child.

Although the House recognises that, it still has a responsibility and an obligation to uphold the sanctity of life and to outlaw the practice of surrogacy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), a former Prime Minister, once referred to the unacceptable face of capitalism. That phrase achieves its ultimate meaning in the buying and selling of a human being, which is a most degrading concept.

I am delighted that the Government, inspired and prompted by my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde, have introduced the Bill. It is crucial for the protection of family life. My concern for the family, and especially for children, begins from the moment a child is conceived. At that very moment of conception, a new individual is created. Hon. Members know that I strongly oppose all procedures that harm unborn children from the time of their creation. The welfare of the child at every stage of his or her development must be the first consideration. Therefore, it would be quite inconsistent not to oppose surrogate motherhood, which is a further erosion of family life with unknown emotional and psychological consequences for the child.

If commercial surrogacy were allowed, it is inevitable that we should create a class of woman who would be seen simply as breeding machines. It is doubtful that such women, attracted by the lure of money, would be aware of and able to cope with the inherent difficulties that stem from surrogacy. The results would be pitiful. The words of an Australian mother, who found herself unable to hand over the baby she bore for another woman, sum up the whole issue and that unnatural situation:

"It goes against every physical and emotional feeling. The only thing the stand-in mother can get out of it is money but no amount can compensate for what you have done."

It is impossible to consider childbearing in a detached and clinical fashion. While throughout the nine months of pregnancy the unborn child is linked to the mother in the most intimate way, he or she is a completely separate individual growing within the womb. The mother acts as a source of protection, providing nutrition for the child she is bearing. The mother's body adapts through hormonal changes to accommodate the new being that lies within her. It is entirely unnatural for a woman to suppress the maternal instincts that she no doubt feels.

When a child is born, he or she is not an anonymous being. The baby has been alive for nine months and has had those months of experience in the womb. The mother will have felt the baby moving and responding in various ways. The baby cannot be treated as a commodity, to be ordered and delivered. Nor should women be treated like manufacturers whose sole purpose is to come up with the goods.

The unpredictable human factor is at its highest in surrogacy, and no woman can know how she will react on being requested to hand over the child whom she has carried for nine months. Commercial surrogacy is repugnant in its view of human beings as objects that can be bought and sold.

I found totally unacceptable the Warnock recommendation that human embryos might be bought and sold under licence. I cannot differentiate between a human embryo and a newborn baby; they are both human beings at different stages of development. It would therefore be inconsistent if I did not condemn surrogacy, which reduces human beings to saleable commodities.

A distinction, however, must be made between surrogate motherhood and adoption. In the latter, a woman takes over the care of an existing child, a child born to his or her genetic mother. That is different from deliberately creating a child in a planned way which introduces unnecessary social confusion for the child. An adopted child is in no doubt of his genetic and social origins. He can clearly define his place in society.

A child produced to order by another woman is caught between the woman who carried him for nine months and who is his genetic mother, the father who is not married to, or is in no way involved with, the genetic mother, and the woman who will bring him up and whom he will address as "mother", a title which she has bought.

The present law leaves the father who provided the sperm without parental rights because the child is illegitimate. He could adopt the child and claim parental rights, but that would be illegal because of the fees paid to the agency and to the surrogate mother. For a child to enter the world amid a scene of emotional, social and legal chaos is completely wrong, and commercial surrogacy must be stopped to prevent that happening.

I am delighted to say that, by introducing the Bill, the Government are at long last following the flow of public opinion on this issue. There can be no doubt that the gut reaction of the public is against commercial surrogacy and the whole concept of surrogate motherhood.

Among the harshest critics of surrogacy is the National Association for the Childless. Brenda Halliday of that organisation has described surrogacy as "exploitation at its worst". If this idea of commercial surrogacy has travelled across the Atlantic, it can return whence it came.

While I and many others were surprised and disappointed at the Government's neutral stance on the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill, this legislation will serve to uphold the dignity of women and children. It goes to the heart of my overall belief that the interests and well-being of the child at every stage of development should come first and that women should not be degraded in any way.

5.35 pm

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): This has been an interesting wide-ranging debate, made all the more interesting by the intimate atmosphere, as it were, in which it has been conducted. Because few hon. Members have been in the Chamber, we have been able to listen closely to what has been said, and even, in some instances, to what hon. Members have been thinking, as exemplified by some of the spontaneous interruptions.

The contributions to the debate have covered the full spectrum of the subject. For example, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) welcomed the Bill, as I do, because of the nastiness—that is not too severe a word to use for the profit-making element of surrogacy—of the whole problem. However, we take the view that surrogacy should not necessarily be outlawed. We want time to consider, sensitively and slowly, all the implications.

At the other end of the scale, we had the speech of the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess), who is anti-abortion in every respect and is anxious that the protection of the law should be given to the embryo from day one, with surrogacy being completely outlawed. I hope that the Government will adopt a steady-as-she-goes attitude and will retain the central point of the Bill, which is to keep the legislation narrowly to the framework of outlawing commercial surrogacy, so giving us time to consider all the other problems that are involved.

Surrogacy is after all, only one part of the whole problem of infertility, and most hon. Members acknowledge that infertility is a real problem. If we say that surrogacy must be legislated against because it is wholly wrong, we shall inevitably cast some parents into a form of limbo from which they will not be able to benefit in any way, for example from any other form of infertility treatment.

We should pay attention, and give more funding, to the whole question of infertility. Simply to say that surrogacy is wrong and must be legislated against will not do. First, such legislation would not work and, secondly, even if it could be made to work, it would be undesirable. A better way to deal with the problem is to reduce the necessity, in the view of some people, to resort to surrogacy. I am glad, therefore, that the Bill is confined to the profit-making and commercial aspects of the problem.

As the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) pointed out descriptively, surrogacy has existed throughout history. For us now solemnly to think that we can stop it would be like trying unrealistically to turn the tide. Indeed, for us to attempt to do that might have some adverse effects. For example, it might send the practice underground, and that might result in more surrogate mothers and commissioning parents going elsewhere, perhaps across the Atlantic, to achieve their heart's wish. We would not want to do that.

I hope to be a member of the Standing Committee which will examine the Bill. That will be the occasion to discuss certain matters in detail. However, it is important for us now to cast a critical eye over some points which have occurred to hon. Members.

I firmly reject the notion of allowing profiteers to prosper. However, there is a necessity for some legal arrangement between a commissioning couple and a host mother. I cannot see any moral or legal problem about employing the services of a solicitor. I understand that there are agencies in the United States of a sort that we do not like which claim that they are merely tying up the legal ends. I do not believe that. I believe that they are involved for the money. If they are handling the legal part of the arrangement, that is the least that they can do for the money that they are making out of the arrangement.

When families are faced with problems the individuals concerned will consult a solicitor. When surrogacy is proposed, why cannot the commissioning couple and the host mother say to a solicitor, "We want to come to an arrangement between the three of us that will protect the rights of the couple, the rights of the host mother and the rights of the child?" Why cannot a legal agreement be drawn up that will have that effect? We use solicitors when a divorce is sought. When a woman is beaten up at home, she will go to a solicitor to obtain an injunction against her battering husband. She is not shunned by society and treated with disdain because she has put money into the hands of a solicitor by instructing him to obtain an injunction. Surely a legal contract could be drawn up to protect the rights of the commissioning couple and the host mother without causing the solicitor to commit a criminal offence under the Bill?

It is crucial that both the commissioning couple and the prospective host mother receive some counselling. If we were to outlaw surrogacy, we would make it impossible for any counselling to take place. The couple will have discussed the matter between themselves, and possibly with relatives, and they should have the opportunity to discuss the matter with expert counsellors so that they are sure that they are doing the right thing and that they know how to go about it.

More importantly, it is crucial that the host mother should have the opportunity to receive counselling. She, too, will have problems. It should not be said that she is merely in it for the money or that she is an exploited person. Many reasons lead a woman to take this course, some of which we may never know or understand. The host mother should have the opportunity through the local authority, a non-profit making body or a social work agency to receive proper counselling.

As I read the Bill, a solicitor who drew up a legal document to protect the commissioning couple and the host mother, or a person who counselled them, would be caught by its provisions. A doctor, for example, might be asked to give some medical advice to the host mother and he may receive a fee from a non-profit-making agency for doing so. Will he be caught by the Bill?

There are many loopholes which could be dangerous and I ask the Minister to let us know where we stand when he replies. If he agrees that there are some loopholes, we can try to close them and ensure that there is proper surrogacy prior to the Government introducing the wider Bill which they have promised, which will appear much later. I remain concerned about doctors and counsellors, for example, who will receive fees for their services.

It seems that in this instance we are moving away from the principle of trial by jury. This issue was raised on the "Agenda" page of The Guardian this morning. As I am not a lawyer, the point had not struck me, but I believe now that it is one worthy of consideration. The Bill provides a maximum of three months imprisonment or a fine of £2,000, which are penalties which do not enable the person accused to opt for trial by jury. I understand that there has to be the possibility of a sentence of imprisonment of six months before one can seek trial by jury.

Those who are accused of having committed an offence within the terms of the Bill might very well want trial by jury so that ordinary men and women can listen to their story, whether they are the individuals involved or those concerned indirectly. I am not suggesting that the maximum penalty of three months imprisonment should be increased, but we must consider the option of trial by jury if the accused wishes to have that sort of hearing.

I have expressed some reservations about the wording and intent of some parts of the Bill, but I reiterate that I am in favour of it. Bearing in mind the agreement that there appears to be on both sides of the House, I shall be surprised if there is a Division.

I am left wondering whether the Bill would have been produced if it had not been for the distasteful publicity which surrounded the Cotton case and the natural public reaction to it. Surrogacy has been taking place for a long time but it is only since 1982 or 1983 that it has become a known word to the ordinary public. Suddenly, and perhaps because of one unpleasant and distasteful case, at least in the United Kingdom, people have gone beserk, as it were, about it. If that case had not arisen, would the Government have introduced the Bill?

I look forward to reading the wider Bill that the Government intend to produce in due course that will incorporate many of the recommendations of the Warnock committee.

Surrogacy appears to be a necessity, or an option, for some infertile couples. It is crucial that commissioning couples and host mothers should be afforded some form of legality and should not be made to feel that they are outcasts of society. I was appalled when the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) said that surrogacy was a sick practice. If I had heard him say that as one of an infertile couple or as a host mother, I would have felt cast down. Surrogacy may not be a practice in which we all want to indulge, but it should be afforded some respect. If three people have thought about the matter deeply and have decided that that is the way in which they want to proceed because there is no option, they should not be rejected by society.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: The hon. Lady should have put my comment in the right context. I said that I considered surrogacy to be a sick practice when money was involved. When that happens, I find it repulsive. Surely the hon. Lady will agree that a financial transaction to secure the lease of a woman's womb is repugnant.

Ms. Richardson: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will look at his speech tomorrow to ascertain whether it reads in that way. I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's speech. He rightly referred to the profit-making angle. My impression was, however, that he thought that surrogacy was a distasteful practice. I want to ensure that, after the passage of this Bill, we treat surrogacy with sensitivity and give time not only to the Government, without pressurising them to draft the legislation properly, but to hon. Members so that all the implications are considered and so that we do not deal piecemeal with a subject of great concern to a large number of people.

5.50 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): At various times the Government have been praised for the speed with which they have brought forward the Bill—my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) praised us—and at other times criticised. A considerable number of points have been raised about the circumstances in which the Bill has been brought forward and about whether it has been wise to select this one narrow aspect of the huge combination of difficult ethical and moral issues that were addressed in the Warnock report. I am glad that, despite all the reservations about the legislation, every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate has revealed that he or she comes down on the side of the Bill and is likely to support it.

This is not a new issue, and the Government have not approached it with unnecessary or reckless speed. We have acted decisively and in a way that commands the support of the majority of the public, without prejudicing what the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) has rightly said needs to be a thorough and well-digested debate on many important and complex matters before an even larger Bill comes forward.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) took all prizes for biblical scholarship by reminding hon. Members in greater detail than most of us recall—although we are all familiar with the outline of the story—of the problems of Abraham and his family. This is not such a new issue as some hon. Members imply in suggesting that the Government brought this measure forward only in response to the newspaper publicity that had surrounded one, albeit important, case—that of Baby Cotton. In fact, some time ago, the Government expected that that issue, along with many other related issues, would cause Parliament and the public much trouble. For that reason, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State invited Lady Warnock and her colleagues to consider all those related issues.

We initiated the giving of evidence, the consideration of that evidence by the committee and the presentation of the report's conclusions for wider public debate. Those conclusions included conclusions on surrogacy. The members of the Warnock committee were drawn from a wide background and had a wide range of professional expertise, personal and religious beliefs and outlooks on life. They were unanimously against the practice of commercial surrogacy but were, by a majority, against surrogacy of all kinds. That has been the tenor of the debate this afternoon, and I believe it is likely to be the tenor of general public opinion. We were addressing ourselves to the issue when we set up the Warnock committee.

During the last Session of Parliament my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) produced a private Member's Bill seeking to make surrogacy illegal. My hon. Friend would have pressed that legislation on to the statute book but for a lack of parliamentary time. That is what happens to many private Members' Bills. I remember having conversations at that time with my hon. Friend, urging her to wait until we had the views of the Warnock committee and arguing against a Bill dealing with surrogacy alone in advance of other issues. We were talking before Lady Warnock's committee had even reported.

The Warnock committee reported and all its members favoured making commercial surrogacy illegal. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde would have introduced her Bill yet again and placed further pressures on the House this year if it had not been made clear that the Government were converted to her point of view and were, in the light of the Warnock report, about to take action.

About 90 per cent. of those who have given us their opinions so far are against commercial surrogacy—as this Bill is. As my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) pointed out, all the churches gave their opinions against commercial surrogacy. The Church of England, the Church of Scotland, the Free Church, the Methodists, the Roman Catholics, the Salvation Army and the Chief Rabbi have indicated that they agree with the Warnock conclusions against commercial surrogacy.

The Baby Cotton case was not a sudden, isolated incident which gave rise to rushed legislation. That case served to underline to the general public what was already becoming apparent to Ministers and to hon. Members—that something had to be done urgently about commercial surrogacy problems. As my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) reminded us, we are fairly certain that three other pregnancies have taken place as a result of commercial agency arrangements. In the next few months those children will be born. Obviously, the Bill will not affect those arrangements or taint them with criminality retrospectively.

It became even more important to act to ensure that a small, albeit thriving, industry did not develop, whereby agencies began to operate here, largely for Americans who wanted children, offering fees to mothers in this country to lease their wombs and by surrogacy provide a couple with a child.

The background to the legislation is not one of rush or of over-reaction to public issues, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) implied. A clear and consistent course of action by the Government has enabled us to identify at least this one narrow issue among all the important issues examined by Warnock. The time has come to invite the House to pass speedy legislation.

The debate has underlined the Government's judgment that this was the right action. There is rarely unanimity between both sides of the House about a Bill's basic aims. Every hon. Member has made it clear that he or she will support the Bill on Second Reading. The unanimity does not require any underlining by me. Whatever the angle at which one looks at the arrangements that commercial agencies might undertake in relation to surrogate motherhood, there are substantial dangers for all the parties involved and for society as a whole.

Hon. Members showed a slightly different emphasis in the particular party that they were seeking to protect. In some circumstances one can envisage any one of the parties being potentially a victim of the unwise decision to participate in a commercial arrangement of this kind. The surrogate mother may be exploited because of her financial needs or vulnerability and may be tempted to participate in an arrangement that she bitterly regrets. She may undoubtedly be a victim of the arrangement set up by the agency.

Some of the would-be parents may be victims. Some couples are desperate to have children. We all know of the heart-searching and the agony of some people who are unable to have children. As my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde said, sums of up to £20,000 are sought from people for surrogacy arrangements so that they can ensure that at least one of them has his own child by fathering the child by a surrogate mother.

Most importantly, we are all concerned about the children who could be the tragic victims of arrangements entered into and organised by agencies for purely commercial reasons. The children could be the victims of a battle between the two sets of parents about who will exercise parental rights, or the three parents could reject the child and say that they no longer wish to have it because something has gone wrong.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde said, the remainder of the family, including other children of the surrogate mother or the would-be parents if they had adopted other children, could be adversely affected by the possible consequences if a commercial arrangement goes wrong. For all those reasons, it became apparent during the debate that we had succeeded in defining at least one narrow part of the subject—whether we wish to see commercial agencies establish themselves and negotiate agreements offering fees to those who take part—and establishing unanimity that the criminal law was required to ensure that that did not happen.

Unanimity extends only to the general points. The Government were asked a number of detailed points about the Bill, and they will plainly be dealt with in Committee. I shall not deal with them all in depth now. I hope hon. Members will forgive me if I do not do justice to the points which have been raised. We will return to them in Committee.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West queried the provision contained in clause 3(2) which attaches absolute liability to the proprietor, editor or publisher of a newspaper or periodical which carries an advertisement offering surrogacy. He implied that it was somewhat harsh that it should be a criminal offence for the proprietor, editor and so on to produce a newspaper containing such an advertisement. We shall return to this point later if it is necessary, but that provision is essential to make the ban on newspaper advertising effective.

Newspapers and periodicals are used to the practice of hiring people to read their copy to ensure that they do not render themselves liable to legal action for what has appeared in the newspaper. If it were necessary to establish that the proprietor knowingly published the advertisement, it would be far too easy for him to say that no one had thought of the point, that it had been overlooked and that no one had read the advertisement with that point in mind.

Absolute liability will ensure that the newspapers take the precautions they usually do to protect themselves against libel and all the other risks they run. We knew what we were doing when we made publication an absolute offence. If the hon. Gentleman presses that amendment in Committee, he runs the risk of making that part of the Bill ineffective.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West asked whether the Bill prevented donations to charitable surrogacy agencies which would collect money but claim that they were doing so for non-commercial reasons—for some greater cause or to plough back into the agency's work. Subject to any further thoughts that I may have before we reach Committee, my answer is that the Bill would prohibit such payments. The terms of clause 2(5) are so wide that such payments are caught if they are made by the surrogate mother, the commissioning parent or someone connected with either of them. That is one of the purposes of clause 2(5).

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East asked what would happen if payments were deferred until some considerable period after the birth and after the rights over the child had been handed over. Subject to any further examination in Committee, we believe that the Bill deals with that point and prohibits such payments, because under clause 2(3) payments are prohibited "at any time". That would include deferred payments of the sort that my hon. Friend feared.

The hon. Member for Barking asked what would happen if there were a voluntary surrogacy arrangement among three parties who were not contemplating any commercial arrangement, and they had the services of a solicitor to give them legal advice about drawing up a contract, or the services of a professional person to give general counselling, and contemplated paying a fee for such advice. Any solicitor, professional person or anyone contemplating doing anything for a fee for the parties involved would have to study the Bill carefully before giving any such advice. The answer is to be found in clause 2(1)(a), (b) and (c). That part of the Bill defines what the illegal acts will be if surrogacy is negotiated commercially by anyone.

It is arguable that if someone is giving general advice and counselling for a modest fee, they would not be committing a criminal offence. The Bill prohibits negotiating a surrogacy arrangement or taking part in negotiations which have a surrogacy arrangement in view. It also prohibits bringing together information to enable someone to put couples in touch with one another.

If advice fell short of negotiating an agreement, it is possible that arrangements could be entered into between a couple who wished to commission a surrogate child and a professional person without falling foul of the Bill. The moment that the solicitor began to negotiate a surrogacy arrangement, he would be caught by the Bill.

I am sure that the subject of jury trial will be raised in Committee. It was raised by——

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister accept the view of the Warnock committee, that it should be put beyond doubt that surrogacy arrangements cannot be enforced in the courts, or does he believe that there is no doubt that they cannot be enforced in the courts? What is the Government's view about that?

Mr. Clarke: I was about to deal with the hon. Member's point. I agree that it is relevant. It is our view, on advice, that such contracts are not enforceable now. If anyone went to the courts in this country seeking to enforce a surrogacy contract—if someone brought an action to try to compel an unwilling surrogate mother to hand over the child or if the surrogate mother went to court to try to compel the would-be parents to pay the fee promised under the contract—it is confidently felt by most people, as the Warnock committee felt, that such a contract would be regarded as unenforceable by the courts and contrary to public policy. It might be helpful for that point to be put beyond doubt in statute at some stage, because, although that is believed to be the position, there is no point in sitting around waiting for a test case, with all the problems that would surround such a case for the parties involved.

[Mr. Clarke]

My right hon. Friend explained the policy behind the Bill. When producing the Bill, the Government set out to make it as narrow as possible to carry unanimity and to guarantee the speedy passage through the House which we think is essential. I do not, therefore, want to encourage amendments in Committee. I cannot be forthcoming about amendments at the moment. If, however, it turns out in Committee that there are narrow points that fall within the scope of the Bill, which command universal support, as the main policy has, and which are easily dealt with in drafting and other terms, the Government will consider them sympathetically to see whether we might have made the Bill too narrow and misjudged the mood of the House. If there is unanimity we might consider whether the Bill might be extended, but there will not be many such points.

The remainder of the debate related mostly to the wider issues of Warnock. A number of my hon. Friends asked why the Bill is so narrow and aimed only at commercial agencies and advertising. They asked why we had not taken the opportunity to go ahead, as they would wish, with making all surrogacy arrangements of any kind unenforceable. My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) felt most strongly about that matter. Indeed, the hon. Member for Oldham, West criticised the Government for acting so narrowly, for not having taken the opportunity to grapple with some of the wider issues in Warnock and for not having looked at surrogacy generally.

I agree entirely with the points made by all hon. Members, that there are very important questions for the House to resolve — for example, the legal status of children, how to sort out the problem of legitimacy and illegitimacy and the position of the child who wishes to know the exact circumstances of his birth. This issue has not been legally resolved. For example, what would happen if a child who had been adopted following a surrogacy arrangement sought to take advantage of the recently enacted legislation and tried to find out the full circumstances of his or her birth and the identity of the surrogate mother? These, and many other issues, were raised, but the hon. Members who raised them almost answered themselves because of the way in which they disagreed with one another.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and a number of my hon. Friends gave different opinions about the legislation they thought necessary in the case of unpaid surrogacy. The hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) postulated the state making payments to surrogate mothers. This was the furthest we went in one direction. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West put forward a very interesting proposition dealing with a point made by another of my hon. Friends: that one cannot stop purely private arrangements of the kind first started by Abraham, so far as history recalls, but that at least it should be possible to prohibit all procurement by agencies and prevent the negotiating and advertising of these arrangements by anybody. However, the debate showed how difficult it would be to resolve these issues.

It will not be possible to obtain unanimity. The House genuinely reflects the very wide range of opinion which is found to exist among all interested sections of the general public. Not only is it difficult to obtain unanimity, whatever decision the Government first suggest and the House eventually makes will require great care and precision in its drafting and formulation. Before a Bill can be produced for the House to contemplate, a great deal of work will be required. The drafting of so complex a Bill will be a substantial undertaking. However, I can assure the House and my right hon. Friend that the work is in hand and that our desire is for such a Bill to be brought before the House as soon as possible.

It would be folly to try to say when, because of the complexity of the subject and the pressures on the parliamentary timetable for a Bill which will be a fairly lengthy undertaking, given all the hon. Members who have spoken today, should they wish to take part. However, the Government hope to bring such a Bill before the House during the lifetime of this Parliament and to give all hon. Members the chance to deal with those issues.

I hope that the House will take the decision which my right hon. Friend invited it to do when he introduced the Bill, and to leave on one side, without minimising them, the strongly held views about other aspects of surrogacy and the position of children and to say that this narrow point is so important that there should be a speedy end to commercial agencies and a quick suppression of any more Baby Cotton cases. I hope that opinions can be left on one side when it comes to giving this Bill a reasonably speedy passage through the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East asked when this Bill will come into force. It will come into force immediately after royal assent. However, when it receives royal assent is in the hands of all hon. Members, in particular in the hands of those who are selected to be members of the Standing Committee. I hope that the Bill will receive an unopposed Second Reading and that it will be an omen for a reasonably quick passage of the Bill. I believe that the general public will welcome the fact that on this very important moral issue, which has given rise to serious public concern, the House of Commons and the Government are totally in step with them and that we have shown that we can act in order to stop something which, if left untouched, will run the risk of becoming a grave moral problem.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

EXEMPTION FROM CORPORAL PUNISHMENT NOT GROUND FOR SUSPENSION, ETC.

'A person shall not be debarred from receiving education in any circumstances (whether by refusing him admission to a school, suspending his attendance or otherwise) on the grounds that, if he were not so debarred in those circumstances, he would not be adequately amenable to discipline by reason of his being a pupil exempt from corporal punishment by members of the staff for the purposes of section 1 of this Act.'.—[Mr. Dunn.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: Government amendments Nos. 7 and 13.

No. 22, in page 4, line 17, at end insert—

'(1A) No headteacher of a school or responsible body as set out in subsection (1) above shall exercise any power he, or as the case may be it, may have to refuse a pupil admission to a school or suspend or expel a pupil from a school or from education provided in a school solely because the pupil is or may be exempt from corporal punishment.',

Government amendments Nos. 26, 29, 33, 39, 47 to 49, and 51.

6.15 pm

Mr. Dunn: I am delighted at long last to be at the Report stage of the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill. Rather like the organisers of "Miss World", I should like to deal with Government amendment No. 29, Opposition amendment No. 22, new clause 6 and all the other amendments on the Order Paper. During the recent short recess, the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and I have on many occasions thought about the Report stage. The Bill went through a very short and amicable Committee stage, with the help and support of all the parties represented on the Committee. It was a unique occasion of good will and harmony.

If I may deal initially with new clause 6 and the other amendments to which I have just referred, it was argued in Standing Committee that the Bill gave inadequate protection for an exempt pupil against unjust measures, including suspension and expulsion from school. The fear of members on both sides of the Standing Committee was that schools would seek to circumvent the effect of the legislation, either by refusing admission to a pupil whose parents were known to favour exemption or by suspending or expelling a pupil simply because he had exempted status. It is fair to say that no member of the Standing Committee claimed that exempt pupils should be immune from debarment from school, only that exempt pupils might be the target of unfair practice designed to thwart the wishes of parents. I believe the House will accept that that is a fair though short interpretation of the views of members on both sides of the Committee.

During the proceedings in Standing Committee I was able to point to our proposal that questions about corporal punishment should be put to parents after a child had been accepted by a school. This, together with provisions to allow parents to change their mind, would in virtually all cases rule out the possibility of a child being kept off a school roll because of parental views about exemption. Again it is true to say that, despite my assurances, some members of the Standing Committee had lingering doubts about this, and more particularly about the possibility of debarments affecting pupils on the roll when the school became aware of the wish of parents to exempt pupils. In order to remove those doubts and to make it plain on the face of the Bill that it would be intolerable to give a new right to parents on the one hand and then to allow a school effectively to withdraw it on the other, these amendments have been placed on the Order Paper.

In one sense the amendments go a little further than amendment No. 22, which was tabled before the recess by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. I think that he will accept that his amendment might be effective against a school that said, "We cannot accept your child any longer as a pupil because you have exempted him from corporal punishment." It might be less effective against a school that said, "Your son has been disturbing the good order of the school. We cannot apply effective discipline because you have exempted him from corporal punishment so we are debarring him from school." Such an argument — where actual misbehaviour and the principle of corporal punishment are entangled—is undermined by the Government amendments, and I hope that hon. Members on both sides will accept that these amendments support the principle that parents should not be unduly penalised for their philosophical convictions as they might be if schools resorted to debarments as a way of escaping the Bill's provisions.

Amendment No. 22 is also in the name of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. I think that he will accept my interpretation of his amendment, which is that its intention is to ensure that pupils whose education is publicly funded and whose parents claimed or might claim an exemption from corporal punishment could not be debarred solely on account of that claim. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have considerable sympathy for the principle behind the amendment, so much so that a Government amendment has been put forward to reinforce it.

I certainly would not want to see a pupil debarred simply and solely because a parent had exempted him or intended to exempt him from corporal punishment. In fact, the Government amendment attempts to go a little further than amendment No. 22 ensuring that pupils are not debarred directly or indirectly because their parents exercise their rights under the Bill.

Government amendment No. 29 is a minor, technical amendment which allows the whole of the Bill as it affects England and Wales to be cited as one with the Education Act 1944 and subsequent relevant legislation.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): We welcome the fact that, in a sense, the Government have met us on this point. However, we regret that they did not meet us on more points.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New clause 3

PUNISHMENT POLICY

'Before the coming into force of this Act all local education authorities in England and Wales shall discuss their policy on school punishments, and issue local guidelines to all governing bodies in their area, who shall then arrange for their schools to discuss the guidelines, and prepare a report for the governors, who shall then decide the punishment policy for that school.'.—[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 1, in clause 1, page 1, line 6 leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'(1) Where in any civil or criminal proceedings it is shown that corporal punishment has been given to a pupil by or on the authority of a member of the staff, giving the punishment cannot be justified on the ground that it was done in pursuance of a right exercisable by the member of the staff by virtue of his position as such.'.

No. 17, in page 3, line 20, leave out clause 2.

No. 21, in clause 3, page 4, line 8, leave out subsections (1) to (4).

No 27, in page 4, line 37, leave out, 'This and'.

No. 30, in clause 4, page 5, line 7, leave out from '48A' to end of line 18 and insert—

'(1) Where in any civil or crifninal proceedings it is shown that corporal punishment has been given to a pupil by or on the authority of a member of the staff, the giving of the punishment cannot be justified on the ground that it was done in pursuance of a right exercisable by a member of staff by virtue of his position as such.'.

No. 42, in page 7, leave out lines 1 to 38.

No. 43, in page 7, leave out from line 39 to line 11 on page 8.

Mr. Bennett: I hope that new clause 3 will be acceptable to the House.

I should like to begin by talking to amendments Nos. 1, 17, 21, 27, 30, 42 and 43. Taken together, the amendments set out the view of the Opposition, which is that we should have an abolition Bill rather than this half measure that the Government are putting forward. Although we put it on the record clearly on Second Reading and in Committee that we would have preferred an abolition Bill, it is worth repeating, to make it absolutely clear, that on a matter of principle we think that corporal punishment should be abolished in all our schools. It is now perfectly possible for the Government to do so.

Corporal punishment is a barbaric practice. When so many people go out of their way to express their horror at the violence in our society, and argue that they want to do all that they can to reduce violence, it is amazing that they still believe that by bringing violence into the classroom we can give people good examples that will not lead to violence later. The more one encourages the use of violence in education, the more likely one is to create a society in which people think that violence can, on occasions, be justified.

Therefore, I would have much preferred the Government to come forward with a clear statement of principle that they believe that, in education, corporal punishment in any of its forms is totally unnecessary. Going round the country, I find it attractive that the vast majority of good schools have managed to phase out corporal punishment altogether. I have been amazed to find that, even when I have gone to areas where authorities have abolished corporal punishment and some teachers had reservations when abolition was announced, in almost every instance the teachers have come to accept that. If one looks at the amount of school violence, one sees that there seems to be a strong correlation between the decline of violence among pupils and the abolition of corporal punishment. Therefore, I hoped very much that, even at this late stage, the Government would turn this Bill into a straightforward abolition Bill.

If the Government will not go along the lines of abolition as a matter of principle, I argue strongly that they should look at the problems of the costs involved in the legislation and the creation of a substantial bureaucracy, which will be resented by many schools. Many schools will probably interpret the Bill as an abolition Bill. When one goes round schools, one finds that almost all are under pressure from cuts of one sort or another. Many local authorities seem to feel that rather than cut teaching staff, it is easier to cut back on the hours of the school secretary or people involved in administration. Sometimes those cuts are ill-advised because it means that teachers and heads end up doing more administration and less teaching and doing what they are most skilled at. It is a false economy to cut in that area. My impression is that most schools are hard pressed for secretarial assistance. Even in a primary school, having to send all the letters——

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why the Labour party, when in government, did not abolish corporal punishment in schools? The European convention on human rights has been with us for a long time. Furthermore, will he explain why the Labour chairman of Mid-Glamorgan education committee described the campaigners for abolition as "just not living in the real world."
That quotation comes from The Times of 10 January 1984.

Mr. Bennett: I am well aware of the views of the chairman of Mid-Glamorgan local authority. I see that the Government Whip, the hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), is saying that he is a very good man.

Questions of local democracy are involved. There are problems in persuading all those who support the Labour party that the views that I am expressing are the right ones. However, I believe that if people stop and look at all the evidence, on the whole they come round to the abolition point of view. I have made it clear to the House that when I was a teacher, in one of the first schools that I worked in I was involved in using corporal punishment. I very much regret it. It was a measure of some of the problems that we used to face in schools. If one is faced with a class of 42 pupils or more, treating each one as an individual and being prepared to look at the problems of each individual is extremely difficult. It is also difficult if the school structure is not good. However, if class sizes are made much smaller and we work at creating an atmosphere of discipline in the school, which is good and supportive of new teachers who are in their probationary period, it is perfectly possible to run a good school without resort to corporal punishment.

Mr. Cash rose——

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle) rose——

Mr. Bennett: I am not giving way.

In Europe, there has never been any question of corporal punishment in many schools, and no one has suggested that there is a need for it. I argue strongly that there is a good case for us being able to abolish it. With regard to what the Labour Government did or did not do, there is a whole series of areas in which I should like to see education advance and in which I regret that more progress was not made during that period.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Based on experience in Committee, does my hon. Friend agree that the Government's position on corporal punishment has been so eroded by the nonsense of the Bill that abolition is now inevitably on the way and that the Government's last defensive stand is clearly just a gesture? Does my hon. Friend agree that both sides of the House, the entire educational world and most of the electorate realise that the major step has been taken and that the principle that we espouse is bound to win in the end?

Mr. Bennett: Yes, I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

If the Government will not go for abolition as a matter of principle, they should consider the costs involved in the scheme and the extra burden on school administration. As the Minister knows, most school secretaries are under considerable pressure. Due to cuts in supplies of books and other materials there is increasing pressure to have such materials duplicated or photocopied in the school, which places an increasing burden on secretaries and administration. There is also an increasing demand for statistical information, for which Parliament is sometimes to blame.

The combination of cuts and extra duties has placed ever-increasing burdens on school administration in recent years and the Government's scheme will exacerbate the situation. Letters will have to be sent to parents to ask for their views. A second set of letters will then have to be sent out and the register kept up to date. Moreover, it is important that all those tasks should be accurately carried out. In the past four weeks I have visited about 15 schools. In every case, whether or not the school already does without corporal punishment, the head took the view that the procedure in the Bill was unworkable and that the school would regard it as an abolition measure rather than try to administer such a scheme. I appreciate that it will be necessary to persuade the school governors, but that is the clear view of the head teachers.

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the cost of the system proposed in the Bill. Is he aware that, according to a report in Teacher last year, Leeds city council estimated that alternatives to corporal punishment would cost it about £3 million and require the appointment of about 280 extra teachers?

Mr. Bennett: The hon. Gentleman's figures are interesting, but he should consider what is obtained as a result. Whether caning children persuades them to be helpful, conforming pupils who will benefit from their education is quite another matter. I accept that setting up special units may be quite expensive, but they may also provide much better value for money. I am worried, however, that too much emphasis is being placed on corporal punishment and too little on school discipline in general.

Mr. Cash: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the withdrawal units—often described as sanctuaries or sin bins—are an increasingly popular means of dealing with disruptive pupils and that in 1977 there were 239 such units in England with accommodation for 3,900 pupils? As the hon. Gentleman knows, the cost of such units is considerable. The units visited by Her Majesty's inspectorate dealt with 1,890 pupils at a cost of 235 full-time and 86 part-time teachers. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will comment on that.

Mr. Bennett: Certainly some of the so-called sin bins are very expensive and some, I believe, are unnecessary.

That brings me nicely on to new clause 3. It is important to abolish corporal punishment, but it is even more important to have a useful debate on the whole subject of discipline. In that sense, I regret that the Government have introduced this Bill rather than a far more comprehensive measure on school discipline as a whole. I believe that far more attention should be devoted to that aspect. I hope that when local authorities and school governors consider this measure they will not spend all their time arguing about whether to have corporal punishment in their schools but will spend far more time discussing the code of discipline to be used in their schools.

I hope that the role of parents will also be considered in depth. Too often, schools expect parents to take the lead in maintaining discipline while parents expect the school to do so, when what is needed is co-operation. Neither should attempt to shrug off the responsibility on to the other. Problems of discipline and behaviour should be discussed with parents at an early stage to secure co-operation between the parents and the school and, if possible, the pupil.

The Bill should provide an opportunity for all local authorities to review the whole question of the form of discipline acceptable in their schools. There should be full discussion in the schools as to the sanctions required. The local authority or the school governors will then make the policy decision.

The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was worried about the cost of the so-called sin bins. In a sense, the extent to which local authorities use them, sometimes more than necessary, worries me less than the practice of some authorities in allowing governors to suspend pupils and to do very little about them thereafter. I referred in Committee to a child in my constituency who was suspended for a long period following incidents at school and in my view was not receiving any proper education during that period. Far too often pupils in their third or fourth year of secondary school are suspended for long periods during which they receive extremely inadequate education.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman said that this subject led him on nicely to new clause 3. Perhaps I may refer to the actual wording of the new clause rather than to the hon. Gentleman's comments. It states:

> "Before the coming into force of this Act all local education authorities in England and Wales shall discuss their policy on school punishments, and issue local guidelines to all governing bodies in their area, who shall then arrange for their schools to discuss the guidelines, and prepare a report for the governors, who shall then decide the punishment policy for that school."

Nothing whatever is said about the criteria to be used in the guidelines, an omission which seems to me so fundamental as to make the new clause utterly meaningless. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will inform us of the criteria that he believes should be applied.

The hon. Gentleman said that he believed that corporal punishment should be abolished altogether, but I suggest——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going into detailed arguments that he might raise if called to speak in the debate.

Mr. Bennett: I gave way to the hon. Member for Stafford somewhat generously, in the hope that if he dealt with some of the points in an intervention he would not wish to make a speech.

The Opposition believe in local democracy. We believe that, within some guidelines, local authorities should make up their own minds. We firmly believe that corporal punishment should be abolished, but we want local authorities to be allowed to make up their own minds.

Some local authorities have set up special units or sin bins. That is a matter for the local authorities. It is most important that each local authority and governing body should debate not just the merits and demerits of corporal punishment but the wider issues. The aim of the new clause is to suggest that there should be a thorough-going review of the punishment system and, in particular, of the whole issue of suspension—the circumstances in which suspension is resorted to, what the local authority does once a pupil has been suspended and what attempts are made to ensure that a youngster suspended from school is given a proper education.

The local authority should also consider the question of transferring pupils to special schools for the maladjusted. There is evidence that some children are pushed in that direction simply because a particular school finds them difficult to handle. The House spent much time debating the Education Act 1981, which dealt with special education. We all supported the principle of trying to integrate pupils with special educational needs into the mainstream schools. It is not good practice to exclude children from schools because of discipline problems, and we should try to create a system in which mainstream schools are given support so that they can continue to educate such children themselves.

I have talked to a teacher working in a withdrawal unit to which pupils are sent because they have been suspended. His brief was clear. It was to try to create an atmosphere in which children could be returned to mainstream schools as soon as possible. In practice, children at that unit do not return promptly to mainstream schools because they enjoy the education offered in the unit so much that they want to stay there. Why cannot similar conditions be created in mainstream schools, so that the youngster is happy to be taught in his own school rather than in a withdrawal unit?

There is evidence that some heads, especially in large comprehensive schools, run what are in fact withdrawal units within the school. That is another matter that the local authority should discuss. There should be a thorough-going review by all local authorities of the question of the proper policy, within that local authority, on discipline in schools. Such a review would be as important, in a sense, as this legislation—certainly in its present form.

Who has control over the final decision—the local authority or the school governors? It was disappointing to see that amendment No. 18 does not appear on the selection list, although I understand the reasons why it does not. I hope that it will be in order for me to deal briefly with the questions raised in that amendment, as they are also relevant to new clause 3.

The question is whether the Bill is neutral in terms of the relationship between the local authority and the school governors, whether it is rather more positive and removes from the local authority power to make a decision about corporal punishment and to make that decision stick, or whether it confers a decision-making power on the governors. The Minister insisted in Committee that the Bill is neutral and that it is not his intention to change the relationship between the local authority and the school governors. However, I have here a letter from Peter Wallington of the university of Lancaster's department of law, who suggests that the Bill is not neutral. I also have a letter from Stephen Sedley, QC, who makes a similar point.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bennett: Clause 3(1) of the Bill places a special duty on the governing body. The argument in the two letters is that if the Bill gives the governing body a special duty, it is hard for the Minister to argue that it is neutral. There would be a strong presumption in the courts that if the Bill conferred a duty on the governing body—what the Bill refers to as the "responsible body"—that body would be able to exercise that duty. The Minister says, however, that the local authority has overriding powers. I hope that he will make his position clear. That may be a point to which the House of Lords will wish to give further consideration.

My impression is that the clause is not neutral and that it transfers the powers from the local authority to the governing body. That would be unfortunate because the strength of many governing bodies is the fact that the members work as a team. Within most of them there is very little sense of a political divide, and on the whole they work for the good of the school rather than being directed by political considerations or any other policy. It would not be good for the governing bodies to find themselves divided by arguments about corporal punishment. They should act on a basis of consensus.

Also, if it turned out that local authorities did not have power to abolish corporal punishment, some authorities might be tempted to pack the governing bodies. The Minister would not want that to happen. I hope that he will make it clear that it will still be possible for a local authority to decide whether it wants corporal punishment and that if a local authority decides that it does not want corporal punishment, the governors will not be able to overturn that decision.

It is sad that we are not discussing an abolition Bill. I would very much welcome Government acceptance of amendments Nos. 1, 17, 21, 27, 30, 42 and 43, which would turn the Bill into an abolition Bill, but I would be very much surprised by Government acceptance of those amendments. However, I hope that the Minister will make it clear that he wants all local authorities, governing bodies and teachers to review discipline in their schools and to consider what is needed, and will also make it clear that he will take account of the complicated administration necessitated by the Bill and will consider the question of abolition. I hope that he will confirm that this is indeed a neutral Bill, in spite of the fact that we have had much legal advice that it is far from neutral and that it alters the relationship between the local authorities and the governing bodies.

Mr. Dunn: I congratulate the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on his remarks, to which I have listened with interest although I have heard them on a number of occasions in Standing Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) made a point about the chairman of the mid-Glamorgan education authority. In reply, the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish talked about local decision-making and local democracy. I understand his point, but the question of local democracy and decision-making can be used to make a case for precisely the policy that the hon. Gentleman fears — the belief that governing bodies should have some rights of veto or self-determination if they wish to apply corporal punishment in their schools even though the local education authority may be politically, philosophically or morally opposed to it.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the increase in bureaucracy. I listened with interest to what he said. I cannot share his vision of the future—many extra hours of work being imposed on school clerical staff — although I accept that there will be some extra work. However, a tremendous amount of extra work will fall on school clerical staff and teaching staff if there is an increase in the number of expulsions and suspensions. Many governing bodies discuss expulsions and suspensions. Reports are asked for, and they are often submitted to the local education authority. That process involves typing, checking, reformulation, copying and postage, all of which involve extra expenditure and work. I therefore had double vision when listening to the hon. Gentleman's speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford mentioned the increase in the number of withdrawal units or sin bins, as they are known more euphemistically. I regret the number of such establishments. Indeed, I regret crime and sin, but they exist. I therefore accept the need in certain circumstances for units to which disruptive children may be withdrawn for their own good and that of their fellows.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister admit that the growth in their numbers has occurred irrespective of whether the local authority has a policy of allowing corporal punishment, and that it has often grown where there is still far too much corporal punishment?

Mr. Dunn: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's first point but not with his second. Nevertheless, I regret the increase in the number of sin bins for the reasons that I have given.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned discussion and the constant review of policy on discipline, the problems and incidence of misbehaviour, and how a school, communities, parents and teachers react to its growth. All local education authorities, teachers, governors, and parents should be anxious about the growth of misbehaviour and misdemeanour and review constantly their attitude to and policies for meeting those problems. That happens in many local authorities, irrespective of their political persuasion.

I shall urge the House to resist new clause 3 because there is no necessity for local authorities to go to the lengths suggested by it. The best approach must be for education authorities to leave these matters to schools. Disciplinary sanctions are best handled at school level because much depends on how a school operates and its ethos. Local authorities are often not well placed to lay down guidelines.

Schools will need time to discuss disciplinary issues before an exemptions scheme comes into force. Discussions might well extend beyond the narrow issue of corporal punishment, and I therefore imagine that the debate which the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish wants will occur in many local education authorities. There is no need to stipulate precisely how those discussions should be organised. The initiative can and ought to come from schools.

I am surprised by new clause 3 as it seems to leave punishment issues to governing bodies in the last resort. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish has sought assurances that the Bill is not intended to prevent local education authorities from banning corporal punishment, yet new clause 3 seems to give the last word to governing bodies.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I accept that criticism, but I should think that the Minister is aware that, if amendment No. 18 had been selected, we should have been able to make our stance clear. I referred to that amendment. The new clause would have been better worded if it was clearly neutral, but it is a little unfair for the Minister to chide me for that when he has not managed, so far, to answer our criticism that his Bill is not neutral.

Mr. Dunn: I shall deal with that matter after considering the amendments in the group.

Mr. Cash: Is my hon. Friend aware that the same professor of law at the University of Lancaster has produced another report, which has everything to do with the miners' dispute? Perhaps my hon. Friend would be good enough to give his view on that?

Mr. Dunn: The House is grateful to my hon. Friend for that information. My reaction is one of interest. If there are fears about the intentions behind the Bill, there is an answer which I am sure will settle them.

The amendments in the group are intended to abolish corporal punishment. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish has returned to this theme often. I am not surprised by the incidence and type of the amendments. Opposition Members have tried steadfastly to turn the Bill into one which abolishes corporal punishment. On behalf of the Government, I have resisted such attempts, and do so again now. It has been argued that schools' use of reasonable and moderate corporal punishment is so wrong and so utterly inappropriate that the law should ban it. I disagree, as do many thousands of teachers and parents.

Whatever place we accord to this form of punishment in the disciplinary regime of a school — we all have views about that — I cannot accept that, by its very nature, it is a sanction that ought to be banned by law. We are discussing reasonable and moderate corporal punishment. Opponents of corporal punishment use loaded guilt-inducing words such as beatings, floggings and thrashings. They use the language of extremes. The point at issue is reasonable and moderate measures to impose discipline and to confront unruly or bullying behaviour.

Other people take a more pragmatic approach. They argue about the effectiveness of corporal punishment and say that it is so ineffective that the law should be invoked to prohibit its use. Thousands of teachers and parents— those close to the daily problems — take an opposite view about its efficiency. They believe that it has a useful function. I am ready to leave judgment about that to schools and parents and am not prepared to go along with the view that we should enforce abolition through legislation, simply because some believe that so many teachers and parents are wrong.

It has been argued that, although parents might favour reasonable and moderate corporal punishment for other children, they oppose it for their own, I disagree and, apparently, so do many parents. Indeed, on the very day on which the Standing Committee has its final meeting, The Times published the results of a MORI poll. Leaving aside the "Don't knows", some 63 per cent. of parents interviewed favoured the use of corporal punishment in schools. Perhaps even more significantly, a slightly higher proportion—65 per cent.—said that they would give schools permission to use corporal punishment on their children. It must be disconcerting to Opposition Members to see from the poll that among Labour and alliance supporters, some 60 per cent. of parents favour the use of corporal punishment in schools.

The Government are not prepared to ignore figures such as those. That poll helped to demonstrate the real point of the Bill—that many parents and teachers wish to retain corporal punishment, and in our view, when parents and school agree about its use on a particular pupil, we should not intervene with an enforced ban.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): My right hon. Friend rightly reports on the market research and on the fact that not for the first time the Opposition are out of touch with the electorate. A most persuasive factor is presumably the number of countries which still adhere to corporal punishment, such as Australia, New Zealand and Canada and the Commonwealth. Those countries which have banned it—for example, France—have found that the alternatives are so inadequate that they have resorted to other functions. France has had to ensure that family allowance is withdrawn because it has been unable to find enough penalties.

Mr. Dunn: From time to time it has been suggested that such a practice would occur here. I am not convinced that such a move would necessarily have the objective which some people might claim.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the Minister make it absolutely clear that although the power to withdraw family allowance technically exists in France, it is used hardly at all and that that is an unfair smear?

Mr. Dunn: It is a perfectly legitimate view to advance. All hon. Members have the right to express their opinions. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) has advanced a view which is not unfamiliar to those of us who served in Committee. However, I understand the point made by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish that the scheme as applied in France has not achieved the heights that were promised or expected.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish referred to the Bill's neutrality. I gave him an undertaking in Committee and he has seen copies of correspondence that I have sent to Mr. Peter Newell of the Children's Legal Centre. I wrote to Mr. Newell on 4 April and sent copies to the hon. Gentleman and to my hon. Friends who expressed an interest in the matter. On that occasion I pointed out that the Bill is broadly neutral. That is my reading of it and that is the advice that I have been given.

At present, school articles of government are the means by which responsibility for the conduct of a school—and that includes discipline and corporal punishment—is assigned. These articles of government vary between authorities and sometimes between schools within an authority, but usually they assign ultimate responsibility for discipline to school governing bodies, albeit often in imprecise terms. Some articles of government offer local education authorities general override powers—they are drawn up so as to give the local education authority the power to override the decisions of the governing body. Some local education authorities have used such provisions to impose an authority-wide ban on corporal punishment. Some others have achieved the same end by using their position as employers. Either through negotiations with teachers' unions or by recourse to general provisions within teachers' contracts of employment, the local education authorities have reached a position where the teachers are left in no doubt that as employees they are not expected to use and apply corporal punishment.

That is the background against which this matter should be considered. It is a grey area of overlapping and sometimes conflicting responsiblities and powers. I accept that the present position is unsatisfactory and that Parliament should settle the respective powers of head teachers, governing bodies and local education authorities in relation to school discipline, but I am opposed to using this Bill to clarify the position.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: We would like the position clarified, but we are not arguing that this Bill ought to be the vehicle for clarifying the responsibility between governors and local authorities. We are suggesting that clause 3 positively says that in future the responsible body will be the governing body. That is our worry.

Mr. Dunn: I should like to continue and perhaps I shall calm the hon. Gentleman's jangled nerves. He must know, as I do, that the partnership between the local education authority and schools is complex. I must say in all honesty that if the Government had to make a choice between giving control of corporal punishment to local education authorities or to schools, they would opt for the latter. That would be in line with the Government's reasoned case for a new legislative framework for schools as set out in the recent White Paper "Better Schools".

It is important not to look at corporal punishment in isolation. This issue is related to discipline and that in turn is related to the conduct of schools. Indeed, the whole relationship between heads, school governing bodies and local education authorities on a wide variety of topics should be considered together.

As the House knows, the White Paper envisages a new approach—a rational approach in which all aspects are considered alongside each other. It foreshadows legislative proposals to bring clarity out of this grey area, and that is the context in which changes should be discussed.

I know that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish is greatly concerned that without an amendment those local education authorities which have abolished corporal punishment will be forced by the Bill to abandon that policy. I can assure him that such is not the Bill's intention, or my reading of it as it stands. It has been our intention that the Bill should be neutral on this question. But we need to distinguish between decisions about the keeping of registers — on which clause 2(2) has something to say — and decisions about the use of corporal punishment. The point is that clause 2 has to place on some party the responsibility for deciding whether a register is to be maintained, and, if it so decides, to ensure its proper maintenance. Where a local education authority has taken a prior decision to abolish corporal punishment and has a legal right to do so, a decision by the governing body to keep a register will have no practical effect. In the light of the information that I have given, I hope that the new clause and amendments will not be pressed to a Division.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I did not expect that I would persuade the Government to go along with an abolition measure. Therefore, I shall not press further amendment No. 1 and the others which would have turned the measure into an abolition Bill. However, I hope that in the other place some of their Lordships will return to the arguments in principle and to the impracticalities of the Bill.

As to new clause 3, I believe that most local authorities will have the debate for which I am calling. I am still concerned about the Minister's explanation of whether the power lies with the local authority or the governing body. I remain unconvinced, and am worried that the Minister said that if the Government had to choose they would put the responsibility with the governors, but that they were not choosing now. The Bill suggests that the Government are coming down on the side of the governors. I hope that we are wrong about that, and that local authorities and governing bodies will not be involved in litigation on the matter. It would not be to their advantage. I hope that they will accept the Minister's word that he intends to leave the position as it is, and that if a local authority chooses to abolish corporal punishment, it can do so. The Minister seemed to hint that the governors would be entitled to keep a register, and the local authority would be entitled to instruct all the teachers whom it employed not to administer corporal punishment. That would be farcical.

In the hope that the Minister is right and that what he says, rather than our interpretation of the words, is correct, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

PUNISHMENT BOOK

Regulations made under section 2 of this Act and section 48B of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 shall provide that in schools where a register is maintained for the purposes of the administration of corporal punishment, a punishment book shall be kept in which shall be recorded all incidents of corporal punishment and all other punishments administered by the school to be equivalent to corporal punishment, to those pupils not on the register.'.—[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 52, in schedule page 10, line 10, at end insert

'Maintenance of punishment book to record incidents of corporal punishment etc.'.

Mr. Bennett: New clause 4 is an attempt to probe the Government about their intentions over the use of punishment books in schools when the regulations come into force. At present schools where corporal punishment is practised have a statutory duty to ensure that all acts of corporal punishment are recorded in the punishment book. That seems to be a sensible practice. In that way the governors can consider how frequently corporal punishment is administered. It records which punishments are given so that the governors can discuss the wider issues of the ethos of the school. The book provides an opportunity for an individual teacher to record that a punishment has taken place in case there should be a future court action. It also enables one to examine the punishment record of an individual pupil and to weigh up whether the school is the appropriate place for him and whether he is being appropriately dealt with. A head who sees the name of a pupil frequently entered in the punishment book must consider carefully whether the school is dealing with that pupil correctly. The punishment book serves a useful function in informing governors and in safeguarding teachers' and pupils' rights.

Will the Minister tell us how he envisages the punishment book developing under the dual system of punishment which is to operate in schools under this legislation? Some children will remain subject to corporal punishment because of their parents' agreement to it, and other pupils will not be subject to it because of their parents' objections to it. It would be completely unreasonable and unfair if only one set of names were entered in the punishment book for the same offence. It would be logical, where a school retains corporal punishment but does not use it on particular pupils, if two pupils committed a similar offence for which their names would be entered in a punishment book had they been subject to corporal punishment, that their names should be entered in the book with the alternative punishment recorded.

I would have thought that the Government could accept this amendment. The Minister may be able to convince us that it is unnecessary. However, I hope that the practice of recording serious offences will continue. I hope that schools will not administer corporal punishment if the offence is not serious. That way over a period of time governing bodies can consider the style and ethos of punishments in the school. There will also be safeguards for the teaching staff, and the opportunity for heads and senior teachers, especially in secondary schools, to review the way in which the school is dealing with a particular pupil and to decide whether the punishments being meted out are leading to a change in the pupil's behaviour or reinforcing his misbehaviour undesirably. I hope that the Minister will look with sympathy at an amendment along these lines or introduce a Government amendment in the other place.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I have always contended that this is a bad, unworkable Bill, which is why I have been unable to get worked up about opposing it. New clause 4 is a good idea. It is desirable to have as much information about school discipline and punishment as possible. The Department of Education and Science does not know the number or racial composition of children who are suspended from schools. I know that because I asked a question and was told so. I do not know how the Department can formulate a policy from a position of complete ignorance, but it has.

It is not the end of the story for parents to opt into corporal punishment because they may approve in theory but change their minds when they find that their child's school uses the cane often or harshly. Parents must have information before they make the choice. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) wants incidents of discipline that are considered to be so serious as to merit corporal punishment to be recorded. He wishes to ensure, where corporal punishment is not administered because a child is exempt from it, that where a caned child's name appears frequently in the book, he will not be branded a trouble-maker if he is not doing anything worse than a child who is not caned. The amendment therefore relates to equality.

Since I have known the Minister, and certainly during the passage of the Bill, his most uplifting remark was during the last group of amendments when he said that there was no need to stipulate precisely how these things are done. That should be the working title of this Bill—"There is no need to stipulate precisely how these things are done." I hope that when the Bill goes to another place and when, in future, educationists read our discussions, people will bear in mind that new clause 4 is a good idea. Its provisions should be carried out in practice. Even if it is not enshrined in law, the keeping of a register and the amassing of proper concrete information will always be helpful to education.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): On consideration of the amendment I have come to the conclusion that it is bad and that we would be wrong to accept it. The part of the new clause that leads me to that decision states that in a punishment book shall be recorded.

"all other punishments administered by the school to be equivalent to corporal punishment, to those pupils not on the register."

It is hard enough to define corporal punishment. In reading the responses to the large number of letters that I received from headmasters in my constituency—I received more than 40 about the Bill—I conclude that for all its faults the Bill will be welcomed.

However, I wish to draw attention to the problem of defining what is meant by corporal punishment. I shall give two examples. I received a letter from a headmistress of a primary school. She said that some months ago she had occasion to punish a group of boys aged between seven and nine who were fighting during break and disobeying the requests of the school dinner ladies. I remind the House that we are dealing with the practical problems of running schools. When the boys were brought before the head teacher she happened to be using a ruler to complete a diagram. She decided that a quick tap with the ruler on the hand was the best course of punishment. She had never used the ruler prior to that occasion and had rarely smacked a child. She thought no more of the incident, which had the desired effect. The young men were so shocked — not hurt — that they behaved beautifully for the rest of the day. That evening the head teacher received a phone call from a parent who asked what had happened and whether the head teacher had the right to punish the pupils. The parent reported the action to county hall and the governors, and the head teacher had a distressing week while the parent deliberated whether to sue her for assault. The parent insisted that the head teacher apologise to the child, which the head teacher refused to do. However, she apologised to the parent for misreading "cane" to mean "ruler" — no cane being available—in local education authority instructions. The governors decided not to pursue the matter with the authority, but the head teacher has now received a letter stating that that child must not, in any circumstances, be punished physically. That is on record for all the staff to see.

Another head teacher in my constituency wrote to me saying that, in 14 years as a headmaster, he had neither needed nor used the cane at any time, and that the standard of discipline and behaviour in his school was considered excellent and that the control of children was administered fairly to all at all times. He is sure that most parents would support him in retaining the right, in loco parentis, to smack a child for such offences as telling lies, using bad language or being rude to an adult.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman wishes to get on record the letters from head teachers in his constituency. I do not blame him for that, but he is trying to criticise my new clause on this basis. Is it not the Bill that presents the problem of definition? The Minister made it clear that the Bill included the smack. Although I do not blame the hon. Gentleman for making it clear that there are problems of definition, I hope that he will use that as criticism of the Bill, not of the new clause.

Mr. Key: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making my point for me. I am trying to point out that there is a problem of definition. If we cannot define, and if it is not generally appreciated by head teachers, what is meant by corporal punishment, it is ludicrous to expect a head teacher or anyone else to decide an equivalent to corporal punishment, as the new clause suggests. On those grounds, I shall oppose the new clause.

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) said that statistics are necessary to formulate policy. I should tell him that my Department does not formulate policy without information from a variety of sources, including surveys conducted with local education authorities, what people tell us in the House and elsewhere and HMI reports, on which we rely heavily. We are not entirely without the knowledge at which he hinted in his remarks.

Punishment books are kept by and in schools because of paragraph 6 of DES administrative memorandum 531, which everyone knows is dated 10 May 1956—a very good year for several things.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Tell us what.

Mr. Dunn: If the hon. Gentleman has the time and patience, I will name many things that happened in 1956, including my 10th birthday.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) was right about the definition of equivalents or alternatives. I can imagine much debate continuing in education authorities, in rooms in which school government is discussed and maintained, about what is an equivalent. The mind races a little at the prospect of a star system, with two brown stars or three red stars being awarded for offences. The child can build up something like a green shield stamp book—a passport to infamy, and possibly expulsion and suspension. I do not believe that that was in the mind of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. One can imagine the bureaucracy that would be involved in the creation of a bible of definitions for use by those responsible for the control of children in school.

There should be no difficulty about keeping a record of all cases of corporal punishment, because such a requirement has been carried out since 1956. Schools do that now, and to that extent the new clause is unnecessary. However, the amendment goes further than that in an extremely selective way. It extends the record-keeping which schools would have to do. Although the hon. Gentleman was concerned earlier about the growth of bureaucracy, his new clause seeks to increase it. I note that, as the new clause is framed, schools not using corporal punishment would be free from the new burden. That seems to make it an extra chore, or an additional penalty to be imposed on schools that dare to apply corporal punishment.

But even if that were not the case, I would oppose the new clause. The extra records might be interesting, but they would not be essential to the life of the school, and for a large secondary school there would be practical difficulties. In any one day, many sorts of disciplinary sanctions might be used, and the school would have to devise a method of collecting all the information and deciding which punishments were equivalent to corporal punishment so that entries could be made in the punishment book. Whereas a corporal punishment register is an essential part of an exemptions scheme, this punishment book clearly is not and would not be essential.

Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press the new clause to a Division.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am disappointed by the Minister's response because he does not seem to consider natural justice. Let us assume that two pupils are caught smoking behind the cycle sheds. One is on the register and the other is not. I do not say that either of them should have to suffer corporal punishment for smoking, but I am aware that in some schools it is still a fairly regular punishment. The pupil who is on the register will be given corporal punishment, and the punishment book will record that he was given one or two strokes of the cane or the strap for smoking behind the bicycle shed. Nothing will be recorded for the other pupil. Whatever alternative punishment the head decides is appropriate for that pupil, there is no requirement to record it. Therefore, in 10 years' time, someone can look through the punishment book and see that the first pupil was caned, but the other pupil will have no record.

That is unfair and not good for the school's administration, because over a period there will be a tendency to examine the punishment book and see that the names of some pupils occur fairly frequently. The pupils whose parents have insisted that they should not be subject to corporal punishment may have been punished in alternative ways, yet their names will not be in the book. In terms of natural justice between the two pupils, it must be logical to record both names.

I accept that, as the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) said, there are problems of definition, but they relate to the Bill, not to the new clause. The hon. Gentleman will have to explain to the head teachers in his constituency that, whatever his view of corporal punishment and whatever their view, once the Bill is implemented, even a smack will count as corporal punishment and can, therefore, be administered only to pupils whose names are on the register. Since it will count as corporal punishment, it will also have to be recorded in the punishment book. Teachers will have to take those matters into account as a result of the definition of corporal punishment chosen by the Minister.

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman gives an example of two pupils caught smoking behind the bicycle sheds and of one receiving punishment, but the other receiving a different punishment because he was exempted. We must not forget that the head teacher and staff have some say in the punishment applied other than corporal punishment, and they must apply a judgment as to what appears to be fair to the children. Additionally, the difficulty that I outlined of collecting information at the end of the day, week or month and then recording it, is an insuperable point. However, if a school wished to have two books —a corporal punishment book and an equivalents book —there is no reason why it should not do so, if it can afford the time and the bureaucracy to make such a book work.

Mr. Bennett: There is a strong argument for keeping a record of serious punishment. Most teachers at schools where serious punishment is meted out probably believe that a record is necessary. Indeed, I hope that corporal punishment is used only for serious cases. An overall record should be kept of what is happening in a school so that people can judge whether the sanctions are working. A secondary school would be ill-administered if there was not some attempt to record information about punishments meted out to a pupil who was, perhaps, not as co-operative as he might be. It is obvious that at this stage I cannot persuade the Minister to accept new clause 4. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

RESTRICTION ON CORPORAL PUNISHMENT OF PUPILS

7.30 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 4, leave out

'or an immediate danger to the property of'.

This is one area of the Bill in which we feel that the Government have not considered the question of degree. Where a pupil is likely to cause physical harm to a member of staff, another pupil or himself, it is important that it is clear that the member of staff is entitled to use whatever force necessary to restrain the pupil. However, to extend that right to the defence of property involves a question of degree. If a pupil was thought likely to set fire to a school or to carry out substantial damage to property, everyone would accept the right of a teacher to intervene and to use force to prevent that. However, the Government do not qualify

"an immediate danger to the property".

[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett]

I understand the difficulties of including qualifications in legislation. However, the word "substantial" before "danger to the property" would clarify the matter.

I remember going into a classroom and seeing a pupil deliberately snapping a ruler. That made me very cross, but it would not have justified my setting about the pupil physically. As I understand the Bill, any item of property would fall within the wording of the clause. Therefore, I hope that the Minister will clarify the degree of damage involved. I regret that the Bill does not tie down the whole question of degree.

Mr. Dunn: The Bill as it stands, through clause 1(3), reinforces the common law right to take action, even where that action amounts to a battery, to prevent harm coming to a person or property. The amendment would remove that reinforcement insofar as it extends to the protection of property.

The Opposition amendment implies that, while it may be fine to take physical steps to prevent a pupil from harming another person or himself, it is unwarranted to do so when it is property rather than a person in immediate danger. The House cannot accept that proposition.

Let us imagine for a moment that a boy is discovered with a lighted match in hand, about to set fire to an empty classroom. Let us also imagine that neither the pupil nor the teacher would have been in any immediate danger from such an action. In those circumstances, is the teacher to be forced to resort to persuasion? Is the teacher to attempt to discover whether or not the boy is exempt before seizing hold of him to prevent the deed?

Let us remember that the general definition of corporal punishment is widely drawn. Opposition Members have made no complaint about the use of battery as the broad basis for that definition. But that needs to be tempered by common sense. It goes against reason to suppose that teachers can or should stand idly by while pupils do what they will to property, whether it is their own, their parents, or the school's.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 7, in page 2, line 19, leave out 'section 2' and insert

'sections [exemption from corporal punishment not ground for suspension, etc.] and 2'—[Mr. Dunn.]

Mr. Dunn: I beg to move amendment No. 8, in page 2, line 24, leave out from 'school' to end of line 27 and insert

'maintained or assisted by a Minister of the Crown (including a school of which a government department is the proprietor) or assisted by a local education authority, being a school prescribed by regulations under section 2 of this Act or within a category so prescribed'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 9, in page 2, line 24, leave out from 'school' to end of line 27.

Government amendments Nos. 34 to 36.

No. 37, in clause 4, page 6, line 13, leave out from 'school' to end of line 14.

Mr. Dunn: An important principle underlying the Bill is that the exemptions scheme should extend to publicly funded school places. There is a relatively small number of places at independent schools that come within that description, but which are not caught by the present wording of clauses 1 and 4. The amendments close that loophole and, in particular, would allow the Secretary of State, under regulations, to bring within the scheme United Kingdom schools owned and run by Government Departments. They would also allow the Secretary of State to act similarly with schools that are assisted by local education authorities under section 9 of the Education Act 1944.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Minister believe that any schools are excluded from the provision other than the independent schools that receive no state assistance?

Mr. Dunn: I believe that I am right in saying that, having listened to the concerns expressed to me by the hon. Gentleman, what we have now proposed will meet that position entirely. However, I am always open to listen to him or anyone else who believes that there are other schools involved, and would be pleased to have such schools brought to my attention.

I hope that the House will resist amendments Nos. 9 and 37. They attempt to bring independent schools into line with maintained schools. They seek to extend arrangements for exemption from corporal punishment to all pupils in independent schools, with no distinctions being made.

To consider that proposal, we need to look at the origins of the Bill. We have said plainly that the Bill arises from the case of Campbell and Cosans, heard in the European Court of Human Rights. The court's judgment was that the UK's education arrangements did not accord with the European Convention on Human Rights. The Government have introduced the Bill so that those arrangements will accord with the convention. The Bill is not intended to go further than that.

We then need to ask ourselves whether, to meet that objective, we must bring all parents of all pupils within the scheme introduced by the Bill. The answer is no. We need not interfere with the generality of private contracts that are freely made between parents and independent schools. Most parents of children at independent schools have sent their children there because they wanted to do so, and the state is not directly responsible for the education of those children. The UK will therefore have discharged its obligations under the convention if, through the maintained sector, we have offered adequate provision that parents with philosophical convictions against corporal punishment can use if they so wish or desire.

The Government acknowledge, however, that there are cases involving independent schools where the state has assumed some direct responsibilities and where the new arrangements must be made, and clause 1 indentifies and caters for those cases. But they are a small minority, and in the main we need not and should not interfere with the private plans of parents who use the independent sector, or with independent schools which are well used to meeting the requirements of those who turn to them for the education of their children.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made; No. 13, in page 3, line 10, leave out 'section 2' and insert

'sections [exemption from corporal punishment not ground for suspension, etc.] and 2'—[Mr. Dunn.]

Mr. Dunn: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 3, leave out line 14 and insert

'teacher who works at the school and any other person who has lawful control or charge of the pupil and works there, and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 15, 40 and 41.

Mr. Dunn: In Standing Committee there was some concern that the wording of the Bill might indirectly increase the number of people who could claim to be acting in loco parentis. It was argued that broad references to any person working at a school might be taken to include employees such as caretakers or cleaners, who in the normal course of events would not have the care and control of children, and that there might be an assumption that such employees could readily and lawfully resort to corporal punishment.

It was not the Government's intention to change the existing position. We wish neither to increase nor to decrease the numbers who could claim to be acting in loco parentis. This series of amendments has been put forward to ease anxieties on that score. They make it plain that we are here dealing with teachers and others at school who have dealing with teachers and others at school who have lawful control or charge of pupils.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 15, in page 3, line 17, leave out from 'any' to end of line 19 and insert

'teacher employed by the authority who works at that place and any other person employed by the authority who has lawful control or charge of the pupil and works there'.—[Mr. Dunn.]

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION

Mr. Dunn: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 4, line 27, after '1944', insert

'and section 231 of the Local Government Act 1972'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient to consider at the same time Government amendments Nos. 24, 25, 44, 45, and 46.

Mr. Dunn: These amendments concern the service of documents on local authorities. At present, this is governed in England and Wales by section 231 of the Local Government Act 1972, which provides that documents are to be served by delivery or by posting to the authority's principal office or to any other office of the authority specified by it for the purpose. Section 190 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 makes similar provision for Scotland.

It is necessary to disapply those sections because, under the Bill and the regulations to be made under clause 2, parents of certain children will be serving a document on local authorities in the form of a return of their views. The children concerned are those in maintained nursery schools and those educated by an authority otherwise than at school, because in both cases the local authority will be the responsible body. In many instances it will be more convenient for parents to make the return direct to the nursery school or in some other way. This series of amendments makes it possible for the regulations to cover that point.

Amendment agreed to.

7.42 pm

Mr. Dunn: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am delighted that we have reached this stage of the Bill. The measure had a short time in Standing Committee and has had a short, though exhaustive and detailed, consideration on Report today.

[Mr. Dunn]

The Bill has always been concerned with parental rights. It gives parents a new right without taking away their existing ones. That new right is the ability to claim for their children exemption from corporal punishment at school. For any pupil covered by the Bill, either the parent or the school can seek such exemption, and the pupil then becomes exempt.

In short, the Bill assumes a partnership between parents and schools, and if either or both believe that corporal punishment is an inappropriate sanction for a pupil, the Bill gives the pupil protection against its use.

Opposition Members would have it otherwise, and they have never claimed anything different. They want neither parents nor schools, nor the two jointly, to have a say in the matter. The enforced abolition of corporal punishment is the only solution that they would accept. Nothing short of that would satisfy them. Parental and school views would be swept aside and legislation used to achieve a universal ban on reasonable and moderate corporal punishment.

I am glad to say that the Government are not prepared to go down that road. If parents and those who provide education take the view that corporal punishment is necessary, the law should not be used to prevent that view from prevailing.

Some local education authorities impose a ban on corporal punishment. The Bill will have a neutral impact — the minimum possible — on that situation. Indeed, under the Bill, local education authorities which have the legal right to impose such a ban on their schools will retain that right. However, that is different from the imposition of a ban by central Government through legislation.

If a local authority were to change hands, particularly from Labour to Conservative—as will happen in many authorities on 2 May — it will be a matter for the authority to decide on a code of discipline and to discuss, within the various chambers available to it, the form that such discipline should take.

My expectation is that parents will welcome this new right and will exercise it responsibly. I hope that parents and schools will co-operate so that, in the end, discipline and standards of behaviour improve.

The Bill has been criticised on a number of grounds. It has been said that it is impractical or unfair, or that it does not go far enough. As the House knows, our view is that it may not be the ideal solution. To me, the ideal would have been to leave things as they were, largely unregulated by statute. That, I am afraid, was not possible. The court found us in breach of the European convention on human rights and we cannot pick and choose the judgments with which we comply.

If we accept that position, the Bill is the best that we can achieve in the circumstances. Other solutions—the enforced abolition of corporal punishment or a dual system of schools, some with and some without corporal punishment—have major drawbacks. Of course, I reject completely the accusations of impracticability and unfairness.

There will be differences in the way in which pupils are treated, but there are now. Adjacent schools may have different policies, and pupils in the same school are often treated differently. Sometimes girls are exempted from corporal punishment while boys are not. Sometimes those with emotional problems are exempted, as may be delicate pupils. Fairness does not always entail identical treatment. What matters is that those who deserve punishment should receive it and that those who cannot be corporally punished should, and must, be disciplined in some other way.

My view is that the critics of the Bill have, as usual, over-reacted. An exemption scheme can work and can be consistent with the maintenance of good order and discipline in schools. It is therefore with pleasure that I commend the Bill to the House. I am delighted that the measure has reached this stage, and I hope that it will receive an unopposed Third Reading.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I was amazed to hear the Minister say that he had pleasure in commending the Bill to the House. I should have thought that most people would agree that we were close to a farce with this piece of legislation. I pointed out on Second Reading that the Government were on a hiding to nothing with it and I have heard nothing since then which should give the Government confidence in the Bill.

I notice that between Second Reading and now the Secretary of State has seen fit to distance himself from the measure. I do not blame him for not being here today. I would not want to be putting forward a measure as farcical as this. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman does not want to be known as "abolition Joseph." Presumably, however, he is happy for it to be known as "abolition Dunn's Bill." In practice, it will turn out to be so impractical and unfair that corporal punishment will be abolished in the vast majority of schools and will be retained only by the bad and inefficient ones.

I was surprised to hear the Minister say that we had to do it because of the judgment of the court but that it would not be done until 1986. If we must take this step, the Government should have taken it earlier. My real regret, however, is that the Government have missed a great opportunity for there to have been a proper debate of the whole question of discipline in schools. We should be getting across to youngsters the need for self-discipline. We should not be running the education system on the basis that we must force pupils to do things. We should be aiming at getting pupils to do things because they want to do so. Our aim should be self-discipline for pupils. The schools should discuss carefully their regimes and methods of teaching in trying to arrive at the ideal of imposing the majority of discipline in schools through self-discipline rather than by means of a punishment system.

The Bill will not work as the Government intend and they will have to return quickly with another measure. If they do not another Government, a Labour Government, will have to bring in a simple abolition Bill and thereby remove the farcical measure which the Government are insisting on pushing through.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I cannot say that I welcome the Bill. As I said on Second Reading, it will place our schools in a difficult position. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is entitled to say that he welcomes the Bill on the basis that it is the best measure that can be put before the House in all the circumstances, which make it impossible to give the schools a clear direction. The Bill cannot be welcomed as a measure that will improve school discipline and education. However, it is important that we have avoided the abolition of corporal punishment. It would be wrong to abolish it without a great deal more thought than any of the abolitionists have given to the issue. I include in that comment the occupants of the Opposition Front Bench, the Labour party generally and many outside. It is unfortunate that the abolitionists have not considered the options that would face us if abolition were to become a reality.

It is unfortunate also that the options have not been thought through for the child whose parents have said that they will not accept corporal punishment. The options have not been argued out in schools or in the education world generally. The schools will face a difficult task in handling pupils who will need to be punished as a result of bad behaviour and who may not be punished with the cane or an equivalent instrument because their parents have refused permission.

The Bill, as amended, will unquestionably affect school discipline at a time when our schools have a greater than ever responsibility for improving national behaviour in the long term. There is no doubt in my mind that much of the violence that we have seen at soccer matches, for example, will not disappear or be lessened as a result of the Bill. That is greatly to be regretted.

A Bill that will deal successfully with corporal punishment and any other form of school discipline should be welcomed as the basis for long-term improvement in school discipline and the means of real reform. The aim of such a measure should be to ensure that children are more interested on leaving school in remaining self-disciplined and law-abiding. Unfortunately, the Bill will not help in that direction. I am not saying that it will do deep harm but it will be responsible for some damage. I am sure that that cannot be denied.

Will the Bill help to end soccer violence and burglaries, for example? Will it help teachers to restrain the child who is behaving in a maladjusted fashion although he is not basically maladjusted? Will it help parents to feel that the school has the equipment to handle their children in all moods and in meeting all their behavioural problems? I am not sure that it will be capable of meeting any of those needs. The behaviour of children stems partly from their own character and personality and partly from peer group pressure and their relationships with one another. I believe that the Bill will make life more difficult for teachers, schools and children. Children who commit identical offences are likely to be punished differently in some circumstances. That will create impossible inequalities within schools. That is my basic objection to the Bill, which I expressed on Second Reading, and the amendments have not remedied this major defect.

It is good that parents will have a say by law in the discipline of their children. They have not had that right before and this feature of the Bill is one that should be welcomed. There will be a requirement to consult parents on their attitude towards corporal punishment. Hitherto, the law has not required parents to be consulted on their attitude to anything very much in the schooling of their children. The Bill offers this considerable plus and my hon. Friend the Minister was right to welcome the improvement. However, it is a pity that the law of the land is to be involved in school discipline. Currently, local authorities, schools and head teachers have had sole responsibility, with teachers, for the maintenance of school discipline. It has been accepted nationally that teachers should act in loco parentis. That role will be substantially altered when the Bill is enacted. That is a matter for regret when it is set against the strong tradition of the teacher acting to the best of his ability in loco parentis. It is a tradition which has stood the country, the education system and parents in good stead over a long period.

It is unfortunate that the Bill will mean that equal misdemeanours may attract different punishments. The unfairness of the inequality of treatment will undoubtedly irritate children seriously and gravely. Delicate children, maladjusted children and ordinary children with no behavioural problems have not been treated equally throughout the school system since 1872. Those with education difficulties and special needs have, when punished been treated differently from those with no difficulties.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State gave the impression that he welcomed the fact that children with education difficulties and those with no difficulties will be treated equally when the Bill is enacted. If the Bill is to have that effect, it should not be welcomed. It is obvious that delicate children are different from robust children. Maladjusted children are clearly different from those who are not. The children in these and other categories should be handled differently and punished in different ways. I hope that I have not misrepresented my hon. Friend. If I have, perhaps he will take up the matter when he replies. This is a fundamental issue and it would not be responsible for me, with such long experience in education, to let the matter pass without taking it up.

I hope that the Bill will not be the thin end of the wedge. Corporal punishment is valuable and should remain. School discipline should aim towards self-discipline for children both at school and afterwards. Self-discipline occurs as a result of a firm structure at school and at home at crucial ages in a child's life. If the Bill ensures that there is a firm structure of discipline that all people concede is fair, children may want to behave in a self-disciplined manner.

I do not welcome an attack on the position of the teacher, and especially the head, acting in loco parentis. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on his skill in handling this measure, but I hope that he will say that the line has been drawn and that we will go no further in attacking the principle of the teacher and especially the head acting in loco parentis. I hope that the people will understand what is being done and that matters will work out satisfactorily. I hope that it will turn out all right in the end. My fingers will be firmly crossed.

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), who, like me, is a former teacher, has put his finger on the obvious flaws in the Bill. Conservative Members do not believe in what they have been saying. They know that, in time, they will have to abolish corporal punishment, but the idea sticks in their craws. They have built a house of cards that will collapse.

The legislation places schools in difficulty. Schools already have registers, but they will have to place parents, teachers and children in extreme difficulty because registers of those who will be caned and those who will not be caned must be formed. Those entries will follow the students throughout their education at school. Practically every word spoken by Conservative Members proves that they know that this is impossible. Anyone who stands over a child with a cane is in a bankrupt position. Teachers with canes in their hands stand not in loco parentis but in "loco draconis". They are trying to terrify children and are thereby closing the channels of learning. It is utter nonsense to think that caning does the slightest good. Any teacher knows that the same children are caned all the time. It is claptrap to think that a child who is caned will never act wrongly again.

Reference has been made to sin bins and withdrawal places. Almost all the children who have gone into the withdrawal places after doing something wrong have been caned previously, probably scores of times. It is untrue to say that only a little caning occurs, because Britain is one of the last countries where children are caned.

Caning means that teachers are placed on a stage with children, some of whom are very young. The Bill gives a young male teacher the right to cane a woman who is almost 18 years old. That is so silly it is unbelievable. If Conservatives examined this matter properly, they would know that it is silly.

Corporal punishment in schools is unworkable. It is the worst of both worlds. It is not a last resort. The teacher who canes often uses caning as a first resort. Sometimes every child in a class is caned, with a small group being caned frequently. It is nonsense to say that caning is not carried out on a large scale. It must be done away with.

Our society is pregnant with violence because of the inequality and alienation of young people. We shall soon have to discuss discipline in schools because it is linked directly with what has happened at Luton, Millwall and so on. Violence occurs because a large number of young people are not working. Conservatives say that we have the best system on earth, but they do not know how to work it.

As soon as corporal punishment is abolished in schools where there has been violence, violence against teaching staff decreases. In schools where there is much caning, there is often violence against the staff.

The Government do not know what to do, so they have proposed this monstrous and nasty little Bill as a halfway house. It is not a halfway house but a 99·9 per cent. way house. The legislation will not work. Teachers and parents will demand its repeal and will wonder why a reputedly intelligent and adult people have proposed such an abortion. That is exactly what this nasty little Bill is, and, in time, we shall get rid of it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I am one of those who think that this is an appalling Bill. I should appreciate hearing the views of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on a number of points. I apologise for not having been present earlier. I had a constituency engagement and understood that we would not be debating the Bill until 10 pm. Obviously, my colleagues made splendid progress with the earlier legislation.

I believe that everyone is fully aware that education authorities are under enormous financial pressure. Under the Bill, notification must be given to parents. It is suggested that costs will be limited because schools are already in touch regularly with children. I assure my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that none of my three children receives notification from the schools at any time by post. We certainly received notification by post when the children were entered at school, but since then we have received no postal communications. We receive many small letters which are handed to the children to bring home. Will it be possible under this legislation to hand out forms to children to bring them home to their parents? I doubt whether that is contemplated in the regulations. Postal notification is required.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State must accept that sending a letter to every parent in every maintained school in England and Wales will cost a great deal. How much will it cost? Is that a fair burden to impose on the education authorities which are starved of cash, for reasons that are obvious to us all?

How often will the schools have to send the notification? Is it once per year or once in the lifetime of the child in the school? If it is to be sent regularly, I suggest that the cost will be substantial. We are all aware that because of the way our society has developed, unfortunately, many children come from one-parent homes. Many children are living with their mothers, or fathers or a strange combination of people who are not their mothers and fathers. We know that nowadays there are many broken homes and that many children live in unstable relationships. Is there an obligation to send a postal notification to each of the natural parents? If there is, the work load will be substantial and the cost horrific. Will it mean that all the children or their parents will have to notify the school of the names and addresses of their natural parents? Will the schools have to take that information from all parents?

Those are some points about which my hon. Friend has a duty to tell the House and the education authorities. Will there have to be a postal notification? Does the Minister accept that schools do not send letters by post to parents at present? Will the notification have to be made annually or once only in the child's school life? Will the notification have to be sent to each of the natural parents? Will that mean that the schools keeping a note of the natural parents?

Clause 1(7) relates to assisted places. Will my hon. Friend say what happens about these?

Mr. Key: He has, at great length.

Mr. Taylor: Does that mean that independent schools have an obligation to send letters to natural parents?

My next point, which is important, is about the general principle of deterrence. Has there been any information on that, because our only experience of the operation of the European court on corporal punishment is the court's decision on corporal punishment for criminals in the Isle of Man. Before we proceed further with the legislation, my hon. Friend should attempt to read the annual reports of the chief constable of the Isle of Man from 1979 when corporal punishment had to abolished. He will see that there is a clear connection between crime and the abolition of corporal punishment.

My next point has been dealt with on Second Reading and in Committee. It relates to justice. I do not see that it be just, fair and reasonable for children engaged in the same exercise to be punished differently.

There is a further important point. Does my hon. Friend believe that the Bill will lead to an expansion of what is already a serious problem in schools—the increase in the number of children suspended or excluded from schools? I had a visit on Saturday from a constituent whose child, aged 14, was suspended from school in November 1984 and expelled at the end of the month. That child has had no education since from school or private tuition. He has been at home.

There is a danger that if we proceed with this legislation there will be a substantial increase in the number of pupils suspended or expelled because of the absence of corporal punishment. There will be a number of children staying at home and not receiving education.

The most vital issue is that this unsatisfactory Bill—the Government accept that it is unsatisfactory — is introduced not because of a decision of this Parliament, or the determination of pupils, parents or teachers, but merely because of the European court's decision. I take the view, as I am sure most people do, that parents and teachers are in a far better position than elderly European judges to make decisions about the conduct of discipline in our schools. I should prefer it if judges were given the opportunity to look after a class of 14-year-olds before they issued such ridiculous judgments.

When the European convention was drawn up it was determined—this is clear from the reading of it—that it was interested in the protection of basic human rights against torture and so on. As with all written constitutions, the court has endeavoured, step by step, to extend the convention's remit. The court has extended it more and more. I should be happier if, instead of proceeding with the legislation, the Government were to call together the signatories of the European convention to see whether there were some way to stop the court extending its powers into matters for which the convention was not designed.

I am convinced that if the legislation goes through it will lead inevitably and quickly to the disappearance of corporal punishment from all except the independent schools. That will be a retrograde step. To bring in the Bill without clear help and advice to teachers about how alternative and satisfactory discipline can be introduced is dangerous when teaching morale, as we are all aware, is low. A number of teachers find great difficulty in coping with all that they have to at present.

The Bill is a big mistake. I should prefer it to be scrapped and for the Government to meet the signatories of the European convention to see whether there is some way in which we could get together to limit the appalling way that the European court is, step by step, taking more power from what was originally designed to be a limited document.

If anything good comes out of the legislation, it will be that the people of Great Britain will be reminded of the extent to which decision making has been taken away from us and transferred to a number of European courts that make foolish decisions which cause a great deal of damage to our country and, in this case, to our education.

8.17 pm

Mr. Freud: There are some ways in which I agree with the sentiments of the hon. Members for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) and for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway). I regret that we have the Bill and that we did not leave things as they were. I regret the fact that the court in Strasbourg did not concentrate on the more serious aspect of human rights instead of playing about with minor corporal punishment. I regret the fact that we did not take the opportunity to stop corporal punishment altogether. I regret the Government's approach which is pock-marked with ambiguities and is designed not to promote discipline in schools but to discipline their Back Benchers. I regret the fact that the Minister speaks of partnership. He seems genuinely to believe that signing a piece of paper is a manifestation of partnership.

The White Paper "Better Schools" has a section on discipline which makes more sense than what we have heard from the Minister and the Secretary of State. It states:

> "Many schools consistently secure good order. They do so not simply by a regime of sanctions and rewards but more broadly by creating within the school a tone which makes for constructively purposeful activity. They attempt to create positive attitudes towards good behaviour in all that they do. The teachers themselves set an example; and in their relationships with parents, pupils and each other seek to demonstrate as well as to encourage high standards of conduct, in the awareness that adult society does not always reflect and support those standards. Often the teachers' success is attributable to the consistency with which they encourage in their pupils good behaviour and the habit of self-discipline and not simply to a particular teaching style or set of rules."

It is really quite liberal of the White Paper to write of boredom as a factor contributing to bad discipline, but to think that corporal punishment has anything to do with this seems to me quite astonishing. This is what I mean by anachronisms and ambiguities.

It takes one aspect of discipline in isolation. The Department of Education and Science has taken no account of information on schools and areas which manage without corporal punishment. It has taken no account of factors like the participation of pupils, which David Hargreaves, the guru to the Inner London education authority and also the author of the influential report "Improving Secondary Schools", took to be a major factor in the absence of graffiti and violence in some London schools.

Corporal punishment does not equal discipline. The White Paper understands this, so why are we wasting our time on this Bill, which is a mere sideshow to the real issues of discipline and good order and helping to foster good pupils? We who are trying to curb a violent society cannot—certainly we should not—be going to these lengths to legalise and give a modicum of respectability to the infliction of physical abuse on children, though few of us are opposed to teachers acting, as they will, in loco parentis, provided that the other manifestations of parental care are observed. It is for this reason that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I think that this Bill is a complete irrelevance and has wasted the time of the House.

Mr. Key: I said on Second Reading that we could expect to hear arguments from the anti-European lobby. In fact, we did not hear those arguments. Tonight, however, we have heard some of those arguments, albeit at a late stage in the proceedings. I pointed out also at Second Reading that I believe this to be an expedient and dotty Bill. During Committee, Report and Third Reading that view has been enforced. It is an expedient and dotty Bill. However, I should like to end on a positive note.

I believe that the Bill is not really about beating children. It is about the social framework of our schools and communities. While listening to this debate and to points which have been raised on previous occasions I have been depressed by the fact that we have heard about the prejudices of the past concerning discipline. Hon. Members have said that during their childhood they would have preferred a short, sharp caning to being deprived of games or put in detention, which they believe would have been far more effective. In fact, they prove the case of the abolitionists.

However, we have also learned about the diversity of practice in our educational system, undoubtedly one of its greatest strengths. The diversity of the response of teachers, parents and governors is magnificent. Nevertheless, those hon. Members who attended independent schools should not assume that, 40 years later, attitudes to discipline are the same as they were when they attended school. Hon. Members and members of another place should be aware of the wind of change that has been blowing through the Headmasters Conference. Corporal punishment is a lively issue there. We are being asked to consider, as a matter of great responsibility on the part of parents, teachers and governors, the need to debate the social framework of our schools and communities. At last Parliament has begun to discuss the issue and take a lead. I hope that there will be more of an opportunity to discuss the issue in the future than there has been in the past.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I am not sure whether my admiration for the Government in getting this measure debated in an empty House at this time of the night is as great as my regret that the Government have done so. The fact that this debate was to take place today was made known just before the House went into recess. Very few hon. Members were then aware of what would be happening tonight. When they were notified of what would be happening tonight they thought that it would be after 10 o'clock. This is a controversial measure. It is a measure which many hon. Members, certainly many Conservative Members, are fundamentally against. Many hon. Members would no doubt have liked to be here to debate the issue. It is evident that proceedings on the Bill will be completed before 10 o'clock. Therefore, many of my hon. Friends who were most concerend about this measure will be deprived — I mean that — of the opportunity——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I am listening very carefully to the hon. Gentleman. This is the Third Reading, which means that we are discussing the contents of the Bill. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will get to it quickly.

Mr. Marlow: My point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is that many of my hon. Friends are deeply concerned about the contents of the Bill but as you know, and as the House know, they will no now have the opportunity to put forward their points.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): They should have been here if they are so concerned.

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman says that they should have been here if they are so concerned. My hon. Friends would have been here had they been able to be here. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that because of the way that business is brought forward in this House it is not always possible for hon. Members to change their plans at the last minute. We are told, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this is a human rights matter. If this country is to reach a decision on human rights, I believe that the House of Commons, whose Members are elected by their constituents to represent their views, is a far better place to decide the human rights of the people of Britain than a foreign court with foreign judges who know nothing about the customs——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is discussing something that is not in the Bill. He must address himself to the contents of the Bill.

Mr. Marlow: With your forgiveness, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Bill has been imposed on the House of Commons because of a ruling by a European court. It is not brought forward by the free will of this Government or by the free will of this House. It has been imposed on us. That which is contained in the Bill is highly criticised by many of my hon. Friends. We are concerned with human rights and with the education of our children. Many of our children are suffering from a level of education to which we do not aspire because of the lack of discipline. I am not a strong advocate of corporal punishment. I am not a great flogger. However, it is said that in a civilised society such as ours there should be no corporal punishment. If we were a civilised society in all the respects that are envisaged that might be true, but sadly that is not the case. In many of the blackboard jungles of our inner city areas the staff face great problems in imposing discipline and believe that there is a need for corporal punishment. We are taking corporal punishment away from them because of the ruling of a foreign court. By taking away corporal punishment we are reducing the educational opportunities of many of our most disadvantaged children. If we are concerned about civil liberties and human rights, we ought to be concerned about the human rights of those children.

As for the assisted places scheme, there may already be five or 10 pupils in a school under the assisted places scheme whose parents have said that corporal punishment is the custom and practice in that school and that they accept it. However, what happens if another child gains an assisted place in that school and his parents say that they do not want corporal punishment to be inflicted on their child and the headmaster or the governors then say to those parents, "We are sorry, but there has been a mistake. If your child will not accept corporal punishment, we are afraid that he cannot come here."? We know what will happen. Public money is made available, and it will have to be withdrawn. If that public money is withdrawn, what will happen to the five or 10 children who are already in the school? Do they lose their assisted places? Is that what will happen? Will they be thrown out of the school because a newcomer is not prepared to accept corporal punishment?

If we are in favour of human rights, I put it to the House that the human rights of those children, the liberty of the individual, and the freedom of those children, are being interfered with to a far greater extent by the Bill than if we chucked it out. That is what I believe we should do.

Mr. Dunn: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the points that have been made.

I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Salisbury (Mr.

Key) and the hon. Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) and for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

The debate, the temperature of which has risen considerably in the last few moments, has been one of great vigour and determination. We have had many debates on several of the points that were raised tonight. I can say to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North that I had no part in the collapse of earlier business, which prevented him and other hon. Members on both sides of the House from being in their places. There may be those who are concerned about the Bill who have not arrived, and many great supporters of the Bill might have been unable to be present because of the collapse of business. Had I had the opportunity to choose whether to have the debate earlier or later, I would have preferred it to take place later so that I could canvass in my constituency for the Kent county council elections on 2 May. That had been my intention.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Is the hon. Gentleman worried about the result?

Mr. Dunn: I have no anxieties whatsoever, but I am always concerned to keep out the forces of evil and destruction in the form of the Labour party, and, of course, the alliance. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman was born in Kent, I am surprised that he is on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not in the Bill, either.

Mr. Dunn: I was not going to suggest that it should be, either. Opposition Members have referred to the standard of behaviour in schools, which is important. The development of self-discipline——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does the Minister accept that it is insufferable for the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) to come in and lecture us about discipline, when he cannot even stay to hear the Minister wind up?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, who is now back again, told me that he might have to leave during my speech—not because of my speech, but because he had a prior engagement with constituents elsewhere. [HON. MEMBERS: "But he has come back."] Perhaps my hon. Friend has a bit more time than he thought he had. He informed me of that. I am sure that no discourtesy to the House was intended. I certainly did not take it as a discourtesy.

Self-discipline is a significant objective for many young people and for those who come into contact with them. Schools have traditionally accepted the part that they have to play in that development. If the Bill encourages schools to look again at the way in which they approach discipline —I believe it will—that will be a positive step forward. I hope that it will lead to a closer understanding between school and home, and encourage involvement and support by parents, which schools need in disciplinary matters.

The view has been expressed that the schools most affected by the Bill will be those in which the staff have relied heavily on corporal punishment. For them there may have to be a major shift in emphasis, and it may take a little time. However, many schools have demonstrated that changes can be made without any increase in disorder and disruption. As the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East said, other sanctions can be used. As our recent White Paper on better schools said, there is scope for schools to offer more opportunities for pupils to acquire the habit of self-discipline. Schools can do a great deal to encourage and reward high standards of conduct without becoming dependent on any single sanction, no matter how necessary it might be.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North referred to the damage that the Bill might do to the concept of in loco parentis. He knows from his vast experience in the education service over many years that the in loco parentis concept is broad, and is not undermined by the Bill. The concept underlies the activities of all teachers in England and Wales. In Scotland the law is different, and teachers have similar vested powers. It means that, while the children are with the teacher, the teacher is responsible for their care and control. That places on teachers a wide legal obligation to look after them as a responsible parent would. More generally, teachers usually see their in loco parentis obligations as extending beyond the legal duties of care and control to a general concern with the personal and social development of pupils. Teachers do not simply offer lessons. They educate in the widest sense, and are much concerned with all aspects of behaviour. There is no reason why the Bill should disturb that approach to the teachers' functions.

My hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, North and for Southend, East referred to the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights. The House knows, because it was said so many times in Committee and earlier debates, that our obligations in that respect date back to 1951 when the Government of the day accepted the court's jurisdiction in cases brought by another state and where the prior agreement of this country had been obtained. In 1966, the then Government accepted the right of individuals to make complaints under the convention. That acceptance has been renewed by successive Governments. The latest renewal was in January 1981, for five years.

In the case of Campbell and Cosans the court ruled against the United Kingdom Government despite the views of the United Kingdom judge, Sir Vincent Evans. However, in other cases we have had cause to approve of its rulings. In the case of Handyside v. United Kingdom in 1976, for example, the court supported the decision of the authorities in this country who took action against an individual under the Obscene Publications Act 1964. Handyside had produced an underground book for schoolchildren, one long section of which was devoted to sexual matters. He subsequently brought a complaint against the United Kingdom under the convention. The court rejected the complaint. We all applaud that ruling.

In the closed shop case of Young, James and Webster v. United Kingdom, the court ruled in 1981 in favour of three British Rail employees who were dismissed as a result of a closed shop agreement. Opposition Members may not have liked the ruling, but it was important and, for me and my hon. Friends, it was a wholly satisfactory outcome. We should also remember that the Commission rejects many applications against the United Kingdom before they ever reach the court.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend accept, in fairness, that both those items, which admittedly are controversial, could have been resolved by legislation of the United Kingdom Parliament?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend may be right on that matter, but I must say what the position is and not what it might have been.

My hon. Friend raised several questions, which I shall now attempt to answer. He referred to the assisted places scheme. The same obligations will apply to those schools that partake in the assisted places scheme as will apply to maintained schools. My hon. Friend also referred to the number of pupils who might be suspended from school in future should the application of corporal punishment cease. It is sometimes argued that corporal punishment is a sanction of last resort and if it cannot be used, another more dramatic sanction must be found. It is also argued that suspension from school is such a sanction and will be the natural alternative.

There are weaknesses in both arguments. In the main, the cane is not a sanction of last resort. It is not reserved for the very worst offences. Mostly it is used as a quick response to an unacceptable though relatively minor offence. The alternative is not necessarily a draconian measure. It is more likely to be some other quick and simple punishment. One of the best alternatives is probably the withdrawal of rewards and privileges. In any case, suspension should not be a disciplinary sanction. It is not in itself a punishment. It is a temporary means of relieving pressure in schools and of involving parents. Pupils have to be got back in school, or in some extreme cases to a unit, at the earliest opportunity.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East raised a number of questions about the mechanics of canvassing parental views. I am sure that my hon. Friend, like most good parents, periodically visits his children's schools to discuss the children's academic propensities and future. On such occasions parents can and will be given the necessary form. Parents of new pupils may be given the form when they visit the school for the first time. In the case of the many parents who, sadly, choose not to visit the school, the form will be sent by post.

The question of periodic renewal will not arise, as there will be one form to cover the pupil's period of attendance at the school—although parents will, of course, have the right to change their minds.

My hon. Friend also referred to broken homes and different types of parental influence. The form will always be sent to the child's home address. My hon. Friend has various ways of making his pressure felt and no doubt he will see me if he wants further elaboration.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend said that the form will be posted to the child's home address. Is he therefore saying that it will not necessarily be sent to the parents, although if they happen to live at that address that is well and good? It is very important that we should be clear about that.

Mr. Dunn: The views to be canvassed are those of the people legally responsible for the child's welfare. I think that I have stated the position correctly, but I will look into the matter and if I feel that my answer was in any way misleading, I will write to my hon. Friend.

We have had a very good-tempered debate and I am delighted to have reached this stage of the Bill's progress. I thank hon. Members on both sides who have taken part in the debates both in the House and in Committee, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed.

Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

8.42 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Something seems to have prevented Members from being present to discuss this Bill, too. It is purely a consolidation measure which gathers together the provisions concerning reinstatement in civil employment of members of the reserve and auxiliary forces on completion of a period of whole-time service and the protection of the employment of those liable to such service.

The Bill has been considered by the Joint Committee on Consolidation Bills and, as ever, we are most grateful to that Committee for its labours. The Committee was content that the Bill, incorporating one amendment suggested by the Committee, constituted pure consolidation.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 56 (Third Reading), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Post Offices (South-East District)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

8.44 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Happily, we have more time than expected, so this may be the first of two Adjournment debates. I wish to bring to a wider forum the arguments for keeping open two of London's most important post offices. The first day of a new parliamentary term is an appropriate time for such a battle to protect local services. At this very moment at the other end of the building, in the other place, a much more comprehensive debate is taking place about local government and services in the capital and in the metropolitan counties, encompassing most of the great urban areas of England.

It is proposed to close south-east London's main post office, situated on Borough high street opposite the tube station and just down the road from St. George's church in the centuries-old borough of Southwark. It is also proposed to close the Bermondsey Crown post office just down Great Dover street, better known as the Pilgrim's Way—the old London-Dover road which the Canterbury pilgrims trod—and visible to the left of the Bricklayers Arms roundabout and flyover.

Both are urban post office of substantial importance, and the debate about their future began last May when a document entitled "The Post Office Counters Network: A strategy for the future" was produced by the Post Office and provoked a very worried and hostile reaction. The document set out proposals for counter services—not the giro service, but that part of the service which, with the mail service, is what people traditionally think of as the post office service.

Paragraph 4.8 on page 9 of that document states that the Post Office

"has therefore decided —to assure customers that 95 per cent. of the total counter network (taking town and country together) will remain until April 1987, and to consider, after local consultation and in the context of cost reduction and marketing programmes, the number of closures that are necessary within the remaining 5 per cent.

—where the Post Office is forced to close an office due to its inability to recruit a suitable subpostmaster . . . such an office could re-open in the future if and when a suitable candidate did appear.

—within the 5 per cent. the Post Office will close or regrade to sub-office status about 70 Crown Offices which are failing to generate sufficient revenue to cover their direct costs."

Two types of post office are thus involved. Sub-post offices are not staffed by Post Office workers. They are run under an agency agreement by an independent person or persons. The Crown offices, however, are staffed by Post Office employees and constitute what people regard as main post offices. I shall concentrate on the closure of Crown offices, but it is sensible first to put this specific debate into the general perspective of earlier debates on the Post Office service as a whole. The Minister will recall the general debate about three months ago, but I firmly believe that whatever his arguments in that context the case is clearly made out for keeping the specific offices to which this debate relates.

The Post Office annual report for 1983-84 stated that there were 1,559 Crown offices in Britain and 20,499 sub-post offices. In London, there were 367 Crown offices and 1,405 sub-post offices. The postal region of London stretches beyond Greater London into Hertfordshire, Essex and Surrey. For administrative purposes it is divided into districts. Tonight we are considering the south-east district. The hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) is here to represent his end of the borough of which I represent the north. The south-east district runs from Westminster bridge to Thamesmead and South Norwood. It is probably the largest London postal district. At the beginning of the exercise, it contained 33 Crown post offices and 159 sub-post offices.

Southwark—to reduce the scale again—contains 18 Crown offices and 40 sub-post offices, and my constituency contains six Crown offices and 18 sub-post offices. Whatever the scale may be, there is a balance; and a balance of services is provided.

I want to consider the proposals for closing Crown offices. The argument is about the balance between commerce and services — between the need to bear commercial considerations in mind and the duty to serve, both of which are imposed by legislation upon the Post Office. If the Minister is honest enough to listen to the figures and the arguments, he will have to accept that on both those grounds, in relation to the two offices under consideration, the argument is made out.

Last August the district postmasters, who had been given power to do so, announced the proposed closures of sub-post offices. On 19 October, together with other interested parties in Southwark and south-east London, I received information about proposed Crown office closures.

In Britain as a whole — only urban areas will be affected — 78 Crown offices out of 1,559 were to be closed. Nine hundred sub-post offices were to be closed, out of 20,499. In other words, about 5 per cent. in each category were to be closed. As has been said, when one's local post office is closed, one loses not 5 per cent. of the service but all of it. That, certainly, is the general belief in the area that I am talking about.

In London, it was proposed that 30 Crown offices out of 367 and 80 sub-post offices out of 1,405, should be closed. South-east London was to lose two Crown offices out of 33 and 18 sub-post offices out of 159. I do not know whether the fates considered these factors, but the two Crown offices chosen were both in Southwark, both in my constituency, and close together. I am here to address the Minister on behalf of a massive community. He has some powers and cannot wash his hands of responsibility, Pilate-like, despite the distance from Government at which the Post Office now operates.

The two offices must be considered together. If both are closed, the business must go to adjacent offices. If one is closed, the business is likely to go the other. There is a substantial risk that the Government, through the Post Office, will lose postal business altogether if these proposals are adopted.

The proposals were made last autumn. Consultations were then embarked on and continued until early this year. The criteria for consultation raise an important point to which I shall shortly turn. Consultation is now over at district level. In spite of unanimous and enormous opposition from every agency consulted, the recommendation of the district postmaster, Mr. Line, to the regional director, then Mr. Brown, was that the offices should be closed, as in the original proposal. That recommendation is at present on the desk of the director of the London region. Although in name it is the regional director who makes the decision, the recommendation must have the approval of the chairman of the Post Office, Sir Ronald Dearing, or of the board member responsible for counter services, if the undertakings given are to be carried out. Consultation at that level has still to take place.

Mr. Brown assured me before he left that he would meet my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and myself to discuss the matter. He had already had consultations with Conservative and Labour Members in London, and we would have been the third group to be seen. I make no complaint about that. That meeting has still to take place. The change of director does not obviate the need for that consultation, and I hope that the present debate will have helped to clarify the arguments.

The recommendation is on the table. Tonight's debate is opportune because the decision has not yet been made. The House has built up a head of steam on the issue. At the beginning of the Session many hon. Members signed early-day motion 156 which dealt mainly with sub-post offices. On 19 December, during the debate on the Christmas Adjournment, many hon. Members on both sides of the House requested the Leader of the House to provide Government time for a debate.

The Government eventually decided that they could not provide time. There was great regret in the House and the feeling that we had been deprived by the Government and that, because of the Government's decision to impose commercial restraints upon the Post Office, the closures would take place. There was opposition from Government Back Benchers as well as from Opposition Members such as myself. On 23 January we had a debate in Opposition time. No doubt the Minister will refer to the points that he made during that debate. The Government have imposed financial targets upon the Post Office, and the Post Office must comply. The Minister does not have much control over the matter.

In my view, the arguments are clearly against the closure of the two offices. However, I also believe that the arguments adduced by the Minister on 23 January did not answer the question how one defines the necessary provision of services. The pressure to close the head office counter has continued. With the support of many others, I tabled early-day motion 405 stating that it was wrong to close the two offices in my constituency on service and commercial grounds. The protest has all-party support. I hope that the Government will heed that fact.

The district postmaster told me a few months ago that he would make his decision in spite of the protest and he described the reaction to his proposals as total, vociferous and hostile. He said that he expected that, not least because the people of Southwark are well known for wanting to fight for their rights. I am glad that they are, but a total, vociferous and hostile response is not much good if nobody takes the blindest notice. Rights must be respected as well as fought for. Community organisations, tenants, owner-occupiers, unions, businesses, the chamber of commerce, churches, pensioners, young parents and members of every political party—I even had a letter of support from the Southwark and Bermondsey Conservative association, which might not be the largest in Britain—have said that the head office must not be closed. They also want the Post Office workers to keep their jobs. The service is not perfect and those workers should be retained so that the service might be improved. I bet that the Minister does not get many letters saying that the Post Office is wonderful. Rather I suspect that he receives complaints about late deliveries and lost mail. Those criticisms are criticisms not of the workers but of the lack of employees and investment.

The code of practice which was agreed between the Post Office and the Post Office Users' National Council in May 1981 and amended in January 1984 describes what consultation should mean. It says:

"1. The Head Postmaster (in conjunction with the Regional Director) will initiate plans to close or change the status of Crown Offices as part of his ongoing commitment to review all operations under his control.

2. He will take account of such factors as:

—the financial effect
—the nature of the area
—the productivity of the office
—how the change would affect the operation of the mail service —any redundancy problems
—disposal of the buildings
—the likely growth of the area

If he is contemplating outright closure, he will also take into account the factors outlined in paragraph 2 of the section on sub offices and additionally the question of proximity of offices able to undertake those items of business which may not be available at the nearest sub office".

Those factors are:

"The distance from other offices . . . The amount of business done. The type of business done (eg, are a lot of pensions paid) The difficulty customers would face in getting to another office . . . The ability of nearby offices to absorb additional work. The likely future development of the area."

With only one hint of weakness, the case for retaining the post offices can be made on all of those grounds.

If the Minister says that this is nothing to do with him, I shall have to remind him of section 11(2) of the Post Office Act 1969 which provides:

"If it appears to the Minister that there is a defect in the general plans or arrangements of the Post Office for exercising any of its powers, he may, after consultation with it, give it directions of a general character for remedying the defect."

If at the end of this exercise the Post Office insists on refusing to listen to voices such as mine, I shall have to have to come back, knock on his door and ask him to exercise that power.

I should like to deal briefly with the specifics of the criteria. I know that two other hon. Members want to add their voices and to raise similar issues. That only proves that these are not isolated arguments which the House should disregard. These are important issues of principle to the communities which many of us represent.

Does the Minister accept that the proposal to close the south-east district office means that this would be the only head office with no counter service? Is that not ludicrous? Let us imagine that someone went to the head office of Lloyds bank in the City of London only to be told, "I am sorry, all we do here is paper transactions behind closed doors. There is no counter service." No one would regard that as a logical set-up. As with every head office, the south-east district office is the place where one catches the post last, because that is where the sorting is carried out. I would be grateful if the Minister could confirm that that would be the only place where there was no counter service.

Before he says, "Ah, but", I am aware that when the south-west district office moved to Nine Elms some time ago, it did not take a counter service with it. However, there is a big difference, because as all hon. Members will know, no people live near the Nine Elms district office. It is surrounded by open space and not much business. In no way is that example parallel.

Secondly, will the Minister confirm that only last year the south-east district office underwent a major refurbishment in both the sorting office and counter service at a cost of thousands, if not tens of thousands, of pounds? If the Minister cares to give the exact figure, the House would be delighted to know.

The south-east district office now has comfortable offices upstairs for the management. I have been in them. Will the result not be that only a year after this major refurbishment, the counter service is to go? How is that for efficiency and cost-effectiveness? At some point the Minister may care to look at some of the letters from local residents and businesses suggesting that that is a ludicrous way in which to proceed.

I have with me a letter from the Midland bank, 82 Newington Causeway, Elephant and Castle branch, to the manager of Post Office customer services. It is dated Christmas eve. It seems that the bank felt so strongly that even that was not an inappropriate date on which to make its views clear. It states:

"Dear Mr. MacDonald,

I note your comments concerning the need to reduce costs but perhaps an intensified marketing effort will do that, in relative terms, for you? The office in question is, as you will be aware, adjacent to a newly refurbished sorting office and one would think that, if efficiency is being considered, such a situation could not be bettered. I am reluctant to pursue a point unnecessarily but experience of large organisations leads me to suspect that proper consideration from a cost effective view-point is not always given in such circumstances. Convenience from a geographical aspect is certainly no basis on which to assess the validity of a decision in heavily developed areas. I am pleased to note that no final decision has been made and hope that attention will be given to ensure that the service elsewhere is improved to compensate for any closures.

Yours sincerely,
M. J. Mayhew, Manager".

Local accountants who with the banks and others attended the chamber of commerce meeting were astonished to discover that only a few months after this major refubishment the office would not be used at all and would be closed. The only rational explanation is conspiratorial, that is, that the post office intended to do that and then to acquire the counter area for the sorting office. Will the Minister either deny that or say that he accepts that it would be folly to have made such a major investment and not to use it for the intended purpose?

Thirdly, the business in the post office is increasing. That is not surprising because the area is being developed. The Government gave the London Docklands Development Corporation the job of developing the docklands, and it is doing so. The decline in inner London continues, but the figures show that in north Southwark we have turned the corner. I hope that we have. Certainly, post office business increased by 10 per cent. last year and will probably increase by 17 per cent. this year. That is a funny sort of unprofitable business to close.

I shall now deal with the criterion of the sorts of users. There are many pensioners in Southwark. It is the borough in south-east London with the most pensioners as a proportion of the population. North Southwark has the most pensioners—20·7 per cent. of the population. It does not need much imagination to realise that pensioners find it increasingly difficult to go further afield for the variety of services that the Post Office provides.

People are writing in the following terms:

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

"Dear Sir,

This is shocking news to me to read of the proposed closure of P.O. 239 Borough High Street. I am 94 years old and can only walk short distances—to walk any further would be a terrible burden to bear. As holder of 2 War Medals in World War 1, we did not fight our enemies just so that things like this could happen here. Please save No. 239. Yours truly,

A. J. Vinden."

For thousands of pensioners, going to the post office is bound up with their ability to remain fit and active. It is sometimes difficult, and it is made no easier if they must go further than they are physically able to go. To say that because an area of an inner city has post offices closer together than elsewhere and to discount the great disproportion of pensioners in the community relative to many other places is unfair and heartless.

I now turn to the difficulties that must be taken into account. The district postmaster knows of the inadequate and often slow bus services, the pavements and alleyways off Borough high street that are packed with prams, shopping, luggage, people who are blind, handicapped and disabled, and wheelchairs. One does not need much imagination to realise the volume of traffic there. The Post Office suggests that people use the underpasses. It is not advisable for people of 64, let alone 90, to use underpasses, especially in the winter and the wet for reasons which most of us appreciate.

I could argue the case for hours, but I shall not. It is important to use this opportunity both for this case and the many other cases about which hon. Members may not have the opportunity to make the same points.

A petition of the friends and members of the church of St. George the Martyr, Borough high street, states that 6,504 customers a week use the post office, 1,732 pensioners are paid there, 571 child benefit payments are made, and 1,081 unemployment and sick benefits are paid. It continues:

"The alternative is to go to the Post Office at London Bridge. For three quarters of the year it means a long walk for the old, the sick, and the mothers with little children along the Borough High Street in the teeth of a bitter NE wind. Even to start upon this means crossing main roads at one of the most dangerous crossings in London. If it is suggested that people go by bus they would have a very dangerous crossing either going or coming back, and, in any case, the bus stops at London Bridge would not put them down anywhere near the Post Office. In any case the Post Office at London Bridge is always very busy.

If you suggest that friends should get the pension you must understand that the high proportion of old people means that this is too difficult to achieve. We should be glad to demonstrate to you our peculiar difficulties if you could spend a short time with us. Have you ever watched the old people struggling along through the crowds in the Borough High Street, on the uneven paving stones, having crossed through the thick streams of traffic, with their lorries and buses? Have you ever pushed a pram up and down the curbs of all the entrances which once led to the inn yards of times gone by? Or, because of going the other way, to the Elephant and Castle, have you ever gone in fear of being mugged? We ask you"— this is the crucial point—

"to consider the reality of our lives, rather than make your decisions according to theory".

Another consideration is that other post offices are nearby. The obvious remark is that nearby post offices are often busy already. I went on a little walkabout with the district manager one Friday. He told me that it would not be a busy day, because Friday was traditionally quiet. He told me that the average waiting time was 90 seconds; it happened to be nine minutes. He was embarrassed. So he should have been, because it is not working as the Post Office imagines or pretends.

The last criterion that the Post Office asks us to consider is the development of the area. When we talk about rural post offices, we say that they are important to the communities. But they are no less important in urban areas. The area is being developed and we shall have 17,000 more people in the next 10 years. I suppose that in a few years' time the Post Office will say, "Now we need another office." It so happens that it owns the building in which this office is situated, so it will not save much by closing it. Would it not be better to keep up the present service, although it is inadequate?

The argument will come down, finally, to cost. Therefore, at the chamber of commerce meeting, which was attended by accountants and business people, we asked, "What do you make at the post office in Borough high street? Do you make a loss or a profit?" The district postmaster and the regional director said, "We do not know. We do not work out whether we make a loss or a profit on all these offices." The Government tell us that the Post Office is supposed to be a business. Not many businesses would deserve to survive for long if they did not know whether they made a loss or a profit. The intelligent business people at that meeting could not believe their ears. No Government can countenance closing offices when the Post Office does not know whether it makes a loss or a profit.

If the Government investigated, what would they discover? First, the post office in Borough high street, like all others, is increasingly productive. There have been many redundancies agreed with the union since 1981 to make a considerably more productive office. Secondly, they would discover that this office makes a profit—probably a substantial one. Then their argument would be, "We cannot keep only the offices that make a profit. If we do, we must close all the offices that make a loss." That is one of those arguments that sounds as though the protagonists are determined to win every way round.

The Post Office is either a service, in which case the places that sometimes make a loss are supported by those which make a profit, or it is a business, in which case the Government should want offices to make a profit to support those which do not, or it is neither. In reality, it should be both, and it makes a profit. Last year, the counters made a profit of £12 million and the Post Office as a whole made a profit of more than £100 million. There can be no financial justification for saying that those offices should close.

Of course, the Post Office may say, as its final gasp, "We give in. There is a need for this office, so we shall close the Crown office and open a sub-post office across the road." If that is the thinking—I suspect that it might be—it concedes the validity of our argument. If there is a need for an office across the road, there is a need for an office at the present site. It will make no difference whether the office is situated across the road or whether it stays where it is, especially as it is making a profit where it is. There is no evidence that it will make a greater profit across the road.

If consultation is not a sham, the consultation that has been carried out should be considered. If ever there was a post office which, on any rational appraisal of the argument, should be saved, the head post office for south-east London passes the test.

It is not sufficient for the Government to say that there are still a good number of offices in south-east London and that Southwark has the best service of all. All those offices are busy and needed. Everyone uses them and wants them. Businesses are expanding and the area is developing—it is a densely populated, bustling part of what we all want to be a prosperous capital city.

We have the tradition of a postal service as a service to our people. I hope that the House is in no doubt that in my constituency, as elsewhere, we are determined that the Post Office will hear our arguments, will heed them and will keep those offices open.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has drawn attention to the problems associated with the closure of main post offices in his part of Southwark. In so doing, he highlights the repercussions and problems elsewhere in Southwark. He outlined the criteria for the closure of Crown and sub-post offices, and he put his finger on the weak spot—that the criteria may exist in a doctrinaire way, but they are not costed criteria. They do not take into account the profitability or potential profitability of the offices that may be closed. They seem to be concerned more with geographical criteria than with prosperity and profitability.

I want to draw attention to an area where those criteria have singularly failed. In the southerly part of Southwark, in Croxted road, a post office was run by a sub-postmaster who felt obliged to resign. The sub-post office was closed, which brought in its wake a terrible trail of tragedy for a number of people who relied on it for both their livelihood and their social contact. The position is heightened in sadness because there are two potential—and, I believe, already approved — sub-postmasters who are ready, willing and able to be appointed. However, representations at every level in the Post Office have failed to bring about any change of attitude towards that sub-post office, which was closed by an act of fate rather than a properly reasoned decision by the Post Office.

I want to touch upon those aspects of the closure that are not usually considered by the Post Office in looking at its criteria for deciding whether an office should close, or whether, having been closed, should not be re-opened. In this case, the office was situated on the Lambeth side of the borough boundary, but it was equally shared and used by my constituents and people living in Norwood. It fulfilled a very real social need for the many elderly people who drew their pensions and other benefits there, and for the parents of very young children. It fulfilled that personal social objective which has not been taken fully into account by the Post Office in setting its criteria.

That is an immediate and, perhaps, short-term problem. However, there is a long-term problem. The office was in a community of two dozen shops which, to a large extent, depend upon the existence of a post office. People drew their money at the office and spent it in the surrounding shops. It was a convenient shopping point for a number of people. The failure of the Post Office to supply that service means that those who drew their money from that office now have to go further afield, and therefore spend further afield.

During the past few months, two of the two dozen shops have closed and another three are threatened with closure because they cannot keep up the volume of business without the sub-post office. More is involved than the profitability of that sub-post office. It represented a cornerstone, a keystone, a kingpin for that commercial community. If that is taken away, that commercial community will collapse.

The Post Office has suggested alternatives for those who normally used that sub-post office. As with other alternatives which, I suspect, have been proffered in other areas, impossible, or almost impossible, conditions of travel are involved. In this case, there is no direct public transport route. That means either that the elderly must change buses, with the attendant problems, or run the danger of being mugged or suffering in other ways as a result of having to carry money through the streets of south London.

The post office has been used by a neighbouring estate for the payment of rent to the boroughs. It would present an unfair and heavy burden on those who pay their rents by that means to have to take their money a mile or further to the next office, with all the danger involved.

For those reasons, which are well known, which have been highlighted by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey and which are reflected in many other parts of south-east London, it seems that the criteria on which the Post Office has decided to close post offices, or to leave closed offices which have been closed, are not purely commercial and rational, but are doctrinaire. I urge the Minister to look seriously at the basis on which the Post Office is making decisions of this kind.

For the Croxted road post office we have tried to get the figures of profitability and potential. It is evident either that those responsible for making decisions are not prepared to disclose the figures because it would damage their case to disclose them, or, as is more likely, that they have no idea of the figures.

Being a commercial organisation, the Post Office must act in a commercial way. I submit that, from the case to which the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, has drawn attention, and the case of the post office in Croxted road to which I have referred, it is clear that the criteria have been employed in a way that is neither rational nor commercial.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Traditionally, Adjournment debates are occasions when hon. Members raise grievances. Tonight, we do not come to the Government as subject peoples craving the indulgence of a monarchical figure. The people we represent are the owners of the enterprise with which we are concerned and for which, for a temporary period, the Minister is indirectly responsible. He has transferred to that responsibility from other duties and he may yet be transferred to others. The Post Office, meanwhile, goes on and the needs of those who use it go on.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) for raising this subject and for the support that was given by the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden). I am pleased to have this opportunity to join in the debate because there is widespread grievance throughout the country at the way people are being treated by those who run the nation's property.

The way in which they are running it is hurting elderly people and those who cannot walk without difficulty. Public transport is disappearing. It is hurting mothers with young children as they move along crowded pavements with their charges. There is no rhyme or rational reason for a great deal of what is going on.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is from docklands. I am pleased to say that half the area of docklands is in the London borough of Newham, all in my constituency. In the borough of Newham, five sub-post offices are closing. In or close to docklands, two are being closed, one at Boundary road and the other at Roman road, East Ham. In one part of docklands, meanwhile, we want a post office to be opened, but, despite the excellent case for it, the Post Office will not open one, or has not so far opened one. I shall return to that subject.

First, I wish to observe some curious features of this terrible affair which is breaking out throughout the country like a rash of measles. The Government have given the Post Office targets. I suggest that they are arbitrary and are not necessarily realistic. Some of my London colleagues amd I have had extensive correspondence with Sir Ronald Dearing, who I thank for the courtesy of listening to an hour and a half's argument, although it djd not leave us much the wiser.

He said that one reason for the closure of post offices, which he hoped would result in the saving of £15 million to £20 million a year, was that more funds would be available for new investment and new business. He hopes to retain the business that he holds.

It is argued that the post offices must close, especially the two in docklands which I have mentioned. Sir Ronald has told me that there will be savings of about £8,000 at each of the five sub-offices that are to be closed. That implies that the savings will be made and that the same transactions will take place elsewhere. The savings will be marginal if the transactions are held, which is the Post Office's objective. The savings relative to turnover will be relatively small and, to some extent, problematic.

In his latest letter to me, Sir Ronald submits that he will not be able to say until the end of the exercise how much of the new investment will arise from savings. I should like to know whether the Government have required a notional degree of savings from the Post Office's own resources to be part of the new investment which the Post Office believes should be made. If that requirement has been made, the entire closure programme is specious and illogical.

In Newham there is an area of dockland known as Beckton, where a mini new town is arising. There will be up to 20,000 new people in the area and, we hope, an associated industrial area. The district centre is like a new town centre but on a rather smaller scale. There will be a number of facilities and there is a large one there already —an Asda superstore with space for parking 700 cars. It has over 30 checkouts. There is also a shopping mall and the Newham post office liaison committee has requested the Post Office to place at least a sub-post office in the mall and perhaps a Crown post office. There is a growing population and most of them are mortgage payers who can enjoy some optional expenditure.

The mall would have been an apt spot for new business but despite the opportunity, the Post Office has not opened a branch office as requested. Instead, it is closing two branch offices that are not far away. The one in Roman road, East Ham, serves an isolated area with a high proportion of pensioners, who will have to get to the nearest sub-post office by walking up and down steps over the northern outfall sewer bank, which will be extremely difficult for many of them. I understand from the district postmaster that the Roman road sub-post office will be closed after the backlog of the Newcastle social security payments has been made up, as will the one in Boundary road in my constituency, which can present an equally good case for being kept open.

This pattern is probably repeated in every constituency in Britain with urban areas. I would have made this speech in any event, but over the weekend I was provided with information at short notice about a Crown post office in London. I have written to the hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke) about the New Fetter lane Crown post office where many of my constituents, and no doubt the constituents of all London Members, might well do business.

The local branch of the Union of Communication Workers wrote to the freeholders of the site on which the post office is situated. It wrote:

"The Post Office management locally have informed us from time to time that one of the reasons that New Fetter Lane post office had been selected for closure is that your company refuses to allow them a lease renewal."

The union and the company concerned have kindly allowed me to read the reply sent by a responsible person in that company. The letter stated:

"So far as the particular is concerned, I should not normally wish to disclose to anyone else the detailed agreement between"— the letter names the company concerned—

"and the Post Office regarding Fetter Lane. However, I can tell you that the present lease does not expire until December 1986 and that there has not, so far, been any discussion about what should happen after that."

There may be some misunderstanding, but the point is that, in respect of most of these closures, there has been mysticism and distrust and lack of confidence in the Post Office administration which is widespread and typified by this correspondence.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman kindly mentioned that point to me earlier. Although it was not germane to my argument, I must tell the Minister that Merton district post office is in a similar position. That post office was told that London Transport, which owns the freehold, wanted the leasehold to revert to it in September 1983. When LRT was asked about the matter, it said that the post office could have the leasehold as long as it liked. I say that in support of the hon. Gentleman and I hope that the Minister will take heed and ascertain what is happening.

Mr. Spearing: I come to the crunch line—the name of the company, which it has kindly allowed me to reveal. It is no less than Mirror Group Newspapers. Perhaps that was not known to the Post Office, which has written leading articles on this matter. The letter from the company continued:

"We shall continue to resist closure of Post Offices and we will be glad to hear from you of any developments which you think might help with the campaign.

Yours sincerely,
R. Maxwell."

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey for his intervention. We have two cases where verbal or written information from the Post Office, although it may have been given in good faith by the functionaries, has turned out to be highly questionable, if not incorrect.

I put it to the Minister and through him to Sir Ronald Dearing, with whom I have had extensive correspondence, that this calls into question the basis of the closure of any sub-post office or Crown post office. If the Post Office wants to expand and to increase the confidence of business and individuals, this is not the way in which to go about it. The Minister should use his powers to ensure that the programme is stopped and that a total reassessment of the Post Office closure programme is started by the Government and pursued by the Post Office in pursuit of its duties to the public.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): I am grateful to the hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden). We appreciate their concern. The Government have frequently stated their recognition of the important role that post offices play in our social and economic life. I referred to this on 23 January when the House had a full debate on post office closures. I referred to the recognition by this Government, like our predecessors, that the Post Office is a commercial organisation and that it is not only right but essential that it should look to ways to improve efficiency. Unless the Post Office does so, the future of the entire network will be imperilled and its ability to play any role in the life of the country will be in doubt.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey attended at least part of the debate on 23 January, and I imagine that little of what I have to say to him will be news. In particular, it should come as no surprise to him that I have no intention of intervening in the Post Office's proposals to close the two post offices to which he has referred. Not only would it be wholly wrong for me to seek to intervene but I have no power to do so. It would be inappropriate for me to comment in detail on the particular circumstances of these decisions.

The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey, for Newham, South and my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich will appreciate that what they have said will be closely read and studied by the chairman of the Post Office and the board member responsible for counter services. To that extent, nothing that hon. Members have said tonight has been wasted, but they will appreciate that their representations must be properly addressed to that quarter and not to me.

I appreciate that no post office closure is popular. It will not surprise hon. Members to know that I am no exception, as I have a closure in my constituency. I well know from my constituency mail bag what people think about such matters. It is also understandable that the constituents of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey who currently use those two post offices, like people elsewhere in the country who use post offices which face closure, consider that theirs are special cases. It is for the Post Office and not the Government to consider each case and to make decisions.

It should be clearly understood that the Post Office is responsible for running the counters network and decisions about individual post offices are operational ones for it and not for the Government. That is in accordance with the clear distinction, of which I am sure all hon. Members are aware, between the respective roles of the Government and the Post Office Board. That goes back to the establishment in 1969 of the Post Office as a public corporation with its board. It has been the policy of successive Governments, embodied in the relevant legislation, that decisions about the day-to-day management of the business are the responsibility of the board. The Government's role is confined to broad issues of general policy and matters of overall financial control.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey referred to section 11 of the Post Office Act 1969, which relates to directions of a general character for remedying a defect in the general plan or arrangements of the Post Office for exercising its powers. A closure decision, in our view, cannot be regarded as a general plan or arrangement under any definition or construction of those words. That is why—I said this on 23 January—we do not believe that we have the powers, nor do we seek them, to intervene is such detailed matters.

The Government's interest and responsibilities relate to the overall network, and we consider the Post Office's proposals for the urban network in that context.

It might be helpful if I set the Post Office's proposals for reducing the size of the urban counters network and the Government's role and reaction in regard to those proposals in their proper context. The network of post offices is the largest retail chain in the country. In March last year it consisted of 20,499 sub-post offices and 1,559 Crown offices. The current programme to reduce the size of the urban network by up to 5 per cent. will mean a network at the end of the 1986-87 financial year of about 19,500 sub-post offices and 1,490 Crown offices. The reduction is hardly draconian, by anyone's standards.

Although the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey made the acceptable debating point that a local closure is a 100 per cent. closure, that is on the assumption that there is no alternative. I am sure that he accepts that there are eight alternative offices within a mile of the Bermondsey branch office and nine alternative offices within a mile of the 239 Borough high street post office. I am not saying that they are equally convenient for all his constituents. Of course they are not. I hope that he will accept that it is not possible to say that it is a 100 per cent. closure and that there is no alternative post office within a mile when he considers the numbers that I have mentioned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich was somewhat dismissive about costing and profitability. In my speech on 23 January on the subject of post office closures I said that when the Post Office carried out its major review of counters in 1983 it revealed of which my hon. Friends will be aware

"2,000 urban offices in excess of the one-mile criterion"

"and 2,000 urban post offices that are unprofitable, as are about three quarters of the 11,000 rural post offices."—[Official Report, 23 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 998.]

These have been deliberately exempted from any part of the closure programme.

I have emphasised profitability. For the Post Office to know what is unprofitable it has, by definition, to be aware of what is profitable and unprofitable. I hope that no hon. Member is suggesting that the Post Office does not have the ability to make calculations of that kind, because most certainly it does.

By its nature, the counters business is an operation that has high fixed costs and the economics of running it depends heavily upon the volume of business which is undertaken. I have stressed that the Post Office is a commercial organisation, and it is under no illusions that it is owed a living. It recognises that there are effective competitive alternatives for many of the services available in the post offices and is well aware that if the counters network is to retain existing business and win new business it must provide an efficient and cost-effective service at prices which customers are prepared to pay. The majority of the business undertaken at counters is work for Government Departments, public corporations and local authorities. They use the network because it provides a cost-effective way of meeting their requirements. It would be quite wrong to expect these agency customers to use the counters network irrespective of their costs which are, of course, borne by their customers, whether they are taxpayers or ratepayers.

Not only is it sensible, in purely business terms, for the Post Office to look towards improving its efficiency; it is also under a clear statutory duty to do so. Its statutory duty also requires it to have regard to the social needs of the United Kingdom. I should stress that the Post Office takes this part of its duty just as seriously as the requirement to have regard to efficiency and economy.

Earlier today I had the pleasure of flying over the constituency of the hon. Member for Newham, South. Also I impinged slightly on the air space of the constituency of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey while I was looking at the excellent and impressive London docklands development. Later I drove past the Asda development to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Therefore I can confirm what he said about its existence. It appears to be an extremely significant development and I am sure that the words he has put on the record tonight will be closely scrutinised by Sir Ronald Dearing and his colleagues on the Post Office Board. If there is to be a new development, as certainly appeared to be the case from the air, there will certainly be the potential for new customers, and the Post Office is always interested in new customers.

Since 1945 the Post Office has had the criterion of providing post offices in town areas at intervals of no less than a mile. This is not, and was never intended to be, a precise and inflexible standard. It represents what the Post Office has regarded as a reasonable balance between the service its customers would like and the costs involved. The Post Office has not applied the criterion rigidly but over the years has made decisions about particular post offices in the light of local circumstances. Up to the late 1960s the network grew, due to new housing development, population growth and growth in business. However, changes in the distribution of population were not fully reflected in the provision of post offices and a review which the Post Office undertook in 1983 revealed an excess of about 2,000 offices against the criterion. It is worth while, particularly in a debate that has dwelt upon the constituencies that have been referred to this evening, for the House to bear in mind that the population of inner London has declined by nearly 30 per cent. over the last 20 years.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I accept what the Minister said about his powers, but if there was an argument that the interpretation and use of the various criteria—not just the one mile criterion, but all the others—were not being properly carried out by the Post Office, surely he will accept that he would have a power to review the consultation and other criteria as applied, because otherwise there is no court of appeal. There is only the Minister. He is the only person to whom one can turn if the Post Office does anything wrong. I should be grateful if the Minister could confirm that because, on some of those issues, clearly the general does not apply to the particular cases that he has heard about this evening.

Mr. Pattie: I shall refer in a moment to consultation, because it is an important point. The Government feel that there is a duty to intervene only if there is some evidence of what I would describe as a widespread abuse by the Post Office of its statutory powers, and if it was flouting the consultation procedures, and not making any attempt to provide a proper service or take account of its statutory requirements. Only in such a situation would the Government intervene. The situation would then have developed beyond a mere local difficulty, and become general and widespread.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. I am conscious of the time, but he touched on an important point that I raised, and to which he has not yet referred in detail. If the example that I gave—the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) gave another—is shown to be correct, would it not be within the criteria that he has just outlined, in that, as a prima facie case, incorrect, and knowingly incorrect, information has been given by the Post Office in the course of that consultation?

Mr. Pattie: I do not think that it would be. I have said —not, I hope, in an ex cathedra way—that in my view the Post Office, in order to cause the Government to feel that they should invoke their general powers, would have to give substantial, widespread and nationwide prima facie evidence that it was abusing the criteria under which it operates.

After the review in 1983, the Post Office informed the Government about the outcome of the review and the proposals that it had framed to reduce the number of post offices in urban areas. Our concern was to ensure that the proposals did not prejudice our commitment to the maintenance of a network sufficiently adequate to enable the Post Office to fulfil its statutory duty with regard to efficiency and economic and social needs. The Post Office's proposals included its intention to consult the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, the Post Office trade unions and the Post Office Users National Council. It also confirmed that individual closure proposals would be subject to the existing code of procedure agreed with POUNC in 1981 and revised in January 1984 to include Crown offices, which provides for consultation with local interests before final decisions are made to close individual offices. We were satisfied with the overall balance that the Post Office was seeking to strike between the needs of those whom it serves and the need for reasonable economy and efficiency, and that the proposals were not inconsistent with its statutory duty. However, that is the extent of our involvement, as I have said.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey talked about violent opposition and so on. He is making the assumption that the consultation process is somehow concluded simply because he is apparently aware of some decision that is on the desk of perhaps the director of the London region. It is my understanding that the decisions that he is drawing to the attention of the House have not yet been finally taken. The hon. Gentleman might regard this Adjournment debate as an adjunct to the consultation process. I have evidence that in over 10 per cent. of the cases that the Post Office has had before it on the closure programme, the Post Office has withdrawn the proposals. I do not think that any reasonable person who is minded to take an objective view could say that that shows, as some people have said — I know that the hon. Gentleman has not said this — that the consultation process is some sort of charade. That remark was made —it is a rather unworthy remark—in the debate on 23 January. I know that the Post Office takes the consultation process seriously. It is not blinkered in any way in its approach, nor does it regard any of its proposals as being what I would describe as a foregone conclusion. I repeat, however, that today's proceedings will be closely studied by Sir Ronald Dearing and the Post Office Board.

I have read the correspondence between the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey and various senior officials, including a letter from the London regional director who, I understand, has since retired. In a letter dated 21 February Mr. A. G. Brown stated:

"I am, of course, delighted to accede to your request for a meeting and I must agree with you that it would make more sense to discuss the matter with both of you at once."

I was therefore surprised to learn that that meeting with the hon. Gentleman and his colleague had not taken place.

Mr. Simon Hughes: No criticism of Mr. Brown was implied. He did not leave in any sense under a cloud. He has been replaced fairly quickly and I understand that his undertaking is to be honoured by his successor. Any delay is merely a result of a changeover at that level of management and is no one's fault. My colleague and I look forward to meeting the new regional director.

Mr. Pattie: I merely mention the matter as examination of the correspondence suggested that the ball might be in the hon. Gentleman's court.

As I explained in the debate on 23 January, in undertaking the review of the urban counters network and in framing the subsequent proposals to reduce the size of the network, the Post Office's aim is to improve the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of the network. The Post Office is well aware that closures are not popular but believes that the exercise is essential to secure the future of the network, for the long-term benefit of the community. The Post Office has the Government's full support in those efforts.

England-Scotland Football Match

9.56 pm

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): I am grateful for this opportunity to discuss a matter that has arisen since this week's Adjournment debates were selected — the transfer of the England-Scotland match on 25 May from Wembley in London to Hampden park in my constituency in Glasgow.

The decision was taken by the Football Association on 29 March. The reason given was that the Government had made it clear that they did not wish the game to take place in London on a bank holiday weekend because, partly as there would be more crowds and partly due to insufficient policing, they felt that disorder could easily occur both at the stadium and in the streets of London.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment with responsibility for sport wrote in a letter:

"The Government is extremely concerned that the current timing of this fixture increases the risk of disorder".

I appreciate that in expressing that view the Government did not say that they wished the game to be transferred to Hampden park. They wished the game to take place mid-week, as it did two years ago, rather than on a Saturday especially on a bank holiday weekend.

The Government have made it clear both in meetings with Members of Parliament and publicly to the press that they do not regard themselves as in any way responsible for the implications and results of the decision taken by the Football Association, but I disagree. First, we must ask ourselves a simple question. Would the transfer have taken place if the Minister with responsibility for sport had said nothing or if the Prime Minister had not expressed great concern about the hooliganism that had occurred at the Millwall-Luton match a few days earlier? The answer to that question is no. The transfer would not have taken place. The FA and the Scottish Football Association, of their own violition, would not have transferred the game to Hampden park. The transfer was made under Government pressure. It was because the Government were frightened about football hooliganism that the FA took that decision.

The Government may say that the FA's solution was not what they wanted. If the Government had not wished the game to be played on a holiday weekend, why did they not protest further and make it clear that if it was wrong to play such a game at Wembley on a bank holiday weekend, or indeed any weekend, because of possible crowd disturbance——

It being Ten o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Mr. Maxton: If it was right that the game should not be played at Wembley on a holiday weekend, and if Ministers had therefore asked that it should be played in the middle of a week, why did they make no protest? Why did they make no effort to tell the FA or the SFA that if it was wrong to play the game at Wembley on a holiday weekend, it would be equally wrong to play it at Hampden?

That weekend is a holiday weekend in Scotland as well as in England. If there is a risk of violence, it will now be my constituents and the constituents of other Glasgow Members, rather than the citizens of London, who will be put at risk. If there is a risk, the Minister should have protested against the playing of the match at Hampden at the weekend, just as he protested against its being played in London.

Many people in Scotland feel that the real reason for the change was that any disturbance will now appear to have been caused by hooligan Scots. A fortnight before the announcement, during discussions after the Millwall-Luton match, I heard a well-known football correspondent say on the radio that the England-Scotland match would take place because it was profitable, even if that meant that the hooligan tartan hordes would be let loose on the streets of London.

The record of Scottish football fans has improved considerably. Scottish fans behave considerably better abroad than English travelling fans, whose behaviour abroad or at away games is far worse than their behaviour at Wembley. If there is an insult here, it is an insult to Scottish football fans. Over the past few years the amount of hooliganism in Scotland has decreased. I attended the 1983-84 league cup final between Rangers and Celtic. The match took place on a Sunday afternoon—I agree that that made a difference—but I took my sons, aged 9 and 11 years to that game, and there was no trouble whatsoever in a game that is traditionally associated with violence.

Scottish fans who travelled to Spain for the world cup were congratulated by the Spanish authorities and police on their behaviour. More recently, when Scotland played in the world cup qualifying games in Spain, the Scottish fans were again congratulated by the Spanish authorities on their behaviour.

I read in the press this morning that last weekend there had been many stabbings, scenes of violence and arrest at two semi-finals in England, but that the police had again congratulated Scottish fans at those two semi-finals on their behaviour.

In recent years, awareness of violence at Scottish football matches has increased and the problem has been tackled. As Minister responsible for sport in Scotland, Frank McElhone did football in Scotland a tremendous service when he produced his report. The Minister for Sport nods his head. That is fine, but the report is now eight years old. What have the English authorities done about it? I accept that the Government incorporated part of the report in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980, which bans the carriage of drink into almost every football ground in Scotland bars drunks and forbids drink on football supporters' coaches and trains.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that it might be because the Scottish Football Association has been so successful in eliminating violence from grounds that the Government wanted to switch the match to Scotland because Scotland could be trusted whereas England could not?

Mr. Maxton: I take my hon. Friend's point. Perhaps Scotland is suffering from its own success. That seems a bit rough on my constituents. I suspect that it will be some of the English fans who cause the problem.

The law bans more than alcoholic drinks. Any container that can be interpreted as a missile is forbidden from a ground—it might be a Coke can, a lemonade bottle or even a Thermos flask. The law seems to have reduced the violence. Dunfermline college of further education recently did a study which showed that all-seat stadiums produce less violence.

It might be argued that my constituents are used to football crowds going through, but they plan ahead and know when the games will take place. This game has been sprung on them. Organisations and clubs have made arrangements for that day and will have them disrupted. It will not be possible to get near bowling greens and tennis courts because cars and coaches will be parked on side streets all around the ground. Even if there is no trouble there will be disruption.

We should also consider the cost incurred by those who had arranged to travel to Wembley. Many have already booked coaches, hotels on the way and hotels in London. A range of organisations are affected. They might have paid deposits for the full fee, but the Government are making no effort to ensure that they are compensated.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a cost to the public purse in the form of policing arangements and others to accommodate the fans?

Mr. Maxton: That is an important point which the Government have not answered. I assume that they will give Strathclyde region police force extra funding. Perhaps they would like to subvent Department of the Environment money to do that. The loss that worries me is that of fans. Football fans come from the poorer quarter of the community and some of them will have saved for two years to make the journey to London. They are now to lose money.

British Rail and ABTA should be congratulated, because they have been prepared to make an effort to ensure that some repayment is made. However, many supporters have not booked through travel agents which are members of ABTA. Many people have made their own arrangements, such as travelling with one-man operation coach companies. Such companies are not in a position to compensate and will not do so.

Many other people have booked into hotels which do not belong to the major chains. Here again, these small London hotels will be unable to make refunds. Therefore, many people will lose money—individuals, small travel agencies and even some of the larger ones. Indeed, some of the smaller travel agencies say that they could be forced out of business as a result.

The minimum which the Governmnt should do is to call a meeting of all the organisations concerned to ensure that compensation is properly co-ordinated, In my view, they should make some funds available for compensation, because they are responsible. Whether this decision was inadvertent is irrelevant. The Government created the situation by putting a lot of pressure on the Football Association to transfer the game. Whether the game should be played at Hampden or at another venue is also irrelevant. This situation would not have occurred but for Government intervention.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that this ought to be the most important annual fixture between two international sides? Had the Scottish and English Football Associations been asked in January to consider changing to another weekend, would they not have been well advised to think seriously about doing it then so that they could have given plenty of notice about an alternative venue?

Mr. Maxton: I know that the English Association was told, but I do not think that the Scottish Football Association was made aware of this possible change. However, to some extent the football authorities bear some responsibility, because to saythe least they have been criminally stupid.

There is, however, a case for Government compensation, because the Government created the problem. It was they who put on the pressure after the deplorable scenes at the Luton-Millwall match. In the longer term, the Government must clarify the future of the England-Scotland match at Wembley. Following our meeting with the Minister responsible for sport, the press thought he made it clear that never again would the England-Scotland match take place at Wembley on a Saturday. We should be told tonight whether or not that is true, If it is, it is an even greater insult to the Scottish fans.

In effect the Minister is saying, "We will not transfer the cup final or the rugby league final from a Saturday. the only game that we will insist is played mid-week is the England-Scotland match." The implication is that the scottish fans are causing the problem, yet we saw the trouble that was caused at the two FA cup semi-finals in England, which presumably will occur at the final to be played at Wembley on a Saturday. Therefore, the Government must think seriously about the implications of this decision.

I hope that they will now introduce legislation along the lines of the McElhone report, not the half-hearted measures which they are at present proposing, which suggest that drink will be banned only at grounds where trouble is caused. All football grounds should be told to ban drink. Such a ban should even include Twickenham and Murrayfield. There must be fairness which is apparent to all, and if a ban applies only to some grounds it will be unjust and unfair.

Funds must be made available to ensure that football recovers and that football grounds become social centres. That was the other half of the McElhone report which was never put into effect. It should be implemented now so that football grounds again become the social centres which large numbers of people can attend. The Government are responsible, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

10.9 pm

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) for leaving me a few minutes, and to the Minister for agreeing that I should contribute to the debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend on his usual diligence in seeing the opportunity for a second Adjournment debate, and on choosing an important subject. Although the terraces in this arena may be empty tonight, I assure all those who are present that the terraces in Scotland are livid at the way in which the Government have acted in such a ham-handed fashion and bungled the issue of the Scotland-England football international.

For an ex-president of the Scottish rugby union to intervene and defend the decision to transfer the game at the last minute tempts me to ask what might have happened if it had been the Calcutta cup match—but then, it would not have happened with rugby. The Government have a heavy responsibility to bear. The intervention of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) was highly inaccurate because the Scottish Football Association did not receive a letter from the Government on 10 January. Only the English Football Association received it. The Government are responsible for bungling the matter and casting a slur on the good name and hard-earned good reputation of Scottish football supporters.

I give a hearty welcome to all the England supporters who will come to Hampden on 25 May and to the Prime Minister if she wishes to come. But the most dangerous event in Scotland in May will be the Tory party conference at Perth. All the English supporters who come to Hampden will see how football supporters should behave. The incident that triggered off this issue was the violence at the Luton-Millwall match. The English Football Association dispensed a punishment of a £7,000 fine on Millwall for which the chairman had to write a cheque there and then, and told Luton Town to build a fence around its stadium, which costs £30,000. The total fine, therefore, was £37,000. The consequences have been more far-reaching.

The Government's intervention has produced a shambles. It was caused by the Prime Minister meddling in something that she should have left well alone. I would not be averse to her staying in the far east, the middle east or whatever eastern state she wishes to visit until the international is over. She should have kept out of the matter. However, as soon as she saw an opportunity to wage yet another war she could not possibly resist it. This time the war was about the Scotland-England football international.

The Minister will say that the Government did not insist that the venue of the game be changed. However, in a year when the EFA and SFA are involved in the World Cup qualifying matches, and at a time when both English and Scottish cup finals are taking place and when senior clubs from England, which provide many of the internationalists who will play in the Scotland-England match, are involved in European cup finals, to suggest that they could have found another date was tantamount to suggesting that the game be cancelled completely. The Minister with responsibility for sport was primarily responsible for this. I do not believe that the Scottish Office was consulted. The first that it knew about it was on Friday when the announcement was made. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand the confusion and congestion of dates at this time in the football season, he is not fit to be Minister with responsibility for sport.

That sums up this whole sorry state of affairs. By universal agreement the Minister responsible for sport must resign to atone for his fumbling incompetence. I hope that when the Minister replies he will make it abundantly clear that this is not a slur on Scottish football supporters who have rightly earned a high reputation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): First, may I congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) on his speed and his knowledge of procedure in obtaining this second Adjournment debate. It seems to be a characteristic of Scottish Labour Whips, because the last time that I answered an Adjournment debate in similar circumstances, it was initiated by the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg).

The facts about the match were set out in Hansard by my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport in a written answer on 2 April, but I welcome the opportunity to set out the position more fully because it has been misinterpreted. Tonight, not so much the hon. Member for Cathcart, but certainly the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), misunderstood the position in several important aspects. The first point is that we should look back to 1983 when the England-Scotland match was switched from bank holiday Saturday following representations from British Rail, the police and the Government. Therefore, this year, my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport wrote to the Football Association, not soon after the troubles at the Luton-Millwall match, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) said, as long ago as 10 January.

Mr. Ewing: But not to the Scottish Football Association.

Mr. Stewart: The Football Association was responsible for the match, because it was originally scheduled for England. My hon. Friend wrote to express the concern of the Government and of the travel authorities about the match going ahead on bank holiday Saturday, and recommended that it be switched to another date. The Government believed that to hold the match on bank holiday Saturday would significantly increase the risk of disorder. Labour Members rightly referred to the serious problems that resulted recently from the behaviour of a minority of English football fans.

As the hon. Member for Cathcart said, the football associations decided to switch the match to Hampden. The Government were not consulted about that decision, although they were informed the day before.

The hon. Members for Cathcart and for Falkirk, East talked about the belief in some quarters that this was a slur on Scottish football fans, and I wish to nail that allegation now. I repeat what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland said in a statement:

> "I am incensed by suggestions that the decision to stage this year's England v Scotland football match in Hampden Park is the result of fears of disorder caused by Scottish supporters. Nothing could be further from the truth. In recent years we have seen Scots football fans proving they are capable of supporting their team without causing trouble. One only has to look at recent crowd troubles in England to see the contrast."

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made the fair point—I wish to underline the fact—that the police are content for the match to go ahead at Hampden, which is a tribute to Scottish football fans.

It is true, as the hon. Member for Cathcart said, that the authorities in Seville were impressed by the conduct of Scottish supporters during the 1982 World Cup finals, and at the recent World Cup qualifying match in Spain. The hon. Gentleman was right to point out the improved behaviour of Scottish football fans since the Government implemented the provisions of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980, following the excellent report from the late Frank McElhone. The football authorities and the police believe that the Act has had a major beneficial effect. Of course, it is not the whole story, and measures such as the closed circuit television system that I inspected recently are also important.

Mr. Tony Banks rose ——

Mr. Stewart: I apologies to the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot give way as I have very little time left and I must answer a number of specific points

The hon. Member asked about compensation. The decision to transfer the game was not at the request of the Government. However, our view could hardly have been a surprise to the Football Association, because it had received my hon. Friend's letter in January. I wish to join the hon. Gentleman in paying a tribute to British Rail, the Association of British Travel Agents and British Airways for their specific announcements about refund measures. I hope very much that others who hold deposits from Scottish supporters will respond in a like manner. However, there can be no question of Government compensation, as I made clear when the hon. Members for Cathcart and for Falkirk, East came to the Scottish Office to discuss the matter.

The hon. Member for Cathcart asked why it was all right to go ahead on a bank holiday weekend in Glasgow. There is no history of serious disruption on bank holiday Saturdays in Glasgow, and I do not believe that there is any reason to think that there will be serious disruption this time. Of course I regret the inconvenience to the hon. Gentleman's constituents. However, the decision was announced on 29 March, so it is not fair to say that no notice was given. There has been a reasonable period of notice for the organisations to which the hon. Gentleman referred to try to change their plans.

On police costs, I can confirm that policing arrangements for the match will be as usual. Those costs incurred inside the ground will be recoverable from the organisers of the match, while the responsibility of the police for public order outside the ground will be as usual. Although I wish to make other points, I am prepared to give way to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West, who tried to intervene earlier.

Mr. Tony Banks: I wished only to ask whether the Minister was aware of any discussions between the Department of the Environment, the Home Office and the Scottish Football Association. It is clear that the English Football Association was consulted by someone, but the Scottish Football Association was not.

Mr. Stewart: I can confirm that, following the letter from my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for sport on 10 January, there were discussions between my hon. Friend and the Football Association on this and other matters. I can also confirm that the Scottish Office was kept informed throughout by my hon. Friend.

Hon. Members have asked about future Wembley internationals, and I wish to make the position absolutely clear. The Government believe that it is a common-sense precaution to avoid the England-Scotland match being held on a bank holiday Saturday. That means that the match can be held either mid-week or on any other appropriate Saturday. That is a perfectly reasonable position. I hope that in future years the Football Association will be very meticulous about its consultations with travel authorities and the police in deciding on the dates.

This debate has been useful in putting the true position on the record and in correcting some of the misapprehensions of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East, especially on the timing——

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dental Charges

1. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the new scale of charges for National Health Service dental treatment.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): We have received representations from a number of hon. Members, the British Dental Association and members of the public relating to the recent increase in charges and the changes in the system of charges.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister confirm that the British Dental Association is extremely concerned about the confused, complex and extremely expensive structure of dental charges that he has imposed on its members? Will he also confirm that a young employed person with a diseased tooth will have to choose between paying £3·30 to have it out or £26 to have it filled? Will that contribute to good dental care?

Mr. Clarke: There will be no administrative problems in the new arrangements, and what we have introduced is fair as between patients. I recently met representatives from the British Dental Association, who said that they would put proposals before me for improving the structure of charges still further, and I said that I would look at them carefully. It has always been cheaper to have a tooth out than to have treatment, but I am glad to say that the number of teeth being extracted is steadily falling as people steadily make more use of the better parts of the service.

Mr. Galley: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that increased charges over the years have led to more people having more dental treatment and to improved dental health? Secondly, will he confirm that he will take rigorous action to pursue the exercise already undertaken by family practitioner committees to root out abuses of the system, whereby a minority of dentists boost their income by unnecessary treatment?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is right. All the increases in charges have not deterred patients from using the service, and the number of courses of dental treatment in England and Wales has risen from 28·5 million in 1979 to 32·6 million last year. I agree with my hon. Friend that his last point is important. The British Dental Association also would like to see steps taken against that minority of dentists. It is encouraging FPCs to do as he asks, and is to set up a committee to inquire into unnecessary treatment.

Mr. Donald Stewart: Has consideration been given to areas such as mine where dentists have not been available on some islands for a number of years, and therefore dental hygiene is far behind what it should be? Is he aware that people there will be faced with charges of up to £115 for remedial work as against having all their teeth extracted? How can that help such people?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is doing all that he can to improve the distribution of dentists, just as we are trying to do constantly in England. The structure of charges has been changed only to make it fairer to patients. The practice of raising charges as a contribution towards the cost of the service has been the policy of successive Governments for many years. I do not believe that any Government will change it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that his assurance that he will be prepared to review the structure of charges if there is evidence that it will be necessary is widely welcomed? Will he also give an assurance that if there is evidence that the heavy cost is deterring people from seeking treatment he will review the system to ensure that there is no deterioration in the nation's dental health?

Mr. Clarke: I have previously invited the BDA to put to me its ideas on the structure of charges and I am glad that it has agreed to do so. We will consider its suggestions carefully because we certainly need a fairer system.

I assure my hon. Friend that we should be very concerned if there were evidence that charging was affecting standards of dental health, but, despite what has been claimed, all the experience of the past few years shows that charging has not had that effect.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that the latest round of increases——

Mr. Robert Atkins: Tell us about mortgages.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This has nothing to do with mortgages.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that the latest round of dental charge increases is so large that millions of people will be forced for the first time to pay the full commercial cost, even for relatively routine treatment? Many people who previously paid only £14·50 for such treatment will now have to pay £40. Is he aware that he must be exceedingly gullible if he thinks that that will not be a deterrent to many people, especially as many practitioners in the BDA have already made clear their view that increases of this size will set dental health back a generation?

Mr. Clarke: I will not make my usual remark about the hon. Gentleman going over the top and talking nonsense, but he seems to overlook the fact that 60 per cent. of all visits to dentists are free and that we are talking only about charges for those who can afford to pay them. On average, even those who pay, pay only about 60 per cent. of the cost of treatment. Therefore, it is nonsense to say that people are paying the full commercial cost. It is not true to say that we have altered the system in that respect. I wish that I understood clearly where the hon. Gentleman stands. I shall read his policy document with care. No doubt he plans to abolish dental charges, among other things, because of the revenue that he expects to raise from abolishing tax relief on mortgages.

Blood Donors (AIDS)

2. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the change in the number of blood donors since the recent publicity about acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): Figures for recent months on the number of donations are not yet available. However, inquiries suggest that there has been some reduction in donations in the past few months. It is not possible to distinguish how much of this is due to publicity on AIDS and how much to other factors such as the bad weather experienced earlier this year.

Our revised leaflet for blood donors concerning AIDS was of course deliberately designed to cause those in the high risk groups to refrain from donation. I should like to take this opportunity to reassure all members of the public that there is absolutely no risk of contracting AIDS through donating blood.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Minister agree that there is an acute shortage of blood for the transfusion services and that at least some of the shortage is caused by people's reluctance to go to blood transfusion centres for fear of being refused the chance to donate blood because of AIDS? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that he should take further action to encourage more people to give blood?

Mr. Patten: Preliminary figures show a drop in donations of 5 or 6 per cent. in the first three months of this year. People should not be inhibited from donating blood, because there is no risk of their contracting AIDS. All the equipment is sterile and it is all disposed of immediately after use; it is used only once. We are spending £250,000 in the current financial year to encourage more people to be blood donors.

Mr. Key: Does my hon. Friend agree that those of us who are blood donors have a responsibility to give a lead? Can he assure us that the HTLV 3 test, which is promised for July, is still on target, because that will give great hope to the regional blood transfusion authorities?

Mr. Patten: Yes, we hope to have a screening test within a few weeks.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the hon. Gentleman encourage the regions to send blood to the Elstree fractional unit to get the better and safer use of blood?

Mr. Patten: That is a very good idea, especially in the run up to the opening of the new blood products laboratory at Elstree, which is on target for completion in January 1986 at a cost of £35 million.

Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act

4. Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the procedures and machinery by which he monitors the implementation by social services authorities of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): Prime responsibility for monitoring the implementation of the Act rests with local authorities themselves. They make regular returns, however, to the Department on certain services provided under the Act. The Department obtains further information on levels and standards of provision for disabled people from a number of sources, including research studies and the work of the Department's own social services inspectorate.

Mr. Morris: Is the Minister aware of the increasing concern among local authority leaders, not least the Conservative leader of Hillingdon, that in obeying the law on rates they are being forced to break the law passed by this House to help the disabled and their families? Are the Minister's right hon. Friend and the Secretary of State for the Environment prepared to meet those leaders urgently to discuss their anxieties? Will he say whether it remains Government policy that the disabled on supplementary benefit should not be charged for their home helps?

Mr. Newton: I shall take the three questions separately. I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to the right hon. Gentleman's request. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services will have heard the right hon. Gentleman. On home helps, Ministers have consistently made it clear that they would prefer those on supplementary benefit, whether disabled or otherwise, not to be charged. On resources, it is simply not my view that local authorities which practice proper policies of economy in administration need fail to fulfil their statutory duty, whether to the disabled or to others.

Mr. Boyes: I find that a disappointing and unsatisfactory answer. Does it not show that the Minister has no real understanding of the problems of local authorities in trying to implement the Act, because of rate capping and penalties? Is he not ashamed to be a member of a Government who expect chronically sick and disabled persons to pay a disproportionate price for the Government's monetarist policies? Will not the electors in the forthcoming shire county elections take that into consideration and vote Labour?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman gave a fairly good clue to the purpose of his question in his last sentence. The Government have consistently made it clear, and I repeat it today, that the needs of the disabled under the Act are something to which we hope local authorities will give proper priority. If they make sensible choices, I have no doubt that they can fulfil their responsibilities under the Act.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister accept that no local authority would admit to contravening the Act, but that all our experience shows that the level of service provided under the Act is deteriorating through lack of resources? Does he further accept that there is a need for a permanent register, regularly updated, so that there is an objective measure of those in need and the extent to which that need is being answered?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman knows that local authorities have a duty to discover the numbers and needs of people in their areas. We have tried from the outset to help them to fulfil that duty, and I have no doubt that most local authorities succeed in fulfilling it. I shall, of course, take note of the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, but, frankly, I think that it would lead to a great deal of unnecessary, bureaucratic and wasteful expenditure.

National Health Service (Productivity)

5. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services by how much productivity has increased in each region of the National Health Service since the end of 1980.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There is no simple measure of productivity. Nationally, the number of inpatient and day cases treated in hospitals in England rose by 7·7 per cent. between 1980 and 1983, while expenditure measured in cost terms rose by 2·3 per cent. I shall, with permission circulate details by region in the Official Report.

Mr. Favell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that probably the best way to judge the performance of a region or a district is to publish the figures of each region and district so that they can be judged against each other?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that we can do what he suggests. I can certainly give him his own region's figures. We increased spending on the north-west by 4 per cent. over and above inflation between 1980 and 1983. I am glad to say that that region increased the number of inpatients treated by 10 per cent. in the same period, which shows productivity as well as increased spending.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why do the Government insist on forcing the West Cumbria health authority to go out to tender on its services when the unions have offered a £100,000 productivity saving if their tender is accepted? Why does the Minister not accept that? Does he not realise that if the authority is forced to make further savings, support for patients will be reduced, standards will fall and the pay and conditions of health workers will be reduced?

Mr. Clarke: Throughout the NHS we are insisting that we do not spend any more than is necessary to maintain the standard of support services, because in that way we can spend as much money as possible on improved patient services. I cannot believe that the West Cumbria health authority, any more than any other authority, cannot find ways to improve its patient services. I do not believe that West Cumbria cannot think of anything on which it wants to spend money apart from accepting a second-best bid on its support services.

I trust that when we get in touch with West Cumbria we shall find that it intends to follow the national policy which has resulted in such success and such improvement in services for patients in other parts of the country.

Mrs. Currie: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that in the past we have tended in the Health Service to be obsessed with the measurement of inputs, such as the numbers of nurses, doctors and so on? Does he further agree that it is time that we established targets more in relation to outputs, such as the number of patients, particularly in relation to costs? May we have those figures, not just for regional health authorities, but for district health authorities as well?

Mr. Clarke: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. We are constantly lobbied by people who go on about the amount we spend and the numbers we employ. All the figures in those respects are satisfactory. The Health Service is about patients. A dramatic increase is taking place all the time in the numbers of patients treated in and out of hospitals. That is the success of the service, and the attention of the public should be drawn to that aspect.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I note the Minister's comment about it being hard to find a definition of productivity. Is he prepared to examine the possibility — [HON. MEMBERS: "Speak up".] Oh, children, shut up. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Meadowcroft.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that it is time for a follow-up to the Black report to take into account the levels of health among different sections of the public in different areas of the country so as to determine whether we have or do not have a healthier nation under the present Government?

Mr. Clarke: By all the indicators of health care, we compare well as a nation with other countries, including those which appear to spend much more than we do in this area. The trouble with the Black report was that it began by analysing differences in health standards—which, I agree, are important—but then came up with some extremely expensive propositions in the social security sphere which it seemed to imagine would provide the answer. We are redistributing resources between different parts of the country to try to iron out inequalities, and we will continue to seek to identify the most pressing priorities in terms of health care.

Mr. Dickens: Is my right hon. and learned Friend surprised to hear that when I visited the Oldham general hospital laundry last week, I discovered that 54,000 articles of clothing are processed there each week? Since the Conservatives came to power the hospitals have achieved much greater efficiency. Does he agree that that is the direction in which we should be moving, so making money available for patient care?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my hon. Friend brought considerable pleasure to those at the Oldham general hospital laundry on the occasion of his visit, and I am sure also that he took the opportunity to congratulate them on what they have achieved. I agree with my hon. Friend that we need to point out to those involved with the NHS just what they are achieving by means of increased efficiency and better patient care. Those facts should also be brought to the notice of the general public.

Health Education Services

6. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the present health education services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The health education service is an important element in our efforts towards promoting good health and preventing disease. Most health districts now have access to the services of health education officers, and in their strategic planning regional health authorities are increasingly recognising the role of health education. In support of this development we have increased our grant to the Health Education Council from £4·5 million in 1979-80 to £9·8 million in the current financial year, an increase of 39 per cent.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that, in spite of the laudable work that is being done by the Health Education Council, health promotion is not making the impact that it should be making? Does he agree that a substantial improvement could be effected by the use of joint initiatives, for example with industry or general practitioners? Will he encourage that type of initiative and make available the necessary resources to put it into operation?

Mr. Patten: We have made considerable resources available. We have had a considerable impact over a whole range of areas concerned with prevention. I take the hon. Gentleman's suggestions seriously. They are constructive and I want to examine them. They are much more constructive than the dotty suggestion of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to put VAT on sugar. Presumably that will lead to a pledge that a future Labour Government will impose VAT on food.

Mr. Forman: I welcome the increase in the Government's support for health education. Does my hon. Friend accept, however, that more could and should be done, bearing in mind that at about £10 million, only a modest amount of money is being spent on it, particularly as the advertising budgets of the drink and tobacco industries amount to more than £200 million a year?

Mr. Patten: The amount of almost £10 million is simply the sum that goes to the Health Education Council. A substantial amount of money is spent by regional and district health authorities on health promotion. Increasingly, regional health authorities are integrating health promotion into their regional strategic plans.

Mr. Kennedy: Are the Under-Secretary of State or his ministerial colleagues planning to take any steps to examine more rigorously the role of the tobacco industry in terms of promotion, advertising and sports sponsorship?

Mr. Patten: Sports sponsorship is a matter for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Macfarlane). The present agreement restricting advertising—it is a voluntary agreement—runs out in about March 1986. Negotiations on that agreement will begin shortly.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that sufficient financial resources are available to deter people from smoking in excess of what is supposedly the average amount?

Mr. Patten: We recently gave an extra £500,000 for a programme devoted entirely at smoking by women. Recent figures show a considerable decline in the sale of cigarettes, from 137 million in 1977 to 98 million last year.

Drug Trials

7. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he intends to introduce regulations governing the rights of volunteers and their dependants undertaking drug trials.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Minister will be aware of the case of Philip Jones, although he may not be able to comment on that specific case. Is there not a case for having regulations to ensure that drug companies pay a bond or take out some sort of insurance against the need to pay compensation when poor people are induced to volunteer because of the small rewards offered by the drug companies?

Mr. Clarke: Obviously I cannot comment on the Welsh case, because we are still awaiting an inquest. I was concerned about the death about a year ago of a volunteer in Dublin and answered questions on that subject from the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) and other hon. Members. The rules are being reviewed by the Royal College of Physicians. I hope that the Medicines Commission will examine the results of the review and advise us whether improvements are needed.

The industry's present code allows for compensation to be paid if trials have harmful results. Obviously, no one knows yet whether this Welsh case arises from a trial.

Mr. Ashley: Is the Minister aware that he cannot shrug off responsibility just like that? There is a need for an independent assessing body to ensure that there is full information about all these drug trials and that the volunteers know about the risks involved and the nature of the drugs. That is very important.

Mr. Clarke: With respect, I do not think that I am shrugging off responsibility. The Medicines Commission is an independent body which has already advised us that it does not think that legislation is required. It will look at the updating of the guidance provided by the various bodies. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that volunteers must be genuine volunteers, who are fully warned about what they are doing. They must not be induced by financial offers to participate in trials.

Mr. Meacher: Following the tragic death of Philip Jones, is the Minister aware that the pharmaceutical industry's guidelines are repeatedly breached because vulnerable groups such as the unemployed are regularly used for these experiments? Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the ethical committees which the drug companies have set up to supervise such experiments often comprise their friends and associates? Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that no monitoring of disablement or injury caused by these experiments is kept and that drug companies from abroad are flocking to this country for this purpose, precisely because this sensitive area is unregulated? Will the hon. and learned Gentleman, as a matter of urgency, assure the House that he will introduce statutory regulations to govern this key area?

Mr. Clarke: I am not aware of any of those aspects. I should be interested to know whether there is any evidence to support any of the hon. Gentleman's assertions. I would certainly take a serious view of any suggestion that the guidance was not being followed, that other mistakes were being made or that volunteers were being put at risk. Every organisation that has examined this matter, including the Medicines Commission and the Royal College of Physicians, has said that statutory regulation is not required.

Prescription Charges

8. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received concerning the scope and level of prescription charges.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): Since 1 January this year we have received 152 letters from Members of Parliament and 214 from members of the public about the scope and level of prescription charges.

Mr. Parry: Is the Secretary of State aware that the people who suffer chronic ill health, who are not covered by exemptions and live just above the poverty line cannot afford the increase in prescription charges? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in areas such as Merseyside, where there is a high number of chronic illnesses, this is a cruel tax on ill health and a prescription for more pain and suffering?

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept that. It would be more convincing if the Labour party had not reversed its position. It is no longer committed to the abolition of prescription charges. That has been made clear by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). I am sure that on this occasion he has checked his information with the shadow Cabinet.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that as the average prescription is even now subject to a subsidy of about 50 per cent. the only question on this issue is how much longer we can go on subsidising to such a large extent the relatively small number of people who pay prescription charges?

Mr. Fowler: My hon. Friend is right. On average, the £2 prescription charge provides only 44 per cent. of the cost of the prescription. It must be underlined that 72 per cent. of patients do not pay prescription charges.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that one of the arguments used has been that prescription charges bring in money for the National Health Service? If that is the case, why did we have the appalling exhibition on television last week of a consultant reporting that a children's ward at Guy's hospital had to close down and that he was unable to use 20 beds for children who were critically ill? Why do all the arguments that the Secretary of State puts up about the National Health Service and the need for prescription charges result in the ruination of young children in Great Britain?

Mr. Fowler: The logic of what the hon. Gentleman is saying is that if we take away the resources that come from charges there will have to be further reductions in the services provided by the National Health Service. At the moment, charges raise 3·2 per cent. of National Health Service costs. In 1969-70, during the previous Labour Government, they were providing 3·5 per cent. There is now no disagreement, in principle, between myself and the Opposition on the fact that there should be charges.

St. Mary's Hospital, Hampton

9. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the annual cost of running St. Mary's hospital, Hampton.

Mr. John Patten: The annual cost of running St. Mary's hospital, Hampton is approximately £276,400.

Mr. Jessel: Are not those costs low in relation to the services that St. Mary's hospital provides, and which are greatly cherished in Hampton? Is my hon. Friend aware that there are strong feelings locally that those services should continue? May I bring a delegation to see him?

Mr. Patten: Those sums of money are low. My hon. Friend has already made me aware, by his powerful private interventions, of the great value set on that hospital by his constituents. Yes, of course, I should be happy to see a delegation led by him.

King's College Hospital, London

10. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to pay an official visit to King's college hospital, London.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Fraser: Will the Minister direct his attention to the problems of the accident and emergency department at King's College hospital, which is the busiest in the south-east? Is he aware that the regional authority continues to deny funds to redevelop it and that when recently the department was able to save the life of PC George Hammond it had to shop around privately for body scanning facilities to save his life? Does the Minister not think that that is disgraceful? Will he reverse the spending trend?

Mr. Clarke: There is plainly always competition for funds between different units. There are body scanners in that part of London. There is one at St. Thomas's and one at Guy's. The Camberwell health authority chose to make arrangements with the Cromwell because, presumably, it is in its interests and those of NHS patients to have scanning done there. If an application for a scanner is made by the south-east Thames region, no doubt it will be considered in due course. The Camberwell health authority has also to concentrate upon improving other parts of its service. We must not allow highly publicised claims for items of equipment to divert the authority from its main priority.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: Can my right hon. and learned Friend say what support his Department gives to King's College in its specialties, in particular its treatment of liver diseases?

Mr. Clarke: King's is undoubtedly one of the major national centres for liver transplant operations, amongst other things. I am glad to say that the Government are making an additional grant of £132,000 from central funds this year for the work of the King's liver transplant unit.

Ms. Harman: The Minister mentioned the two National Health Service hospitals in the region that have CT body scanners. Is he aware that the reason why PC George Hammond had to be carted right across London to the private Cromwell hospital is that the waiting lists for scanners at the National Health Service hospitals are already full? As the King's district already lacks vital facilities, will he stop the further cuts that are being imposed on that district?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that PC Hammond received most excellent care and treatment at King's College hospital, and I would not say anything against that. I believe that he was carted across to the Cromwell hospital in front of the nation's press cameras because someone wished to campaign for an item of equipment at King's College hospital. The Camberwell health authority is right to concentrate, as it is doing, upon developing services for the mentally handicapped and ill. That is the first priority in that district.

Unlisted Medicines

11. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further discussions he has had with representatives of the medical profession about a scheme for prescribing unlisted medicines in exceptional circumstances.

Mr. Fowler: We have had several meetings with representatives of the medical profession to discuss a mechanism which would allow drugs not generally available at National Health Service expense to be prescribed in exceptional circumstances. Those discussions are making good progress and I hope that we can soon reach agreement.

Mr. Beith: Ought not the scheme to have been in place from the beginning of the operation of the limited list, and is it not wrong for the Minister to put the onus on the BMA when the state of his relations with that body are of no interest whatsoever to that minority of patients who may need drugs that are not on the list?

Mr. Fowler: I think that it was up to the BMA to start the talks. There is no way that I can start discussions with the medical profession unless it is prepared to have them. Even the Liberal party must accept that. We started discussions on the appeal mechanism as soon as was possible after the regulation was passed by the House. Progress is being made and I am optimistic that we shall soon have an agreement.

Mr. McCrindle: Is it correct to say that some doctors appear to be going out of their way to circumvent the provisions of the scheme? Will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that he will do all that he can to ensure that, consistent with patients continuing to receive the drugs that they require, the anticipated savings will be achieved?

Mr. Fowler: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend an assurance on the last point. There is very little evidence that any abuses are taking place, but clearly we shall keep the position under review.

Mr. Loyden: Is the Secretary of State aware that serious concern and distress are being experienced by many patients because of the limited list? Would it not have been far better for him to await the outcome of his discussions and the establishment of an appeals machinery before taking the action that is now causing concern among doctors and patients?

Mr. Fowler: I do not accept that. We announced the proposals in November. That gave time for discussions and consultation with the public. It was entirely the responsibility and decision of the medical profession not to start those talks. As I have said, those talks have now taken place and I am optimistic that they will have a successful outcome very quickly.

Sir Bernard Braine: Is my right hon. Friend aware that not all doctors are going out of their way to frustrate these arrangements and that, in the case of the chronically sick, those who are permanently ill and need pain-killing drugs, many doctors are complaining—certainly to me in my constituency — that they are precluded from prescribing what they believe to be clinically necessary?

An Hon. Member: Nonsense.

Sir Bernard Braine: It is not nonsense in south-east Essex. What arrangements is my right hon. Friend making for greater flexibility in this matter so that patients' needs can be met?

Mr. Fowler: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend that there is no evidence that doctors are seeking to abuse this system. The whole purpose of the talks that we are having is to meet any legitimate concerns that there may be. I think my right hon. Friend will accept and agree with me that in the first stages this new system has gone remarkably well.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Can the Minister inform us whether it is now legal and legitimate for general practitioners to provide patients with medications on the so-called blacklist if they put down on the prescription form a list of the generic contents of that particular medication?

Mr. Fowler: In one or two cases that is clearly the case, as with the ingredients of a distalgesic. That is the case and always has been.

Open Heart Surgery, Manchester

12. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the facilities for open heart surgery in the Manchester area.

Mr. John Patten: Open heart surgery in Manchester is provided at Wythenshawe hospital and Manchester royal infirmary. In the year just ended a total of 1,130 open heart operations were carried out in Manchester, 23 per cent. more than in 1983-84. The North-Western regional health authority is developing ambitious plans in its new strategy to increase heart surgery cases, and a substantial increase is planned in the next 12 months.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: I recognise the considerable advances that have been made in open heart surgery in the Manchester area, but may I urge my hon. Friend to impress upon the North-Western regional health authority the importance of trying to do even more of that vital work over the next decade?

Mr. Patten: The whole country has shared in the success which the North-Western regional health authority has seen over the past five years. For example, open heart surgery has more than doubled and coronary artery bypass grafting has gone up by 160 per cent. I shall impress on the regional health authority the fact that we expect to see that high priority maintained.

Mr. Eastham: May I assure the Minister that the medical profession in Manchester is far from satisfied with heart surgery operations in that area. Consultants and general practitioners are worried and distressed about the long delays, and the suffering that has been caused as a result. Is it not a fact that throughout the country there are increasing delays for people needing heart surgery? May I also tell the Minister that today my own union, the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, forwarded a letter to me saying that in the Coventry area one of our members has now waited nine months——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a bit wide of Manchester, I think.

Mr. Eastham: It is still relevant to heart operations. One of our members has been waiting nine months for treatment. What will the Minister do about that?

Mr. Patten: I do not know about the AUEW in Coventry. What I do know is that there is a record number of open heart operations in Manchester, and the health authority is making a substantial, planned and proper increase in the number of operations in the coming 12 months.

Mr. Tracy: Is it the case that my hon. Friend is, perhaps, channelling too many funds to Manchester rather than to Guy's hospital in south-east London, as cited in the television programme mentioned by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) a few moments ago, or is it a fact that the South-East Thames regional health authority is not efficient?

Mr. Patten: Guy's hospital is also rather a long way from Manchester. However, what I can say about that hospital and that regional health authority is that we estimate that the authority could be saving as much as £1 million per annum by putting out its services to competitive tender. It is refusing to do so. That is why it is in financial trouble.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Will the Minister tell the House how many patients from the Manchester area have had to be taken to London for their heart operations in the past year, and what was the total cost?

Mr. Patten: I do not know the exact figures. I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman. However, I can tell him that in the past year the number of open heart operations has gone up by a quarter in Manchester, and there are substantial plans for real and sustained improvement in the level of services in the city.

Earnings-Related Pension Scheme

13. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to bring forward any proposals regarding the future of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Newton: Financial provision for retirement, including all aspects of the state pension scheme, is being considered as part of the current social security review. Any proposals for change arising out of the review will be published as soon as possible.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Minister aware that if there were any change in the scheme it would cause tremendous disapointment and shock for literally millions of people who depend on the state pension scheme in order not to live in poverty? Why does the hon. Gentleman not now take the opportunity to confirm that the scheme will remain in existence?

Mr. Newton: The Government's concern is to make sure that there is proper financial provision for people in their retirement, with the aim of ensuring that fewer than in the past have to depend on means-tested benefits. That is our strategic aim. It is with that in mind that we shall draw up our policies.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Minister confirm that any proposals either to abolish or to weaken the state earnings-related pension scheme will go completely contrary to the assurances given by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign and by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State when the reviews were set up?

Mr. Newton: Both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have made plain time and again this Government's commitment to looking after the interests of retired people. That is our strategic aim, and that is what we shall seek to maintain in the review.

NHS (Computerisation)

14. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress of computerisation within the National Health Service.

Mr. John Patten: Computers are already in extensive use in the National Health Service. We are currently developing with health authorities a strategic approach to the use of information and available technology aimed at further improving the management and delivery of health services.

Mr. Stevens: Will my hon Friend take into account the need for substantial monitoring of the development and use of computers so that we can see the tangible benefits as soon as possible?

Mr. Patten: Capital investment in computerisation in the NHS is running at approximately £100 million. There is evidence of that investment in my hon. Friend's area of north Warwickshire, where the district health authority is funding four practices, which cover about 40 per cent. of all patients treated by family practitioners in that area.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Forth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to attend a state banquet in honour of President Banda.

Mr. Forth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that millions of home owners throughout the country are appalled at the proposals of an Opposition Front Bench Member that a Labour Government would abolish mortgage interest tax relief? Will she confirm that her Government remain committed to our present policy of mortgage interest tax relief?

The Prime Minister: I saw the Labour party plan for abolishing mortgage tax relief. I confirm that, so long as I am at the Dispatch Box, mortgage interest tax relief will be a policy of the Conservative party.

Mr. Steel: Since the Chancellor of the Exchequer has told the House that inflation is likely to rise to 6 per cent. later this year, does the Prime Minister still agree with the target of 3 per cent. of which she spoke in the far east? When will she have a target for reducing unemployment?

The Prime Minister: I believe that inflation can be reduced further. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right to say that it will increase slightly before it decreases, but we must pursue policies to reduce inflation. I remind the right hon. Gentleman that 3 per cent. is still inflation.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: Does my right hon. Friend agree that commitments made to the working miners during the recent coal strike both in this House and by the National Coal Board must be honoured? As some of those miners seek transfers because of harassment and intimidation, does she agree that the promises made must be fulfilled speedily and sympathetically?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am anxious that the working miners should be fully and properly looked after. My hon. Friend will notice that Mr. MacGregor issued a firm statement the other day which showed the action that he had taken and made it clear that wherever he was presented with firm evidence it would be followed up immediately.

Mr. Alfred Morris: How many extra flights into Manchester international airport will result from the Prime Minister's visit to the far east? Regarding her visit, does it help our country to talk about seeing off—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."]—a section of Britain's working people, who were recently described by the Earl of Stockton as the finest people in the world?

The Prime Minister: In the first part of the question, I think that the hon. Gentleman was referring to a possible application by Singapore International Airlines. Talks on that will be starting shortly. — [Interruption.] I am referring to Singapore. We dealt with the Malaysian matter earlier. I believe that more flights into Manchester are required from Singapore.

As for the second part of the question, I shall read out precisely what I said. Referring to strikes, I said:

"Then came the big one—the strike of coalminers. That is in the public sector. But the great achievement of that was not only that some miners stayed working, not only that we saw it off after a year—"

[Interruption.] Hon. Members do not want to hear the truth because it gets in the way of their propaganda. I said:

"The great achievement of that was not only that some miners stayed working, not only that we saw it off after a year, but that steelworkers were not going to come out in support, nor were the railway workers going to come out in support and the docks, of which most are private, were brought out under false pretences for about a fortnight and they got back to work.

So may I cheer you up a bit. We resisted that year-long strike and the two outstanding achievements were that among trade unionists in Britain not one trade union gave support because they were learning the facts of life."

That was the support from true, decent, honourable trade unionists. What I find is that everywhere I go people know that that coal strike lasted for a year, that it was pursued with violence and intimidation, that the Labour party supported it throughout and that the Leader of the Opposition did not have the guts to go to a meeting and condemn it.

Q2. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stanbrook: Will my right hon. Friend ignore the humbug from the Opposition about her very successful far eastern tour? Was her attention drawn during her absence to the evidence of ballot-rigging in the election for the leadership of the Transport and General Workers Union? If we want responsible and representative leaders for our great trade unions, should we not insist on mandatory postal balloting?

The Prime Minister: That was considered during the passage of the Trade Union Bill of 1984, which comes into force on 1 October this year. My hon. Friend will be aware that for some unions, such as the National Union of Seamen, postal ballots would not be appropriate. There is, however, a presumption in the Act that a postal ballot will take place, and if there is not to be a postal ballot a secret ballot must be carried out at the workplace or somewhere more convenient. There are very stringent conditions attached—everyone must be able to vote in secret and without interference or constraint, and if any member is dissatisfied with the way in which the ballot is conducted he can apply to the Certification Officer with his complaint and request a postal ballot.

Mr. Kinnock: As Britain's share of world manufactured trade has dropped by 20 per cent. in the six years during which the Prime Minister has held office, does she agree that it would now be best for everyone if she concentrated her attention on policies for production and sales promotion instead of on trips for self-promotion?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman is really interested in selling goods, which I doubt, why does he support strikes which have a devastating effect on Britain's reputation? He supports the lot. And why in the world does he not recognise that if we are to get more jobs we must get our unit labour costs down? Neither of those facts will he recognise.

Mr. Kinnock: Has the Prime Minister not yet learnt that one of the best ways to reduce labour costs and to increase our export performance is to sponsor and encourage policies for investment, design, training and employment, which would also have an effect on labour relations? Why does she not introduce and encourage such policies instead of dashing around all over the place like an egotistical flea in a fit?

The Prime Minister: Investment in assets in Britain was at an all-time record last year. I held the first design seminar at Downing street, involving those engaged in design, that has even been held. We have the best training system ever known in this country. That is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Pym: Discarding the absurd remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, and acknowledging the success of my right hon. Friend's visit to the far east, may I ask my right hon. Friend now to reveal her itinerary for the Whitsun recess?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. My destination for Whitsun has been fixed for some time; it is Chequers.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Prime Ministers tell the House whether, after her visit to Sri Lanka, she does not now believe that it would be better for Britain not to export arms to that country, in view of the oppression of minorities there, and that the service training agreement with the Sri Lankan armed forces should be ended?

The Prime Minister: Sri Lanka has a terrorist problem. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Conservative side of the House believes that terrorism must never be allowed to win. Any applications for arms are dealt with specifically, and they are not usually revealed.

Q3. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: During her busy day, will my right hon. Friend find time to consider who are more likely to create real, lasting jobs—those who stay at home, carp, and make cheap propaganda points, or those who go to the far east and create the climate that will produce British business and orders?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend. I believe that what the Labour party could not stand was the outstanding welcome that we received on the tour wherever we went.

Q4. Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Alton: Despite the inadequacies of some of the youth training schemes, does the Prime Minister not agree that the calls by some irresponsible members of the Labour party for young people to come out on strike and to leave their schools on 25 April is mischievous and irresponsible, and an attempt to use young people as cannon fodder?

The Prime Minister: I understand that that is the action which the trade union rights group proposes to take in Liverpool on 25 April. I deplore that politically inspired and counter-productive action. It is directly against the youth training scheme, which is designed to help young people to acquire more skills and better training in order to help them to get jobs. The action is totally inspired by the extreme Left wing of the trade union movement.

Q5. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wardell: Will the Prime Minister tell the House what decisions her Cabinet colleagues made in her absence from which she will dissociate herself when she next goes abroad?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be relieved to know that there were no Cabinet meetings in my absence.

Q6. Mr. Tracey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Tracey: Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to compare the statements on immigration made by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) with her own Government's policies? Does she agree that the right hon. Gentleman's statements are irresponsible, to say the least?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I saw the pledge by the Labour shadow spokesman to repeal the Immigration Act 1971, which he said was — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".] I am sorry; I am looking at what the right hon. Gentleman said. It was a deplorable pledge, which will give cause for alarm to a great many people. I note that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to repeal the 1971 Act, which was operated by the last Labour Government throughout their whole period of office, from 1974 to 1979.

Q8. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Does the right hon. Lady agree that it is utterly undesirable for someone with a known Nazi past, who has been active in Nazi organisations, to be employed as a civil servant? Was it known when he was appointed that he had a Nazi record and had served a term of imprisonment for Nazi activities?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the employment of a civil servant in the Department of Trade and Industry. Inquiries are proceeding and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Derek Harris (Death)

3.30 pm

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the death of Derek John Richard Harris on Saturday 13 April in the Glenochil young offenders institution, in the Clackmannan constituency.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): I very much regret that Derek Harris, aged 16, an inmate at Glenochil young offenders institution, was found hanging from the window bars of his room at 10.25 pm on Saturday 13 April 1985. Despite strenuous efforts by staff, Harris was pronounced dead by the medical officer at 11.5 pm.

Mr. Harris had been sentenced at Aberdeen sheriff court on 11 February 1985 to three months' detention at Friarton detention centre for offences of vandalism, breach of the peace, theft by opening lockfast premises and Road Traffic Act contravention. On medical advice, he was transferred to Glenochil young offenders institution on 28 February. After a period under close observation, he was placed on ordinary observation on 26 March. He was to have been released from custody on Friday 19 April, but he was also due to appear at Aberdeen sheriff court on 9 May to face further charges. He was informed of these further charges on 11 April.

Next of kin were informed of the death and police have investigated. As for all unnatural deaths occurring in prisons, a public fatal accident inquiry will now be carried out before the sheriff.

This is a tragic incident which I regard with very great concern. It would not be appropriate for me to comment further on the detailed circumstances of this individual case until the fatal accident inquiry has taken place.

Mr. O'Neill: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for making his statement. I should like to express my condolences to the deceased's sister and my gratitude for the co-operation that I have already received from governor McVeigh and his staff.

What further steps does the Secretary of State propose to take to allay public anxiety about the imprisonment of young offenders in Scotland? For the past five years, and after seven fatalities at the two institutions in the Glenochil complex, the Secretary of State has responded by widening the scope of fatal accident inquiries, by having internal inquiries, by having inquiries carried out by the chief inspector of prisons and he has established a committee on suicide in Glenochil, but still the suicides continue.

Does the Secretary of State think that Glenochil is different from other institutions or that the problems which are highlighted by the fatalities are common to the entire Scottish prison system in respect of the treatment of young offenders? Does he propose to widen the scope of options open to the judiciary in Scotland so that it has more than detention centres or young offenders institutions at its disposal?

My impression is that the range of options is far too narrow and that more radical steps must be taken as alternatives to the work being attempted in places such as Glenochil. I am informed by constituents who work there that they are at their wits' end to know what more can be done. Does the Secretary of State agree that the Scottish penal system is being asked to do too much for disadvantaged and inadequate young people who, because of the narrow range of options open to the judiciary, must be foisted on the prison system? Cannot the Secretary of State take urgent action? He should not hide behind the prospect of a fatal accident inquiry which will not necessarily be prejudiced by the action that I am asking the right hon. Gentleman to consider.

Mr. Younger: I very much share the concern of the hon. Gentleman in whose constituency these institutions are situated. I should like also to be associated with his expression of condolences.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, there have been seven tragic fatalities in the complex, but I should make it clear that only two of them have occurred in the detention centre part of the institution. The remaining five have taken place in the young offenders institution where no sort of regime under the title of "short sharp shock" is in evidence.

The question about the whole system is best answered by considering the changes that have been made in recent years in the options available for sentencing young people. The options have been greatly widened. Community service orders can now be carried into effect in areas covering three quarters of the population of Scotland, which is a huge advance. The number of young offenders in institutions in Scotland has declined by more than 20 per cent. in the past one and a half years.

There are more options available today, but I should make it clear that in a serious matter like this I would not close any options that are thrown up by the inquiries that are pending.

Mr. Gerald Malone (Aberdeen, South): May I add my condolences to the family of this young man who was in care in my constituency before going to Glenochil?

I am reassured to hear that the Secretary of State is not closing any options in view of the fact that he has instigated a working group to examine the problem. It is perhaps highly irresponsible, when two fatal accident inquiries are pending and the outcome of his working group is to be considered, for some people in Scotland to make across-the-board assumptions that the regime in Glenochil is not working satisfactorily. I refer particularly to the statement made by the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties. Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that irresponsible statements like that do nothing to help?

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend on the last point. These are serious matters that are not susceptible to easy, slick comments made without proper thought.

As the House knows, the working group was set up by me last year to consider the precautions for dealing with possible suicide cases. That inquiry has started work and I am urgently considering whether there are ways in which I can accelerate the conclusion of its work. As the House knows, I propose that its conclusions should be fully published.

I must again make the point that in the cases that have happened so far—I exclude the two for which fatal accident inquiries have not yet been held—there has been no evidence that any of the tragic deaths was due to the nature of the regime. None of them had any connection whatever with the so-called "short sharp shock" regime, which is a separate matter.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does not the Secretary of State recognise that the dependence of the Scottish penal system upon this blighted establishment at Glenochil, where there have been seven tragic fatalities, makes plain the need for a new, wider range of penal options for dealing with young offenders? Does he not recognise that his studied inactivity smacks of the view that young offenders should suffer pain and die quietly?

Mr. Younger: I think that the hon. Gentleman has fallen below his usual high standard with that sort of comment. These are serious matters. Nobody can take easily the death of anybody in detention at any time. I should like to treat the matter seriously.

It is important to make it clear that in the inquiries that have so far taken place on every one of the deaths, bar the last two, no common factor has been found. The sheriffs who have conducted the inquiries have explained to the best of their ability the reasons in each case. To put them all together and to describe the institutions as a whole as the hon. Gentleman has is highly irresponsible and unjustified.

I have already explained that much wider options are now available and are being made use of, and that the population in these institutions has been reduced by more than 20 per cent. I thought that the hon. Gentleman would welcome that.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that psychological screening of young offenders is adequate, because there has been some suggestion that in this case there was emotional disturbance? As the only similarity that we can find is the fact that people hang themselves, has any surmise been made on this fact, and has any conclusion been reached?

Mr. Younger: The procedures for sentencing young people to sentences that may result in detention in any of these centres are carefully controlled. A statutory requirement is that each inmate should be examined within 24 hours of arrival to see whether he is physically and mentally fit to undergo a period of detention. If he is not, he is changed to some other institution on the advice of the medical officer conducting the examination. This happened in the case of Derek Harris. I hope that that will give some reassurance to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Will the Secretary of State accept that, although there may be no common factor in the various inquiries, this in itself is a matter of concern? Seven incidents ending in death is an overwhelming statistical fact. It is not sufficient to leave this matter to the present inquiry. We require, as the Scottish Council for Civil Liberties said, an investigation into sentencing policy, transfer policy, as happened here, and the nature of the regime. I wish that the Secretary of State would not write off the Scottish CCL's request as being slick. I am associated with it, and he knows my record. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, along with the statistical aspect of this, the infinite sadness of this case requires a new and urgent public review?

Mr. Younger: I agree that this is a matter of the greatest concern. I also agree that the fact that there is no common factor is something to which we should address ourselves.

As to sentencing policy, I should have thought that in this tragic case it was clear that the procedures had been operating sensitively. Derek Harris was found not to be fit for the original regime to which he was sentenced and was therefore transferred. Tragically, this did not make any difference to the train of events.

As to the nature of the regime, I should not like to prejudice any conclusions that may come out of the fatal accident inquiries or the study that is in progress about the precautions against suicide. My mind is open to suggestions or recommendations. None of the inquiries has suggested that the nature of the regime had anything to do with any of these tragic deaths.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the young man who unfortunately died—I too express my deep sympathy to his relations — was under the care of the Grampian regional social work department before being transferred to Glenochil. It was found that he was emotionally disturbed because of the death of his father in 1981.

Will my right hon. Friend take cognisance of the information that can be conveyed to him by Miss Mary Hartnell, the social work director at Grampian, and try to ensure that when young men are transferred to penal establishments their background history is given so that we can prevent incidents such as the sad one of which we have heard today?

Mr. Younger: I agree that the full background information on anybody liable to be sentenced to detention in such centres should be well known.

I shall explain the two stages that all such people have to undergo before they are sent to one of these institutions. First, statutorily the court must have before it a full social inquiry report before it can pass sentence on a young person, and that is the avenue by which the view of the social work director could be, and no doubt in this case was, brought to the attention of the court before it passed sentence.

I have already mentioned the second stage. Within 24 hours of arrival at an institution, a young person must have a full medical examination. If he is found to be unsuitable for the regime to which he has been sentenced, a change is made, as happened in this case.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I associate myself and my colleagues with the expressions of sadness and regret at the death of Derek Harris, who, as the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) pointed out, was in he care of Grampian regional council and was, for 18 months, at Cordyce special school, in my constituency.

It seems from this case and from the one already under investigation that something is amiss with the screening policy. Will the Secretary of State agree that we need a full inquiry, not just into the operation of Glenochil—there has been an inspector's report into that—but into the sentencing and screening policy for such institutions? Given the widespread concern, will the Secretary of State undertake to make another statement to the House when the two investigations in progress have been completed and tell us whether he agrees that a full inquiry is necessary?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He will not expect me to come to firm conclusions until I have all the evidence before me. I still await a sight of the full report of the governor. I also wish to receive the fatal accident inquiry reports on the February case and this case and the full report of the internal inquiry into suicide precautions for which I have called. As I said, I shall try to bring that forward.

Once all those reports are in my possession, I shall consider them carefully. If any suggestions, proposals or recommendations are made, they will be considered carefully. In the short term, I shall be looking in the next few days for any immediate remedial measures that can be taken in the light of the governor's report. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall be receptive to any suggestions made in that report.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, when considering matters as serious as this, it is wise never to forget that the people who work in these establishments are servants of the Government and the Crown and that they carry out an extremely difficult and onerous task on behalf of the rest of the community? Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is unwise to make statements about matters that are under investigation—and are often so complex that it is difficult fully to appreciate them—and thereby cast a stigma on people who carry out a difficult task, usually without complaint?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the point made by my hon. Friend, and I should like to express my appreciation to the prison service in Scotland for doing a difficult job so well. In the service's defence, I should add that all the reports and inquiries on these tragic deaths have been clear on one point: none of the deaths has been due to ill treatment or to the nature of the regime. Those who work in prisons should be encouraged to feel that that has been the clear findings of inquiries into the other cases.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will call the three hon. Members who have been trying to catch my eye and then the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, but I ask for short questions.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman has said about the difficulties and complexities of pronouncing on this incident and others, will he consider—particularly because of representations made by parents, including some in my constituency, whose sons are being sent to these institutions—consulting the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for Scotland about halting the increase in the number of inmates in these institutions?

Will he call a halt, pending the result of the inquiries that are being undertaken? That would allay fears among parents and others associated with the inmates.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate that point. Events of this sort cause great concern to everybody, but particularly to those who have relatives in the institutions. However, Glenochil is a good institution, which has a good record in many respects. These tragic events are most regrettable and everyone concerned in the institutions will co-operate in doing everything possible to avoid such things happening.

There has been no increase in the number of people being sent to these institutions. The number has substantially declined over the past 18 months because we have provided alternatives. I welcome that, and should like to proceed further.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Does the Secretary of State accept that we cannot regard this tragic death as an isolated incident? Is he not aware that the deaths have cast a serious blight on the Scottish conscience? Is it not clear that there is a radical need for changes in sentencing and treatment policies for young offenders?

Mr. Younger: With respect to the hon. Gentleman—I know that he is sincere—there is no evidence at this stage to support his remarks. If any link had been found between the previous tragic events—there has not—that might have led to his conclusion. However, I do not want to close the door to any recommendations or suggestions that may come from the inquiries that are pending. I shall have an open mind to any suggestions.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I accept the Secretary of State's remark that there may be no discernible common motivation between the events, but there has been a series of events. We can find a common thread in the age of the offenders and their geographical location. Does not the right hon. Gentleman realise that copycat suicides are not uncommon? For that reason, the media do not reveal the method by which suicides are committed. Therefore, would it not be irresponsible to ignore the fact that once an institution established a tradition of suicide, as has this institution, there might be a recurrence?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the need not to encourage that feeling. In fairness to everyone concerned at Glenochil, I should say that there is no evidence to suggest any such record or reputation. It is of course tragic that seven deaths have occurred. The regime has been substantially the same since 1966, and more than 20,000 people have passed through these institutions. Therefore, the figure represents a small proportion. The population of Glenochil is not a typical cross-section of the prison population, and that must be borne in mind.

I should be most remiss and irresponsible if I did not repeat that I await the results of all further inquiries with an open mind.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Does the Secretary of State accept that, when there is one institution in a network of similar institutions with a record of seven deaths in five years, there must be something seriously wrong? In saying that, I do not cast any aspersions on the staff—I give them my full support. There are similar institutions at Polmont, Friarton, Dumfries and Noranside and a whole host of other institutions where such incidents do not occur, yet at Glenochil there have been seven deaths in five years. Therefore, there must be something seriously wrong.

Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that against that background, and as the last fatality occurred only three months ago in February, it is not satisfactory that the fatal accident inquiry into that fatality has not yet been held? However, I do not hold the right hon. Gentleman responsible for that. We are now awaiting another fatal accident inquiry into the weekend tragedy concerning the young man Harris.

I ask the right hon. Gentleman to do everything in his power to hasten the holding of the fatal accident inquiries, to look with urgency at the work of the working group and to set himself a time limit to make a statement to the House, if possible before the end of June. We simply cannot allow this to continue. There is somthing seriously wrong, and we all have a responsibility to do something about it.

Mr. Younger: I fully accept the hon. Gentleman's good faith in this matter. I accept entirely what he said about the working group. I shall do all that I can to bring forward the conclusion of that study; today I made approaches to those concerned.

As has been said, the fatal accident inquiry is a matter for my noble friend the Lord Advocate. I shall, of course, draw to his attention what has been said today. It is worth pointing out that there is a statutory month before a fatal accident inquiry can take place, and there are sometimes difficulties in setting up the inquiries.

There is a difference between saying that there must be something wrong—which I do not think is yet fair to those involved in these institutions—and saying that we must take this matter seriously and take every step to find out the facts and the background to every aspect of these deaths so that we can find out whether there is something wrong. In fairness to those who operate there now, we must make it clear that there is no evidence of any kind yet that the nature of the way in which people are looked after there, or the regime and so on, had any bearing on the fatal accidents.

House of Commons Chamber (Microphones)

3.55 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It will not have escaped your notice that since we returned from the recess, two microphones have sprouted in the Chamber, one over my head and one over the head of the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel), the Leader of the Liberal party.

In view of the cost of installing these completely unnecessary instruments, would you care to make it clear to the House that neither I nor my hon. Friends had any wish for them to be installed and that the sole responsibility must rest presumably with the Leader of the Liberal party?

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Perhaps it might encourage the wider circulation of the minutes of the Services Committee for the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) to know that his hon. Friends and the hon. Friends of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) properly agreed that the microphone system needed improving.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a matter for the Services Committee.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), Mr. Speaker. Might it be possible for the fact to be conveyed to the Services Committee that we on these Benches did not ask for an additional microphone to be placed above our heads, as there is no unruly element on the Bench below our Gangway? I was wondering whether an additional microphone had been placed on this side because it was hoped that the Opposition might be crossing the Floor of the House to join us — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] — or because Opposition Members held hopes of occupying these Benches after the next general election.

Mr. Skinner: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that you will take the matter seriously in endeavouring to discover how much it has cost to wrap the Leader of the Liberal party in cotton wool. I made no representations on the issue. I am satisfied with the microphone system that has existed in the Chamber for donkey's years. I see no reason why a microphone should be especially installed for the benefit of the Leader of the Liberal party, who is having an identity contest with the Leader of the Social Democratic Party——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. The hon. Gentleman must put a point of order, if he wishes to put one, on which I can rule.

Mr. Skinner: I hope that you will manage to establish the real reason why representations were made leading to the fixing of these new microphones, Mr. Speaker. In the House of Commons the Leader of the Official Opposition gets heckled, the Prime Minister gets heckled — [Interruption.]—and, as you can hear, I get heckled, just as others get heckled. That never worries me. I do not see why the House should spend taxpayers' money installing an extra microphone for the benefit of the Leader of the Liberal party. I am happy to share my microphone with all those who speak from the Bench which I normally occupy.

Mr. Speaker: I was about to say that so long as I do not get heckled it will be all right. It is clear that this is a matter for the Services Committee. I used to be a member of that Committee, which is composed of people of great wisdom.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: By the leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the two motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the Value Added Tax (Finance) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 432) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Community Health Councils Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 304) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Political Parties (Income and Expenditure)

3.58 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for a limit on the amount of money which may be spent by or on behalf of a political party during the period of a general election campaign; to require companies to establish a political fund from which all political donations shall be made; to provide for a ballot of shareholders and employees before a political fund is established; and to ensure an entitlement for each shareholder to an additional dividend from the company in lieu of any donations to which such shareholder has objected.

Reforms are long overdue regarding expenditure by political parties during a general election campaign and in relation to political donations by companies.

We all recognise that it is right to limit the amount spent on behalf of a candidate standing for Parliament. A rich candidate is not permitted to try to buy votes. Therefore, on the local scene, equality and fairness prevail, and so far as I know, it has not been suggested that the ceiling on candidates' spending should be removed.

When it comes to the national scene however a different picture emerges. There, a political party can spend as much as it likes during an election campaign. Where is the logic in imposing strict restrictions on the amount to be spent by a candidate when parties can spend as much as they please? It was estimated that the Conservative party had between £15 million and £20 million available to spend during the last election. Labour had a maximum of £2·5 million. If the Tories had decided to spend the amount that they had available to them, they would have faced no restriction. They could have done so freely.

The present system underlines the way in which a candidate is limited—rightly—as to the amount that can be spent on his or her behalf. I believe that a restriction should be placed on national spending by parties during an election. An initial sum can be agreed, which can then be updated to allow for inflation. That is more or less what happens with candidates. At various times the Home Secretary suggests through an Order in Council that the amount that can be spent on behalf of a candidate should be increased. Under my Bill, the same system will apply to parties. Being a fair person, I suggest that £4 million should be the initial sum. That is a sufficient sum for a political party to spend during the next election as a legal maximum. If my Bill is accepted and if the Government decide to give time to allow the Bill to make progress, I shall be willing in Committee to listen to any suggestions about the initial sum that is to be set down.

The next matter I want to see changed refers to companies' political donations: companies should be placed in the same position in which unions have been in this matter since 1913. In order to donate for political purposes a trade union must have a political fund. That has been the position for more than 70 years. Companies, however, need no political fund and need hold no ballots. The Board just decides to make a donation. As we know, in the main, indeed almost exclusively—such donations are made to the Tory party or one of the Tory front organisations.

If companies have political funds, they will be brought into line with trade unions. It may be argued that a protest can be made at a company's annual general meeting. As we know, such a protest is unlikely to get very far. In 1978, referring to the ways in which companies operate, a Law Lord stated in a legal judgment:

"It sometimes happens that public companies are conducted in a way which is beyond the control of the ordinary shareholders. The majority of the shares are in the hands of two or three individuals. These have control of the company's affairs. The other shareholders know little and are told little. They receive the glossy annual reports. Most of them throw them into the waste paper basket. There is an annual general meeting, but few of the shareholders attend. The whole management and control is in the hands of the directors."

That statement was made by a Law Lord who is not usually associated with ardent pro-trade union views — Lord Denning.

Recently, a survey discovered — I remind the Tory Members of what they obviously already know — that companies that donate to the Tory party receive many more knighthoods and honours than other companies dominating the economy. Clearly, the best way of going about obtaining a knighthood and the rest is by subscribing to the Tory party.

I propose that a ballot of shareholders and employees should be held in any company that wishes to donate to political causes. It would not be wrong to include employees. I do not believe that a person who has worked for more than 12 months in a company and who obviously depends upon that company to earn his living should be denied the right to decide how the company will donate for political purposes. As is the case with trade unions, a simple majority result would be needed. If a majority of shareholders and employees agreed that there should be a political fund, the company would be able to donate for political purposes. If there was no political fund, no political donations could be made.

There is little evidence for instance that the majority of people who invest in pension funds support the Tory party. Companies that have recently made large contributions to the Tory cause include the British and Commonwealth Shipping Co., Allied — Lyons, Hanson Trust, Taylor Woodrow, Guardian Royal Exchange Assurance, Plessey, Consolidated Goldfields, Marks and Spencer and Trafalgar House. When did they hold a ballot? When did they ask their shareholders to agree that such money should be contributed?

Compare companies with trade unions and leave aside recent legislation. Since 1913, no trade union has been able to donate a single penny for political causes unless it has first held a political ballot. If that is right for trade unions, why should it not be right for companies too? Why should there be a distinction? I should have thought that Conservative Members would agree. I see that the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), being a fair-minded man, seems to agree with me. It is a pity that I did not include him in the list of sponsors of my Bill. It is not too late. I am willing to add his name, if he wishes.

The reforms that I have suggested should be put into operation as quickly as possible. It is difficult to understand how the Conservative party could have brought in recent legislation without attempting in any way to rectify the anomaly about which I have spoken. The only possible reason is that the Tory party, being a beneficiary of the present system, decided that it did not want its cause to be undermined. It is happy, though, to try to undermine the finances of its main political opponent. I suppose that we should not be surprised at what the Tory party does, because it is a very undemocratic party. It does not hold a ballot when deciding its chairman. At times I wonder which is the less democratic—the Communist party in the Soviet Union or the Tory party in this country.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): And the SDP.

Mr. Winnick: And the SDP, of course.

We all know that, despite political funds, any trade unionist can contract out of paying the political levy. I suggest that a shareholder who does not want to be a party to political donations should be able to contract out as well. In such a case, he would receive a slightly higher dividend.

This is a modest measure. It is rather non-controversial, I believe, and I hope that it will not be opposed. I shall write to the Leader of the House and the Prime Minister urging that time should be given to my Bill. I hope that the Home Secretary now in his place will ensure that his Cabinet colleagues will agree that my modest and non-controversial measure should receive Government time to make progress.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Winnick: Mr. Brian Sedgemore, Mr. Ray Powell, Mr. Robert N. Wareing, Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. Max Madden, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Sydney Bidwell, Mr. Eric S. Heffer, Mr. Stan Thorne and myself.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): And Mr. Teddy Taylor.

Mr. Winnick: I am always willing to show a non-sectarian attitude, but the hon. Member for Southend, East will not agree to such a proposal.

Political Parties (Income and Expenditure)

Mr. David Winnick accordingly presented a Bill to provide for a limit on the amount of money which may be spent by or on behalf of a political party during the period of a general election campaign; to require companies to establish a political fund from which all political donations shall be made: to provide for a ballot of shareholders and employees before a political fund is established; and to ensure an entitlement for each shareholder to an additional dividend from the company in lieu of any donations to which such shareholder has objected: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 19 April and to be printed. [Bill 125.]

Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

4.9 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The recommendations of the Royal Commission on criminal procedure covered two broad areas which it regarded as related. The first was the proper ambit of police powers and the corresponding safeguards for the citizen. The second was the machinery for the conduct of prosecutions.

In proceeding with this legislation in the Session immediately following the enactment of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 we are showing our acceptance of the view of the Royal Commission that adequate and modernised police powers must be accompanied by safeguards against any misuse of those powers, and our acceptance of its belief that the time has come to introduce a prosecution system which is wholly independent of the police. Taken together, the two enactments will amount to the most far-reaching reform of criminal procedures this century.

The main elements of the present Bill will be familiar to the House. The first part establishes the general framework for the Crown prosecution service. It is to have the conduct of all criminal proceedings instituted by the police, but is to operate independently of the police or any other local influence.

Part II amends the law governing the payment of costs in criminal cases consequential on the introduction of the new service. Part III contains some procedural changes, mostly minor ones. There is also one major change which I regard as of particular importance. That is the introduction of time limits on the bringing of criminal proceedings. The introduction of the Crown prosecution service is designed to improve openness and accountability, to increase consistency in prosecution policy, and to contribute to the timely and effective prosecution of offences. As an element in the new arrangements, time limits have an important role to play as a discipline to prevent unnecessary delay on the part of all who bring prosecutions — not just the Crown prosecution service.

The changes introduced by the Bill are changes to a system which is in need of considerable improvement. While there may be room for differing views on how much improvement should be secured, I do not think that informed commentators would quarrel with the assessment of the Royal Commission that the current arrangements are characterised by "their variety, their haphazardness, their local nature and, at least so far as the police are concerned, by the unitary nature of the investigative and prosecutorial functions."

Variations across the country remain greater than can be explained by reference to differences in local circumstances. That is incompatible with the fundamental principle of justice that like cases should be treated alike. It cannot be right, for example, that an offender has between twice and three times as much chance of being cautioned rather than prosecuted in some police areas as others. It is not as if all the forces making a high use of cautioning are rural, and all the low ones urban. There is no clear pattern. But, as one step towards improving consistency, I have recently issued to all chief officers of police guidelines on cautioning.

Another illustration of the variety of arrangements across the country is that in six areas the police do not have prosecuting solicitors departments, despite the recommendation of the Willink Royal Commission on the police more than 20 years ago to the effect that they should be set up in all force areas. In many areas, too, the practice of police advocacy continues—again despite the Willink recommendation that it was an undesirable practice, and an inappropriate use of training and expensive police manpower.

Another respect in which there is clearly room for improvement concerns the number of weak cases reaching the courts. The evidence is more readily available in relation to the Crown court, where in 1983 approximately half of all acquittals were by order or direction of the judge. That is to say, there was insufficient evidence for the case to be left to the jury. It is plainly undesirable for cases to continue as far as this in the system when there is no reasonable prospect of conviction: unfair for the accused and undesirable for the courts, which face quite sufficient pressure without this unnecessary burden.

For all those reasons, change is needed and the Bill, therefore, gives effect to the principle of an independent service recommended by the Royal Commission to meet those criticisms, and to establish on a statutory footing the independence of prosecutors from the police. It reflects the principle that those responsible for the investigation of the offence should not also be responsible for the conduct of the prosecution.

In one important respect we have departed from the Royal Commission's proposals. The Royal Commission recommended that in some respects the new service should be accountable to a police and prosecutions authority, which would be an extension of the police authority. That arrangement evoked the criticism that it would not sufficiently secure the clear separation of the prosecutor from the police, which was a central reason for the change. It was also thought to leave open the risk of improper local influence over prosecution decisions.

In considering the various alternatives, we had in mind the need to provide adequate safeguards against interference in individual prosecution decisions. Because the line between them and general prosecution policy is so difficult to draw, and because of the great local interest in particular cases, we concluded that the service should not be accountable to a local supervisory body. Nor do we believe that it would be right to separate accountability for policy from that for resources, which was a feature of the variants on the Royal Commission's scheme suggested in the course of our consultations.

The national service which we propose, as well as securing undivided accountability, has other important advantages. It will be so designed as to maximise efficiency and effectiveness. It also offers the best prospect of improving consistency in prosecution policy, which it will be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to promulgate. One area in which consistency will be particularly important is the prosecution of juveniles, which was given considerable attention in another place. The director's guidelines will give full weight to the special factors which arise in cases involving juveniles.

It is important to stress that a national service need not be a centralised one, with the delay and extended lines of communication that that entails. No system is exclusively local or exclusively national. It is the balance between the local and national elements that is crucial. The Crown prosecution service established by the Bill will have strong local elements. In fact, the framework set out in the Bill allows for maximum delegation of decision taking to the local level, with Crown prosecutors able to exercise any of the powers and functions of the director with respect to the conduct of proceedings. This means that under the new arrangements it will actually be possible for more, not fewer, decisions to be taken locally, with some cases which are now referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions being conducted by the local Crown prosecutor.

The extent to which this will occur is set out in the White Paper published by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General last December. Among the cases currently referred to the director but which will for the most part be handled locally in future are straightforward murders, perjury, multiple rapes, kidnapping and serious robberies. The director is even now making arrangements to devolve some cases to prosecuting solicitors' departments to smooth the transition to the new service.

I shall not describe the provisions of the Bill in detail, but it may be helpful if I highlight some of its more significant aspects.

The head of the service is to be the Director of Public Prosecutions. Under him and appointed by him will be the chief Crown prosecutors, for the most part each covering a police area. The chief Crown prosecutor will need to work in close consultation with the chief constable in his area, but of course he will have to do so in a way which is consistent with maintaining his independence.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): In this excellent Bill there appears to be provision for the payment of salaries to almost every specified category except the chief Crown prosecutor. Does my right hon. and learned Friend feel that before the Bill completes its Commons stages he will be able to say what the salary level should be for the chief Crown prosecutor? In view of the substantial responsibility, does he believe it appropriate that it should be on a par with that of a chief constable?

Mr. Brittan: I should not like to make a commitment of that kind at this stage, but I am sure that this is a matter which will fall to be considered by the House in the course of the further deliberations on the Bill.

The director, as head of the service, will act under the superintendence of the Attorney-General, as he does now. By building on this well-established relationship our proposals secure accountability for decisions in the service while guarding against the risk of improper influence. It has long been a feature of our constitution that the Law Officers act in a quasi-judicial capacity when taking decisions on prosecutions in individual cases and in relation to prosecution policy.

The accountability envisaged for the new service is underpinned by the Director of Public Prosecutions' annual report. This will give details of any significant changes in the distribution of business between the centre and local offices, thus giving Parliament oversight of the degree of delegation acutally achieved in the new service. It will also include the code of guidance which the director is to promulgate to Crown prosecutors on the general principles governing certain decisions in the conduct of cases and any alterations to it. These general principles will, therefore, also be open to scrutiny by Parliament.

The Bill also provides for the transfer of existing staff in prosecuting solicitors' departments to the new service. Recognising the experience and calibre of such staff, the Bill sets aside the normal requirement for recruitment by way of competition and enables the staff to be transferred in a block under regulations to be made by the Attorney-General. The regulations will set out the terms and conditions which will govern the transfer, which will be negotiated with representatives of the staff concerned. These negotiations have started. As we said in the White Paper in October 1983, we are concerned to proceed in the fullest consultation with those who now work in the system. This is a time of considerable change for the staff concerned and I recognise the uncertainty that it has caused for them. But it is also a time of challenge, with the enhanced responsibilities given in the Bill and the career structure implied by a national service. I am confident that the staff concerned will rise to that challenge.

The cost of the new service will depend very largely on the numbers of staff to be employed by it. As some hon. Members may know, a study has been commissioned from management consultants on the factors affecting staffing levels in the new service, including the working methods to be adopted. The cost cannot therefore be finally determined until we have had an opportunity to consider the final report from the consultants, which will be submitted very shortly, but the cost of a national system is not expected to be significantly higher than that of a local one. Whether staff are organised on a national basis or locally, there will still be the same need for advocates in court and for the preparation and review of cases by lawyers and their support staff. There will be an extra cost for the small central management function which will be located in the Director of Public Prosecutions department, but this will be at least partly offset by the increased efficiency which we expect the national service to achieve, including the savings from increased delegation of casework.

Part II modifies the provisions governing costs in criminal cases. Changes are made both of principle and of practice. The new service will be funded directly by parliamentary Vote, and awards of costs from central funds in its favour are not therefore required. The Bill also puts other public authority prosecutors in the same position, while retaining the power of the courts to award private prosecutors their costs from central funds.

Part II will widen considerably the scope for granting costs from central funds to successful defendants who are charged with summary offences. There is, of course, at present no power to make such orders, and this has long been recognised as anomalous. This was clearly a matter of considerable concern in another place and the changes to the Bill that were made there as a consequence will represent a significant improvement to the current position. Powers are also sought to enable the courts to make such orders in respect of costs as they think fit against any party to the proceedings who has put an opponent to unnecessary expense in relation to those proceedings. Thus, part II not only brings the present provisions for costs up to date but introduces significant and, I hope, welcome reforms.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): As the Government are busy decentralising, left, right and centre, partly on the argument that centralised costs are always higher than decentralised costs, is my right hon. and learned Friend being serious in suggesting that the costs involved in this measure will not rise substantially above those which would apply if there were a locally based independent prosecution service?

Mr. Brittan: I am saying that, and I gave the reasons why. I went on to talk about a different aspect of costs —the award of costs—but at an earlier stage I said that one was talking only about the extra cost of the small central management function of the Director of Public Prosecutions department, and I indicated that that would be at least partly offset by the increased efficiency which we expect the national service to achieve, including savings from increased delegation of casework. So I do take that view.

The House will recall that the Bill as introduced in another place included a clause empowering the Attorney-General to refer to the Court of Appeal any Crown court sentence which appeared to be excessively lenient. The particular sentence would not have been affected, but the Court of Appeal would have been able to offer an opinion on it. We saw this as a strictly limited but none the less worthwhile change which would have helped to strengthen public confidence in our system of criminal justice. The Court of Appeal already takes the opportunity, when passing judgment in appeals against sentence, to set out principles of sentencing in particular kinds of cases for the guidance of the lower courts, and I very much welcome its willingness to do so. The procedure which we proposed would have widened that role by providing an opportunity for the court to give guidance specifically in the context of cases where the sentence had given rise to public concern. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General made it clear that the power was one which he would want to use sparingly.

This proposal did not find favour in another place. I must say to the House frankly that my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and I were not, and are not, persuaded by the arguments deployed there. It would be difficult to recognise the essentially limited measure which I have described in the apocalyptic visions which were conjured up by some of those who spoke in the debate in another place. Their chief criticism—that the procedure for referring sentences would have breached the principle that the prosecution should not be involved in sentencing decisions—seems to me, with great respect to those who advanced it, misconceived. There is a world of difference between routine prosecution involvement in sentencing decisions—which would, of course, be quite at odds with our traditions—and a procedure under which the Attorney-General, as a Law Officer, assesses whether a sentence has given rise to genuine public concern and raised issues which could usefully be ventilated in the Court of Appeal. Nevertheless, the strength and breadth of feeling on the subject in another place was considerable, and not to be set aside lightly—certainly not without a wider measure of support for the provision than has so far come forward.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon) rose——

Mr. Brittan: No, I should like to finish.

I should accordingly like to reflect on the matter further. I have no present plans to reintroduce the provision during the remaining stages of this Bill, but I do not propose simply to let the matter rest. Public interest in sentencing—which was scarcely mentioned in the debate in another place—is strong and persistent and we shall do the country no service if we ignore it. I shall, as I have said, reflect on the matter further and will in any event have it very much in mind in preparing the Criminal Justice Bill which we plan to introduce later in this Parliament.

Mr. John Morris: I shall comment more generally on what the right hon. and learned Gentleman has said, but he distinguishes between the role of the prosecutor—the routine prosecution, as he calls it—and the intervention of the Attorney-General in a case under the original clause 22. How would the Attorney-General know how to intervene unless he had heard from one of the routine prosecutors?

Mr. Brittan: I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman will appreciate that there is a wide variety of other sources of information which the Attorney-General has, as all of us have, about particular cases which cause public concern. I am not suggesting that those involved in the prosecution process would be forbidden from communicating any concern that they had to the Attorney-General. However, that is a different matter from the legitimate concern that would arise if it were part of the routine prosecution function to consider in every case whether such a reference was necessary.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Has the Home Secretary considered, perhaps when thinking about the future Criminal Justice Bill, restoring the power of the Court of Appeal, criminal division, to increase sentences as well as reduce them upon an application for leave to appeal? That would be a jolly good way of discouraging frivolous appeals.

Mr. Brittan: It might be a good way of discouraging frivolous appeals, but it would not meet the particular concern with which the original clause 22 was designed to deal. It would be a very foolish defendant, or one who was very poorly advised, who found himself in a situation in which an unusually lenient sentence was passed and he none the less appealed. Therefore, whatever the merits of the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, it does not amount to an alternative to the proposition that was originally advanced.

One of the more significant new features which part III will introduce is a scheme of time limits on bringing cases to trial—new, that is, in England and Wales. Right hon. and hon. Members will know that statutory limits on the period before trial have for many years applied in Scotland.

We see clause 22, which provides for time limits, as an important part of our strategy for reducing delay in bringing cases to trial. I do not need to tell the House why the problem of delays is urgent and compelling. The Home Affairs Committee documented it in its report "Remands in Custody" last May. The increase in our prison population since 1979 is not because more offenders have been sentenced to imprisonment or to longer terms of imprisonment; the number of prisoners under sentence has remained steady at about 35,000. Instead, the increase has come about because the number of prisoners awaiting trial has increased from 4,000 in 1979 to 8,000 now. Some of those in custody have waited a year or more. There are more untried prisoners partly because the courts are dealing with more cases and more people are being remanded or committed in custody. The other major factor is that the periods spent in custody awaiting trial have grown longer.

Where the accused is in custody, delay is particularly serious. All unnecessary delays are against the interests of justice. Memories fade. The accused is left uncertain of his fate and the impact of conviction and sentence is less closely connected with the offence. The case for speedy trial is overwhelming, whether or not the accused is in custody.

We have in hand a number of measures to tackle delay. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has secured additional resources for the Crown court and is taking steps to ensure that they are used as efficiently as possible. He and I recently issued a circular to the magistrates courts about means by which delay could be reduced. We are anxious to encourage the courts to play a full part in tackling the problem. It is a problem the solution of which does not lie in the hands of the courts alone. The move towards statutory time limits, which would bite essentially on the prosecution, is therefore part of our strategy.

In going down that road, we are in tune with the Home Affairs Committee's helpful report. It is true that time limits will not of themselves increase court capacity, but they will set a standard, and their existence should stimulate the same sense of priorities elsewhere in the system and have a general "toning up" effect. The fact that the prosecution has a duty to prepare itself to proceed within a set period should generate a greater sense of urgency all round.

Accordingly, clause 22 gives the Secretary of State power by regulation to specify preliminary stages of proceedings, that is up to commencement of trial, and to set limits to them. Different periods may be set for different areas, in case the field trials which we are now planning suggest that this will be necessary — undesirable as it would be—in order to fix limits which are both tight and realistic. Two kinds of limits may be prescribed: custody time limits on the maximum period for which an accused may be remanded or committed in custody in proceedings for the same offence; and overall time limits on the period the prosecution is to be allowed to complete each stage of the proceedings.

The court dealing with the case will have power to extend a time limit in any case, but only if it is satisfied that there is good and sufficient cause for doing so, and that the prosecution has acted with all due expedition. There will therefore be a direct discipline on the prosecution. Of course, where the delay is caused by the defence, the prosecution could expect to have its application for an extension granted.

If a custody limit is reached, the accused will have to be released on bail. The clause provides for the regulations to apply appropriate provisions to release in those circumstances. The court might be empowered, for example, to require the accused to stay at a specified address or to keep away from witnesses.

If an overall limit is reached, the Bill provides that the accused is to be treated for all purposes as having been aquitted. This may mean that an accused does not have to face proceedings because the prosecution takes too long bringing the case to trial. Some will baulk at that result, but it is the only ultimate sanction to compel the prosecution to meet a time limit. It is possible now for the courts to require the prosecution to proceed within a given period, the consequence being that if it does not the case is lost. I trust, of course, that the new prosecution service will avoid that consequence by bringing cases forward expeditiously. That is the whole point and that objective, broadly, is what has been achieved by the Scottish legislation covering these matters.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): At least, as a matter of principle, will my right hon. and learned Friend try to see that these matters are dealt with in an even-handed fashion, so that the delays that can be brought about vexatiously by the defence will trigger off the same sort of treatment as when delays arise from the prosecution improperly or inadequately preparing its case? I have in mind the fact that some precise time limits are placed upon the police in bringing prisoners to a point where they can be charged under the new arrangements.

Mr. Brittan: I entirely agree that the benefit that we are seeking to confer by these specific time limits on prosecutions should lead to a tightening up of the whole criminal process, including, I hope, a more rigorous approach to unjustifiable delays on the part of the defence. I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Why did the Home Secretary think it appropriate to split responsibility for setting the time limits between the Lord Chancellor and himself? As I understand it, under section 77 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 the Lord Chancellor has the power to set time limits in respect of a Crown court. It would seem more natural to concentrate the powers which the Home Secretary has described under the Lord Chancellor's Department.

Mr. Brittan: No doubt those matters can be considered in Committee. The provision to which the hon. Gentleman refers has not been a generally effective means of securing the purposes that I have just been describing. I think that what is proposed in the Bill will have that effect.

Mr. Lawrence: Can I tempt my right hon. and learned Friend to be a little more forthcoming about the time limitation which he envisages might be the rule for the regulations? Is he thinking about the 110-day rule, as there is in Scotland?

Mr. Brittan: I do not have in mind particular time limits in terms of a number of days. I shall explain how we hope to come to the decisions on what the actual time limits should be. I have described the scheme, but clause 22 is an enabling provision, leaving the specification stages to be limited, and the time limits themselves, to regulations to be made by statutory instrument. I should like to explain why we are not at this stage proposing particular limits which would apply directly.

The Home Affairs Committee recommended that the Government should commit themselves in principle to the introduction of limits, geared to the establishment of a national prosecution service, and should embark on experiments to test what limits might be feasible in summary and indictable cases. The Committee further recommended that the period eventually agreed upon should take into account the special difficulties faced by the courts in London and the south-east.

That is the approach that we are adopting. The powers will be there, if Parliament approves, when we need them. In the meantime, we shall embark on field trials in a few areas to test the practical implications and effects of the scheme. We shall also then be able to judge what limits are appropriate. It would be unwise to commit ourselves even tentatively to particular periods at this stage. The limits will need to be tight enough to act as a real discipline. On the other hand, they should not be so tight that there will be frequent applications to extend them to which the courts would feel obliged to agree. My Department is drawing up plans for the field trials, and we shall want to consult fully, both nationally and in the areas concerned.

Regarding the timing of the implementation of the legislation, we are aiming to bring the new service into operation in October 1986, except in the six police force areas covering the metropolitan counties, where — to avoid two reorganisations one after the other—the new service will start operating from April 1986. When the powers to make time limits can be invoked must of necessity depend on the outcome of the field trials, which will take a little time, but I can assure the House that we shall move as quickly as we can in this area. I wish to make it clear that our commitment to the principle is clear. The field trials will test not whether but how the time limits are to be applied.

The changes made by the Bill are of fundamental importance to the operation of our criminal justice system. It is my belief that improving the efficiency and fairness of the system, to which both the Crown prosecution service and time limits can contribute, will enhance public confidence in it. This should be an objective shared by us all. I accordingly commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): We in the Labour party welcome the main thrust of the Bill to set up a prosecuting service which is independent of those responsible for investigating offences — the police. There may be differences of view on both sides of the House about whom the service should be accountable to. It is interesting that the Government have adopted the views of a dissenting member of the Philips Royal Commission. Some are not persuaded that the proposed solution is right, but I go along with the Government's proposed solution. No hon. Member, and certainly not the Home Secretary, can accuse me of being an advocate of centralism but, indeed, of the contrary. In this area, which is different from policing—I am a fervent opponent of a national police force—there is no role for local or local government accountability for decision making.

I am satisfied that the proposals to decentralise decision making to the local officers are an important step to separate the agglomeration of wheat and chaff that has accumulated through piecemeal statutory intervention on the desks of the director and the Attorney-General. I am pleased that the Government have yielded to persuasion from another place to enhance the status or, at least, the title of prosecutors. Titles are important. I hope that that will help to reinforce the role of the chief Crown prosecutor and the Crown prosecutor, as opposed to Crown prosecutors and prosecuting officers, as originally envisaged.

Given our experience of the Government as an advocate and practitioner of centralism, the matter must be watched. There is an undertaking, when the service has settled down, to review the provisions which require the consent of the Law Officer or the director. Clause 9 provides for the director's annual report to be laid before Parliament. I believe that that was to be done many years ago.

More should be promised. England and Wales are entering into a novel area. Within five years of the operation of the new service, there should be an independent inquiry into its working. We propose Bills in Parliament, but we have no inbuilt machinery to consider how effective they turn out to be. Given the lack of unanimity about the accountability of the service, that is, about to whom it should be accountable, and given that the Government, who are relying on an internal working party's report, are flying in the face of the Philips report, we should at least be promised that if both the Government and I are wrong, without loss of face the machinery should be set up so that the matter can be reconsidered free from departmental restraints and inhibitions. A five-year period would be a proper and suitable period for the service to settle down.

The suggestion has been made that, although the Bill, which separates decision making and prosecution from investigating and charging, is an important step in the right direction for the freedom of the individual, it is part of a balancing act with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Although the Opposition approve of the purpose of the Bill, that is in no way to be taken as our acceptance of that argument. When Lord Elton introduced the Bill, he expressed the aim to increase public confidence as one of the purposes of both Bills. Indeed, the Home Secretary also said that this afternoon. I hope that the Bill will do so. So far, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 has not earned its spurs in that regard. Indeed, the reverse is true. Public confidence is important and, as a sign of flexibility in considering what is being done, we should have the machinery, lest the Bill should turn out not to be right.

The Government have probably opted for the most expensive solution, despite what the Home Secretary said. He was especially vague about that. I thought that the Tory party was greatly concerned about taxpayers' money and that it should be quantified. However, the Home Secretary was not helpful in that part of his generally helpful speech. I see the concurrence from hon. Members below the Gangway that there was an element of vagueness and fudging in what he sought to tell the House.

This is not a privatisation measure. So far as private solicitors who continue to do some of the work in this area, and so far as the proposals are to do more magistrates' court work in-house with full-time officers as opposed to briefing barristers, this is an extension of State activity, and central State activity at that. I am glad that Conservative Members realised sharply, as I would expect, that that seems to run contrary to the whole theme of the Government's privatisation philosophy. I thought that I would make that point so that the House would understand that I understand that, even if the Cabinet as a whole does not.

Despite the Government's assurances, I fear the long-term future—perhaps not so long term—of the criminal Bar. What will happen when the Treasury gets its hands on that? Who can put his hand on his heart and say that in five or 10 years' time there will not be a Rayner report or something of that ilk, which advocates more and more in-house work? I fear that that will be the Treasury's approach as surely as night follows day and it would strike at the heart of an independent profession which I believe to be one of the bastions of liberty.

The proof of the pudding will be in the eating. As I understand the arithmetic, after allowing for the transfer of staff now doing the work, the replacement of 600 police officers should make it a cheaper service, although the redeployment of the officers would be an additional financial burden. I therefore find the Home Secretary's position on cost difficult to swallow, unless it is a public acknowledgement that policemen are more highly paid than lawyers, which may well be so. Be that as it may, we are entitled to examine this aspect very closely in Committee and we shall not be satisfied with the type of case put forward by the Home Secretary today.

The service must be rewarded in such a way as to attract good people. The career structure promised must also satisfy some of the best people. I understand that existing prosecuting county services do not find recruitment easy. If the new service is to bear the promised fruit, as we hope, it must attract lawyers of quality who can give proper consideration to the material before them and, now that they are separated from police activity, take a more detached attitude to their responsibilities.

The physical rehousing of the prosecutors away from buildings occupied by the police, where necessary and practicable, will also be an important step in ensuring that independent prosecution, like justice, is seen to be done.

The Association of Prosecuting Solicitors has raised an important point about salaries and status. How will the salary of prosecutors be related to that of chief constables? The intention is clear in terms of status, but it will be undermined if salaries are not comparable. On this point, the Home Secretary was particularly vague and unhelpful. He must have some idea of the salary envisaged for a chief Crown prosecutor, and he can scarely maintain that he cannot disclose what he has in mind. I hope that the Solicitor-General will be able to help us on this important matter when he replies to the debate.

The same principle applies to this as to other specialist areas. I have some experience in this because many years ago I was responsible for that part of the scientific Civil Service that was answerable to the Ministry of Defence. Difficulties arose due to the relationship between it and other civil servants. I found that many run-of-the-mill scientists were better rewarded in toto than their counterparts in industry, but that problems arose when we wished to retain or obtain the services of more able practitioners because we were hidebound by general restraints and Civil Service career comparability. This aspect must be examined carefully and I hope that it will be a subject of particular concern in the review that we hope to establish.

We are also entering a new area in terms of the responsibilities of the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions and their relations with the House. A fine balance must be achieved between accountability to the House and the danger of too detailed examination of individual cases that have been devolved down. If administrative devolution is undermined by the sheer weight of statistics and information flowing to the director's office, devolution itself may be negated.

More generally, I have often wondered how this country can afford an administrative machine which has to be prepared to answer to the House at two or three days' notice on the most mundane of matters which happen to come within ministerial responsibility. Certainly no industrial machine could afford that. Given the complexity of modern state intervention—whatever history may call the present Government it will not describe them as a non-intervention Administration—we must consider whether we can afford this, but that is a matter for another day. The application of the doctrine of ministerial responsibility poses real problems as we enter this new area and only a very confident or perhaps ignorant man would claim to have found the perfect answer at this stage.

The Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions will be intervening less in particular cases and there is to be a review to achieve more consistency in this respect, but to whom will the residuary legatee be answerable? Like the Government, I have rejected local answerability, so to whom is the Crown prosecutor to be answerable?

The office of the Director of Public Prosecutions is a marvellous safety valve for the Attorney-General. After an initial hiccup not long after the office was created, it has grown in respect. The Attorney-General can come to the House and state that he has been advised by the director. The Attorney-General is above all else a political animal —that is why he is here—whereas the director is not a political animal, and that is the strength of his office. That is a matter of considerable assurance to most people.

While the director's role was limited we could survive on the philosophy—attributed, I believe, to the present director—that his relationship to the Attorney-General is not that of a permanent secretary to a Minister, and, of course, it is not. Indeed, it is more. The director is an independent expert. But we are now in a new ball game. In a parliamentary democracy we cannot allow offices of state to expand, however well they are thought to be fulfilling the state's needs, without seriously considering the problems of accountability. The interface between the Crown prosecutor and the director, between the director and the Attorney-General and between the Attorney-General and Parliament poses fundamental problems.

I believe in the accountability to Parliament of all servants of the state. I do not believe that there is any short cut to that end and I am not sure tht we have found the right or permanent solution in this case. I believe that this aspect must be examined further. Experience will have to tell us how best to work it out in the future. The aim must be ultimate accountability with a minimum of particular intervention. This is not an exact science.

I very much welcome the improvement in the Bill in setting out what must be contained in the director's guidelines to prosecutors. That is an essential aspect of the need for the Bill — to achieve natural uniformity in decision making while allowing individual discretion within the guidelines. I am sure that anyone with knowledge of criminal work will agree with me here. In my youth, some county prosecutors were notorious for seeking their pound of flesh and the search for truth was not always the motivating factor. It would be putting it too high to say that persecution took the place of prosecution, but it came fairly close to that in some cases. Other forces were more relaxed, but even now there is far too much fiction in the idea that prosecuting counsel is an independent agent. Despite the efforts of the past few years in reducing the sheer numerical weight of counts in indictments, there is still room for improvement.

Counsel are not independent. Time is lost in the courts today in seeking new instructions during trials. Cases are brought that should not have been brought. Two or three youngsters may plead to offences involving, say, motor cars. The fourth, who refuses to plead to an offence of allowing himself to be carried in a vehicle, will have the benefit, at cost to the State, of a full trial. He is frequently very much on the margin. Therefore, mature, independent and speedy response will help to make the flame of justice burn more strongly. That is another of the hopes and aspirations in the Bill.

I listened with interest to the Home Secretary's comments on the original proposal in the Bill about the referral of sentences to the Court of Appeal. I was reminded of the words of the old song: "She would not say yes, she would not say no". The Home Secretary appeared still to believe in his original premise, but did not find it convenient or expendient to proceed now.

In all my readings of the Royal Commission and the White Paper I have yet to discover an independent progenitor of the clause as originally drafted, whereby sentences passed by a Crown court judge, which the Attorney-General believed should have been different, should be referred to the Court of Appeal. That would mean that the Attorney-General thought that the sentences were too lenient.

The other place did a great public service in throwing the clause out on its ear. Apart from the poor, benighted Government spokesman, the clause had only one friend among 14 noble Lords who spoke on it. Seminars of judges and recorders have thrown up their hands in horror.

What was the origin of the clause? The Government were elected on a platform of the maintenance and improvement of law and order. Resources were to be provided to tackle crime properly. The clear inference was that, after the period of the wicked Labour Government, the crime rate would fall. Resources were provided, but the crime rate did not fall. In every branch of crime, it rose. Ministerial activity had therefore to be apparent. At the Tory party conference the wolves were baying for blood. The "Hang'em and flog'em" brigade was in full cry. Scapegoats had to be found. The Home Secretary, bringing all his wisdom to bear, was the fall guy. His track record on capital punishment had won him many friends. He was aided and abetted by public concern about one or two sentences and by some unfortunate judicial comments. He therefore presented to the conference the tablets of stone—or at least one slab of reconstituted stone dust. Eureka—he had found the answer: let lenient sentences be referred to the Court of Appeal. There was a useful precedent. The Attorney-General could refer points of law of difficulty and dissatisfaction. Why not, therefore, report erring judges? Let them be put in the stocks in the Strand.

Having gone out on a limb quite unnecessarily in the wake of the Ponting case to support the trial judge in his law, the Attorney-General——

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Quite right.

Mr. Morris: That may well be, but it was a novel role for the Attorney-General, given our belief in the constitutional separation of the judiciary from the Executive.

Whether he was right or not, he declined my invitation in a written parliamentary question to refer to the Court of Appeal important matters of law that had arisen in the trial. I do not blame him. The danger that after a jury had brought in a verdict of "not guilty" an appellate court might do the same thing was more than one man could stand.

I exonerate the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General of the present frivolity, which, fortunately, the House is not to be burdened with now — although the Home Secretary is putting a pistol to our heads, letting us know that he may well return to it on a more propitious day. I fear that the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General have been leaned on by their political friend, the Home Secretary. Apart from the fact that the machinery was ill-thought-out and that no Department of State except the Home Office could have devised such machinery, exemplifying both legal and political novelty, there was also a complete failure to understand the role and duties of the prosecutor. Prosecutional neutrality is fundamental to our judicial process. The prosecutor is himself a minister of justice. His job is to present the facts fairly and, only where the facts so justify, to seek — but not to strive unfairly to get — a conviction. His job is to present but not to persecute.

What role has the prosecutor in sentencing? The very rules of the Bar prohibit any role. I quote:

"Prosecuting counsel should not attempt by advocacy to influence the court in regard to sentence."

I have asked the Home Secretary how on earth, if there is a distinction between the occasional intervention by the Attorney-General and the norm for routine prosecutors, the Attorney-General is to find out whether something has gone wrong. The Home Secretary said only that there were other means. That must mean the newspapers. There would be a re-trial, as regards sentences, by the newspapers. That is a real danger. As judges and as the other place has argued at length, there would be elaborate campaigns to build up a head of steam before such a reference was made.

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): Although the right hon. and learned Gentleman has held many offices of State, he has never served in the Law Officers' Department. Every day, I receive many letters about sentences of all kinds. Plenty of information is received not from newspapers or prosecuting solicitors, but from ordinary citizens.

Mr. Morris: I am most grateful to the Attorney-General. That confirms my view. If the prosecutor is not to have a role, the newspapers would have such and would, together with independent letters, help to build up a head of steam that might make the Attorney-General's task exceedingly difficult in some cases.

The central theme of the Bill is to enhance the independence of prosecutors. The clause under discussion contradicts in one material part the whole theme of the Bill by clouding the traditional role of independence that prosecutors are enjoined to adopt.

Hard cases hardly ever make good law. Good law-making is not enhanced by seeking to placate political supporters who are reacting illogically to current events. It would have given me considerable joy if the Home Secretary, having seen the light at last, had told the House today that the Government had no intention of proceeding with the matter. Unhappily, he gave us no such assurance.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I am not a lawyer and am trying to follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman's argument. Is he saying on behalf of the Opposition that sentences ought never to be increased?

Mr. Morris: If the hon. Gentleman, who acts for the police, had bothered to read the original Bill, he would know that even the Government did not suggest that there should be an increase of sentence. The original proposal was that opinion should be given about the adequacy of the sentence. That is an entirely different matter. I have not adumbrated the arguments advanced in another place, but could do so at length. The Lord Chief Justice has issued guidance from time to time on a wide range of issues which he thinks other judges should bear in mind, although each judge is wholly independent. That recently happened with cocaine, and the same has been true for non-violent offences. Such reasoned and lengthy judgments have been of great help. The Lord Chief Justice has been supported by other judges in the Court of Appeal when delivering such judgments.

We should consider the ignominy of a defendant who has been let off too leniently and has his name dragged through the courts again. However, I do not want to go into the merits of the matter.

I had hoped that the Home Secretary would pay tribute to the constructive way in which the other place considered the Bill. It has emerged a stronger and better Bill. There is much to welcome in it, but there are still some areas of concern, which I am sure will be approached constructively. The other place gave much thought to the Bill's effect on the prosecution of children and young people. The fears might be best met administratively. I welcome the extension of the right, to acquitted defendants, to take costs from central funds in summary trials and on certain appeals. However, I have reservations about the effect of those provisions on a defendant who is contributing to his legal aid.

I welcome the proposals to set time limits for the prosecution of criminal offences. I wish that they were more definite and left less to experiment. We might hope to reassess those provisions when the experiments are completed. The Home Secretary was especially vague and failed to respond when asked what period of time he had in mind.

Mr. Brittan: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman favour the recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee that there should be trials on these matters before decisions are taken, or does he think that he knows all the answers now?

Mr. Morris: If the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been listening, he would have heard me welcome the experiments. However, I should have welcomed even more some indication that he had reached a view about what period should be involved. He seems to have none in mind and to be waiting to see what turns up.

Mr. Brittan: What is the point of experiments if that is not the case?

Mr. Morris: With respect to Ministers, the difference here is between an open mind and a blank mind. As with costs, the Home Secretary is not able to assist the House as much as he might.

The Government have not got it right as regards the discontinuance of prosecutions by the prosecutor. I agree that the prosecutor should be able to do that, but I suspect that many defendants will take their chance and insist that the prosecutor come to the court formally to offer no evidence, rather than rely on discontinuance, to avoid the possibility of future prosecution. We shall see.

I should have liked the Government to take this opportunity to introduce legislation on the right of defendants to advance disclosure of the prosecution's case in magistrates' courts. That issue has been around for many years and I should have hoped that we would be told——

Mr. Brittan: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that that has been done and that the relevant provision will be implemented in a matter of months? The right hon. and learned Gentleman ought to acquaint himself with the facts.

Mr. Morris: I have followed this issue with some care and I had hoped that the long-awaited promises would be fulfilled. I know that reform is coming, but I should like there to be some discipline to ensure that it comes soon.

I suspect that the minutiae of the Bill will not be the main cause of worry to us. There will be some points of difference, but they will be dwarfed by anxiety on both sides of the House about how the animal to which Parliament is giving birth will carry out its task. Its trainer is the Home Office, but its riders will be the Attorney-General, assisted by the Director of Public Prosecutions. They, not the Home Office, will carry the can. The Government have done much in another place to alleviate the fears, but we need machinery which ensures that independent expert judgment is brought to bear on prosecutions.

I have no objection to the proposal that investigating and charging remain under the same responsibility. The real power lies in the prosecutor's power to discontinue, provided that he is sufficiently robust. There should be greater uniformity and yet awareness of local needs. Guidelines should be framed to encapsulate those aims, which do not necessarily coincide and could be said to be potentially in conflict.

I am sure that parliamentary pressure for greater accountability to Parliament will grow. Lord Rawlinson percipiently observed in another place that the Bill might impose more parliamentary duties on the Attorney-General, and he wondered whether that had been thought of. I think that he is right. Bearing in mind the caveats that I have entered concerning the dangers of central accountability negating devolved administration — a difficult tightrope to walk—none of us should object to greater accountability. Indeed, in a parliamentary democracy we should welcome it. Nevertheless, we should always be wary of growing complexity and intervention by the modern state and ensure that the House does not abdicate its responsibilities. Any increase in centralisation must include machinery for accountability. Parliament will only have begun its task when the Bill is passed.

5.18 pm

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): I welcome the Bill. This is not a party political matter, and the Bill is important because it deals with the prosecution of offenders and, therefore, with our criminal law. I was therefore somewhat surprised at the near complete lack of support on the Opposition Back Benches for the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) during his speech.

It is right that the prosecution system should be independent of the police and that we should have a Crown prosecuting agency. I do not think that it will make much difference in practice, but it is important that justice is not only done but is seen to be done, and that the division between the investigation and the prosecution of offences should be recognised in this way.

Like the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, one can remember experiences of one's early days at the Bar when one felt that the prosecution, in the form of the police in certain smaller borough quarter sessions, was attempting to exert an unnecessarily substantial influence on the way that prosecutions were conducted. I do not believe that that happens today. Nevertheless, it is right that we have accepted the recommendations of the Royal Commission and are setting up a totally separate service.

I am convinced that the Government are right—and I am glad that the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, speaking on behalf of the Opposition, agrees—in having a centralised service and not one that is locally accountable. The Royal Commission was wrong in recommending that the prosecution authorities should be locally accountable. They should be accountable through the Director of Public Prosecutions to the Attorney-General.

One point with which I should like my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to deal when winding up the debate relates to clause 4, about which the Home Secretary said nothing. This clause, as it stands, merely provides that Crown prosecutors should have the same right of audience as solicitors holding practising certificates. One understands why the clause is there. Without it, barristers employed by the Crown prosecuting agency would not have the right of audience which at present exists for solicitors who would be employed by that agency. It is obviously right that they should have this right.

Equally, the clause says:

> "The reference . . . to rights of audience enjoyed in any court by solicitors includes a reference to rights enjoyed in the Crown court by virtue of any direction given by the Lord Chancellor under section 83 of the Supreme Court Act 1981."

The Solicitor-General knows well the concern that exists among the younger members of the Bar that the effect of setting up a Crown prosecuting agency may over the years amount to having a salaried prosecution service at the cost of prosecutions being done by members of the Bar. I do not believe that that is the Government's intention. Indeed, it would be totally unacceptable if the price for an independent prosecuting service was to be the death of an independent Bar.

I invite the Solicitor-General to repeat the assurance which I understand was given in another place, namely that the Government have no intention of widening the rights of audience of solicitors in the Crown courts, thereby allowing those employed by the Crown prosecuting agency to undertake prosecutions in the Crown courts. If the prosecution of cases, whether they be pleas of guilty, committals for sentence or appeals, were to be taken out of the hands of the Bar in the Crown court, that would have such a deleterious effect on the chance of young members starting at the Bar as to be a grave attack on the future of an independent Bar.

The Solicitor-General should also confirm that since, at the moment, a defence solicitor who has defended someone in the magistrates court is entitled to appear for that person on a committal for sentence or on appeal, clause 4 does not mean that the same will apply in regard to prosecutions. In other words, can he confirm that it does not give to the Crown agency the right to do committals for sentence or appeals in the Crown court? If it does, the Bar is right in fearing that that would be the thin edge of the wedge towards a salaried body taking over the prosecution of cases in the Crown court and, therefore, a serious attack on an independent Bar, which is extremely important for the future of the country.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): No doubt my right hon. and learned Friend will agree that, although the opportunity has been given for solicitors acting in criminal proceedings on committals for sentence and appeals to the Crown court to take advantage of their right of audience, they have singularly failed to do so universally throughout the country. Therefore, to extend that practice to the prosecuting side of the profession would no doubt be equally useless because they would find, as defence solicitors who specialise in that find, that they do not have the time to appear in the Crown court.

Mr. Carlisle: I am afraid that I do not agree with my hon. Friend—I wish that I did. I think that the reason why solicitors do not normally take advantage of the right to appear in the Crown court for the defence is that they probably have only one client and they find it more convenient to give that case to a member of the Bar who is already appearing in that court. If the prosecution authority had the power to deal with committals or with appeals, it migh have three or four cases in the same Crown court on the same day, and it would start using that power. It is because I think of that distinction that I am anxious that the Solicitor-General should confirm that the clause does not give that power and that the Government have no intention of widening the rights of audience for solicitors in the Crown court.

The second point with which I wish to deal briefly relates to the present clause 22. I shall reserve my remarks for the ill-fated clause 22 to the end. Clause 22 allows for time limits. This is an important part of the Bill. The Home Secretary is right when he says that the delay in cases coming to trial is of major concern in the conduct of our criminal business. Justice delayed is often justice denied. For those who are in custody and who are then acquitted or who receive a non-custodial sentence, it means that much time may have been spent unnecessarily in prison. That cannot be right.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary mentioned the large number of remand prisoners. If my recollection of my days as a junior Minister at the Home Office is right, one might also point out that usually these people are kept in the most overcrowded conditions in any prison. One should think not only of those who are on remand in custody, but of those who are on remand on bail. Those of us who practise in the courts and who are used to appearing in court often forget the strain on an individual who is charged with an offence which to him is of major importance even if it is of a reasonably minor nature. The fact that he has that hanging over his head for an undue length of time is not acceptable. In fact, it is utterly unfair. Therefore, anything that can be done to speed up the hearing of cases must be right. The third reason why it must be right is that the recollection of a witness of events is inevitably tarnished by the passing of time. If, by bringing in time limits, we help speed up the hearing of cases in the Crown and magistrates courts, the clause is welcome and important.

To digress for a moment, the reasons for the delays are extremely complex and varied. The delay is due partly to the increased volume of crime, but it is only that. To stick to what I know best, the Crown courts, they are chock-a-block with many cases which could have been dealt with in the magistrates courts. I suspect that I speak not only for myself on this point. My experience, sitting as a recorder in the summer months—most hon. Members try to sit in September, when there is no question of the House sitting—it is that one is regularly trying cases, at great expense to the state, which could adequately have been dealt with in the magistrates court.

What is more, one often finds that when the cases get to the Crown court the defendants duly plead guilty to offences which could easily be dealt with in the magistrates courts. There is nothing that one can do about it. One must not sentence a person more severely because he pleads not guilty or because he chooses to exercise his right to go to the Crown court. The only thing that one can do is to make him pay the costs, but, regretably, he is probably unemployed or on such a low salary that he cannot possibly pay. One has no sanctions against such an individual.

I realise that the proposals of the James committee, which reviewed the amount of work going to Crown courts, was controversial, but it is time that we again took the James report out of the proverbial cubby hole in the Home Office and dusted it off. We should at least debate its proposals in what court cases should be tried summarily.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend think that perhaps the reason why some of these cases come to the Crown courts is that magistrates courts are so often badly serviced and run? Time and again there are cases where someone wants to plead not guilty, his case comes on one week, but the court sits for only one hour a day, and the next hearing is a week later, with the next one three months later, and so it goes on. At least in a crown court a case starts at the beginning and goes on to the end.

Mr. Carlisle: My hon. Friend is right. The extraordinary system in London, where cases in the magistrates courts are adjourned for weeks on end, is a disincentive for trials in magistrates courts. All I am saying at this stage is that we should address ourselves to the question of why so many trivial cases—they are of course important to the individual—get to the Crown court and block up the court. Equally, from my experience of sitting as a recorder, it is disturbing to find that, despite pre-trial certificates and such things, cases listed as trials often turn to pleas in court, and the court duly adjourns well before lunch. One cannot keep other cases hanging around just in case such a thing should happen.

Various aspects of the way in which we divide the work between the magistrates courts and the Crown courts, and the mehod of trial by Crown courts, need to be looked at if we are to deal with the matter of genuine concern—the delay that takes place. Some cases are so stale when they get to trial that they become irrelevant.

Mr. Lawrence: My right hon. and learned Friend may have missed a remarkable development in recent months. I am referring to the Government's implementation of private schemes for the section 48 requirement to serve the prosecution evidence in magistrates courts proceedings. As a result, there has been a large increase in the number of pleas of guilty in magistrates courts, which means that in due course my right hon. and learned Friend's court will be less burdened with cases coming up from the magistrates courts than it might otherwise have been. Perhaps my right hon. and learned Friend would like to congratulate our right hon. Friends on the Front Bench on that.

Mr. Carlisle: I do congratulate my right hon. Friends on that. I may have overlooked it, but I am glad that it has happened. As was said in the other place by those who have looked at these matters properly, that is one of the ways in which to encourage more cases to be dealt with by the lower courts. I welcome it entirely.

I make two other points about delay, both of which are personal and based on my experience, but worth making. The feeling is shared by many that cases take longer in London than elsewhere. I am not sure of the cause of this delay. It may be the fault of my profession, or it may be due to the organisation of the courts, but, whatever it is, one gets the impression that there is not the same urgency to get on with cases in the metropolitan area as in other parts of the country.

Secondly, there has been a remarkable change in the length of time that cases take. I think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, who started at the Bar at about the same time as I did, as did the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, will agree that any case that took three days used to be thought of as a long case. Now, any case that takes less than two weeks is considered to be a short case. The photo-copying machine, perhaps our own verbosity—of which I am probably at the moment guilty—and various other matters all caused this to come about, and the problem needs to be considered. I welcome clause 22 and hope that it will have some effect this year.

The great thing about a Second Reading speech is that one can talk about what is not in the Bill as well as about what is in it. Therefore, I shall talk about what is not in the Bill now, but was there when it started in the other place—the old clause 22. I thought that the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon spoilt his rather good argument by making a bad point about the Ponting case. Like him, I am glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has decided not to attempt to restore that clause to the Bill.

I was concerned when I read the reports in the papers after the defeat of the old clause 22 in the other place that that was the Government's intention. As I attempted to express my view that I was opposed to such a move by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, I say now in his absence that I am grateful that he decided not to do it. However, I am concerned at the suggestion that this decision is only temporary. Surely my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General must realise that the old clause 22 was ill-thought-out, illogical and wrong in principle.

It was wrong in principle because the prosecution in this country does not have an interest in the length of sentences imposed. Whatever my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General may have said, and whatever may have been said in the other place, the old clause 22 could not have been run without the prosecution having an interest in the length of sentences. Who otherwise will draw the matters to the attention of the Attorney-General? From whom would the pressure come if not from the prosecution, which was to be asked if it thought that the sentences passed were adequate?

The old clause 22 would also have meant that the Attorney-General would have had a direct involvement and interest in sentencing. It is as wrong that in sentencing in individual cases the Government or the Attorney-General should have a direct involvement as it is that prosecution counsel should have a direct involvement. The old clause 22 was misconceived and ill-thought-out, because it would not have dealt with the allegedly identified evil at which it was aimed. Of course, the occasional notorious lenient sentence causes concern, but the Bill did not provide that such sentences could be put right. It proposed that the Attorney-General should have the right, under the cloak of anonymity if possible, to refer a case to the Court of Appeal so that it could say whether the sentence was notoriously lenient or right.

Let us consider that concept. If there were to be anonymity and no one knew which case had gone to the Court of Appeal which said that Judge A was wrong, how would the public's concern be placated? If the intention was to placate public concern, that could be done only if it was known that an appeal related to the case of Mr. A who had been dealt with notoriously leniently.

It is nonsense to suppose that the public would be placated to hear that Mr. A, who had been fined £5,000, should have gone to prison for 12 months, but was still walking the streets. That would not improve the standing of the judiciary in the eyes of the public. It would not increase confidence in the working of the legal system. The proposal was ill-thought-out.

Such a procedure would be unfair on individuals. Sentencing is a matter for an individual judge, who hears all the evidence. Cases differ in degree and mitigation differs in individual cases. The only people who can make up their minds are those who hear all the facts in open court.

What would happen at the Court of Appeal? Would the judge be represented to say why he gave the sentence that he passed? Sentencing cold, knowing that the sentence that the court said it would have imposed will not be served, will lead to pressure for longer sentences. Therefore, sentences will be pushed up, but the Home Secretary and the Lord Chief Justice have both said that their general desire is to reduce the average length of sentence.

There is an adequate existing system. The Lord Chief Justice lays down guidelines for sentences. That has happened in cases that have caused great concern. The Lord Chancellor has expressed a view about the inadequacy of a sentence and, within a week or two, the Lord Chief Justice has laid down general guidelines on what the proper sentence should be in general cases, though not in individual cases, where the mitigating circumstances are not known to him. That is the right way to proceed.

Having spoken for far longer than I intended, I end by sending a message to the Home Secretary. Clause 22 had no friends except my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). It was opposed unanimously by all who sit as judges, recorders or in any sentencing capacity. Obviously, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary had to say today that the Government would not necessarily accept for all time the defeat in the House of Lords and that he would look at the matter again. I suggest that, having looked at it, he should chuck it and forget it.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), I support the Bill's general principle of separating the investigative and charging function from the prosecution function. I believe that both sides of the House accept that that is a good thing. However, I have more reservations than my right hon. and learned Friend or the right hon. and learned Gentleman about the centralising effects of the Bill on the prosecution service. The House ought to worry about that.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South tempted me to intervene when he put up an understandable, vigorous and spirited defence of the criminal Bar. I wonder whether, when we have an independent Crown prosecuting service set up by the Government, it will be necessary to be so preservative of the rights of the Bar. By definition, the Crown prosecutor will be a responsible, independent person. I hope that the Home Secretary will extend rather than restrict his use of the powers under section 83 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.

It would be nonsensical if a Crown prosecutor who had conducted a case from its inception had to hand it over to a barrister when it reached the Crown court. That would be particularly nonsensical in the case of a guilty plea. There may be some cases where it is necessary and no doubt the Crown prosecutor will often prefer to hand a case over to a barrister, but there will surely be many cases when it will be quicker and cheaper for the Crown prosecutor to carry on with the case, especially when there are guilty pleas.

I have not practised as a solicitor for 15 years, so I have no interest in the matter, though I retain a warm regard for my former profession. However, I should declare an interest as an honorary vice-president of the Association of County Councils — the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison) is the other. The ACC is worried about the Bill's centralising effects.

Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon, the association does not accept the financial memorandum. It believes that the proposed scheme will cost considerably more than is set out in the memorandum. My right hon. and learned Friend made an excellent suggestion when he said that we should look at how the system works over the next five years—this is a leap in the dark in England and Wales—and that if it does not work properly or becomes too costly or too centralised or we find that insufficient local judgment is being allowed, we should produce a new Bill to remedy the defects.

In the old days, some courts were virtual police courts. Cases were presented by a chief inspector or an inspector or even by a sergeant. I sometimes felt great anger when I saw that policemen had spent considerable time, night and day, pursuing a case, only to have it thrown out on a simple, elementary matter of law when the prosecuting authority had been too mean to employ a qualified person to conduct the case. As a result, villains got off.

Circumstances have changed. All but six county councils have a prosecuting solicitors' department under either a chief prosecuting solicitor or the chief executive. Therefore, in the vast majority of cases there is that independence between the prosecution and the solicitor-client relationship or between the police—perhaps the police authority—and the prosecuting department of the county. That system works very well, but the Bill will throw it away in favour of a more centralised system.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon said that he was second to none in his opposition to a centralised police force. I must say to him and to the House that a centralised prosecution service could be a first step along that road.

Another fear of the Association of County Councils is that, although the Home Secretary said that considerable local independence would be given to Crown prosecutors, the White Paper nevertheless contains a provision for very tight control should the central prosecuting office decide that it needs greater control. The Government may say that they are opposed to local prosecution because there is a risk that a politically-motivated county might influence its prosecutions. Can the Government tell me of any instance of that happening since the 1964 Act? That view might be relevant to certain centralised services where there may be political influence, but I do not think that there is a single instance—whether the political control of a county be Conservative, Labour or Liberal — of any political intervention at county level in the prosecution of a case. I am greatly worried about centralisation, about its possible effects and about the disruption of a system that is working so well.

I suppose that the Government will say that people in prosecuting departments can automatically, if they wish, go into the national prosecution service. Indeed, the financial and public service manpower memorandum shows, astonishingly, that the figures to operate the new scheme will be considerably greater than those needed for the existing scheme. It appears that jobs will be available, but that need not necessarily apply on the ground. A prosecuting solicitor, managing clerk or senior person may not want to leave his county. He may have a wife working as a teacher, or something similar. If he goes into the national prosecuting service he can be sent elsewhere. Therefore, he may elect to leave the prosecution service and go into another branch of the law. That could be a danger for existing staff.

I am speaking mainly on behalf of the Association of County Councils. It is seriously concerned about clause 17(2). Although I applaud most of the Bill in its effect on costs, clause 17(2) prohibits the payment of costs out of public funds to any local authority. I am talking not about the ordinary, run of the mill police criminal case, but of many other cases taken up in the courts by a local authority. The provisions of clause 17(2) could have serious repercussions on local authorities and the way in which they operate. Local authorities are scared to death of targets, limits and budgets and of what may happen if they stray a few pounds over a target. Therefore, there is the possibility that a local authority may be deterred from undertaking a major prosecution because it feared that even if it won its case the costs would be too great if it could not ask for them to be met by public funds. I do not think that the clause is necessary. I hope that in Committee the Government will agree to delete that little irritation from the Bill. Indeed, I know that they made a great many amendments to the Bill in another place.

I have considerable worries about the centralising effects of the Bill and I hope that in Committee the Government will agree to give much greater independence to the man on the spot—the local prosecutor—and less power to the central prosecuting authority.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes), with whom I have discussed many matters. I think that this is the first time that I have had the pleasure of following him on a strictly legal issue. Unlike him, I am not a solicitor. Nor, unlike my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), am I a barrister. That gives me an enormous advantage in dealing with this Bill.

The Bill has two origins. First, the Philips Commission produced an excellent report which recommended that an independent prosecution service be introduced. Secondly, the Bill has its origins in the Committee stages of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. In the last Parliament, the Government decided that an independent prosecution service was not necessary and could not be afforded. Therefore, it was not included—as Philips recommended—in that Bill. Indeed, it would have made that Bill so unwieldy that it would have been quite unmanageable in Committee, so the Government were right not to include it.

I distinctly recall that my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Whitelaw said that such a service would be extremely expensive and could not be afforded. I also recall that the Government reached the conclusion that they would be unable to get the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill through both Houses unless something was done about an independent prosecution service. So we owe this Bill not only to Philips but to the realities of parliamentary procedure—and that is democracy—in the Committee stages of that Bill. I make no complaint about that, and I do not think that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will do so either.

I very much support the Bill in principle. When the idea of an independent prosecuting service was first adumbrated by Philips, it was opposed by many in the police service — in which I am happy to declare an interest. It was especially opposed by many superintendents who had been effective prosecuting officers. They were worried that the Bill would take away from the police a duty that they valued. Some of the strictures that we have heard, including some from my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, about the present system are not justified. I recognise that there has been a certain haphazardness and some public disquiet, but by and large, for the reason given by the right hon. Member for Halton —that in most counties there already is separation between the police and the prosecution—it is not the case that public confidence has been lost in the present arrangements.

On the contrary, compared with many other countries —and I have some knowledge of the United States and possibly a little of France and Germany — over the generations we have had a relatively efficient and certainly an economic system of bringing prosecutions against which there is not a strong indictment. Notwithstanding that, I think that the Bill should be carried. It clearly ensures that in future there will be a proper distance between those whose duty it is to investigate crime and apprehend offenders and those whose job it is to prosecute those people before a court of law. It must be right to distance these two functions. I believe that in the long run this will be in the best interests of the police service as well as in the interests of criminal justice.

I support the Bill just as strongly because of its outward appearance. In the end, it is the reality—the substance —that counts, but appearances matter too. The Minister of State in another place used an old cliché when he said that justice must not only be done but be seen to be done. The Bill will contribute to that end by the openness of the procedures, and therefore I welcome it for its appearance —for its cosmetics—as well as for its substance.

I must, however, make four points which cause me concern. The first is about the so-called specified proceedings. Henceforth, the Director of Public Prosecutions, and, under him, the new independent service, will become responsible for the conduct of all criminal proceedings, with the exception of specified proceedings. It is important that the Solicitor-General should tell us tonight exactly what those specified proceedings are to be. They are defined in the Bill as whatever the Attorney-General says specified proceedings should be. All the more reason why my hon. and learned Friend should state clearly what this means.

There is, unfortunately, a small but important group of people in society who will not benefit from the new independent prosecution service. I refer to police officers who are accused of minor criminal offences. Whenever a police officer is accused of a major criminal offence the matter goes to the Director of Public Prosecutions. Before the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was passed, all criminal charges against the police went to the director, and rightly so, for a charge of crime against a police officer is never minor. Any charge against a police officer involving crime means that he is in breach of his oath of office and contract with the public.

Unfortunately, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act created a distinction between those allegations of major crime against the police which will continue to go to the Director of Public Prosecutions and those minor criminal charges which may henceforth be dealt with by the local chief officer of police by way of discipline.

The value of the director, particularly in these matters, was that he guaranteed impartiality, total independence, and consistency as between one police area and another, and he guaranteed that if there was a decision not to bring proceedings under the 50-50 rule or as contrary to the national interest, that judgment would be made by him on a national and consistent basis. No chief officer of police can do that. No officer should arrogate to himself the ability to decide what is or is not in the general public interest.

Fortunately, that will not happen under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act because only minor criminal issues concerning discipline will be applied to police officers so charged. Nevertheless, it is wrong in principle that the Bill should say that henceforth all criminal proceedings shall be dealt with by the independent prosecution service except charges of crime against police officers which are regarded by the local chief constable as minor.

Having for more years than I care to remember been involved with the police, I know that many chief officers, admirable people though they are, can be affected by local pressures, quite apart from being influenced by a man's previous discipline record. In addition, their attitudes vary from one force area to the next. The purpose of the Bill is to remove haphazardness and inconsistency. Let the measure apply to all and not to all save that small number of police officers who are subjected to minor criminal allegations.

I cannot believe that my hon. and learned Friend intends to deal with this matter under the specified proceedings exception. The definition of "proceedings" may or may not cover the question of charges of crime, and that may provide a technical way out of the problem to which I have referred. Be that as it may, I urge the Solicitor-General to recognise that this is a matter of some importance to the police and should be dealt with clearly.

My second point of concern is about the same matter but in relation to clause 8. I shall not deal with Committee points at this stage, and I hope that the Government Whips will note that I have no desire to become involved in any Standing Committee proceedings. The weight of legal skills on Standing Committee would in any event, be such that my presence would contribute nothing.

Under clause 8, however, the Director of Public Prosecutions can, and no doubt will, require all chief officers of police to tell him what is going on. They must send him reports. I hope that under this power the director will require chief officers to report what they have been doing about all minor criminal proceedings affecting their officers. In that way, the director will be able to form a judgment in the event that a chief officer has been improperly influenced by local, political or other considerations or where he has been unjust or unfair to accused officers in his application of discipline.

My third point is about appeals against sentence. I join the overwhelming majority of police officers in being dissatisfied with the present situation in which derisory penalties are imposed and about the fact that, at least in some courts, there seems to be an unwillingness to make the sentence match the crime.

I appreciate all the arguments against what was proposed in the original measure, particularly in the ill-fated clause 23. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South. Indeed, had it come before us, I would have voted against it because it was a dog's dinner. It would have created the worst of all worlds. It implied that, somehow, something would be done, but it would in fact have achieved nothing but chaos.

Therefore, from the point of view of the police service, on the one hand, and from the view of my right hon. and learned Friend, who may have seen it from a different angle, on the other, it is clear that, whatever disagreement we may have had on the substance of the matter, we come together in believing that what was proposed was wrong. For that reason, I am glad that their Lordships decided to throw out the clause.

However, I part company with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South in that I welcomed the remarks of the Home Secretary today in which I understood him to give notice of his intention to bring forward some mechanism by which appeal against sentence will in future be allowed. That, I gather, will be introduced when a new Criminal Justice Bill is brought forward. I hope that I interpret the Home Secretary aright on that. An examination of Hansard tomorrow will show that he went much further than simply making the best of a bad case. My understanding is that my right hon. and learned Friend gave an undertaking that the Government would provide a method of appeal aganst sentence, but we shall have to wait and see. I hope that the Government do so.

I appreciate the fact that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General may start from a slightly different base from that of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. Sometimes, however, triangles on different bases have the same apex. I hope that the customary unanimity of view will be expressed later by the Government Front Bench.

I hope that there will be some form of appeal against derisory inadequate sentences. I express that hope not out of a desire for revenge or a wish to appeal to the public outside, who are affronted by over-lenient sentences, but in the interests of justice. Over-lenient sentences are as much an injustice as excessive sentences. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General should take action.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: I hope that it was not thought that I was implying that one should not be concerned about over-lenient sentences. One should be concerned about them, and I agree with my hon. Friend. Should we not try to achieve greater consistency in sentencing? That can be done only by the Court of Appeal giving guidelines in the way that has already been done in certain respects. I agree that over-lenient sentences are just as serious as excessive sentences.

Mr. Griffiths: I am glad that, as a legal amateur, I appear to have achieved a degree of unanimity between two Queen's Counsel, the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South, in accepting that excessively lenient sentences are as offensive as excessively harsh sentences. If there is consensus on the problem, let my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary come forward with a solution and not simply do nothing, as he would do if he left out clause 23 and took no further steps. I for one shall wait eagerly to see what he produces. I do not envy him his task, but I look forward to hearing more details when we consider the Criminal Justice Bill.

I tread diffidently in considering my fourth point about delay. My concern is that it may be thought outside the House that all delays are inevitably caused by the prosecution. That is not so. In some cases the defence mischievously, vexatiously, frivolously or maliciously holds up the proceedings. That is not in the interests of justice. The Bill should be even-handed. It should place constraints on the prosecution. It is a scandal when justice is delayed and denied. It is a scandal when there is improper delay because of the inefficiency of the police or the courts. But equally it is not in the interests of justice when delays are caused for mischievous reasons by the defence. It is important for the court to be able to impose penalties on both the defence and prosecution alike for unnecessarily and wrongly delaying proceedings.

Not all the delays arise from the police service. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General knows a great deal about this aspect. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act has started a new series of clocks running with regard to the prosecution of offences. Regardless of the weather or the evidence, within 36 hours or, in some cases, 96 hours of a person being arrested the matter must be brought forward. No one knows more about this than my hon. and learned Friend, for we have soldiered through the vineyards—I through two, he through only one.

Is the ticking away of the clocks which has been brought about by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act additional to the requirements arising from this legislation that the Home Secretary contemplates introducing? It may well be that my right hon. and learned Friend wants to put both aspects together, and that could be one of the reasons why so many experiments are required. There is an urgent need for clarity. For example, a house may be burnt down and the police may have reason to believe that it was done not by accident but deliberately by the owner. It may take the police four days to sift through the rubble under which they find someone who has apparently been murdered. The police need time to undertake that forensic sifting before they can prosecute. I want to ensure that the time allowed by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act to permit the necessary investigation to be undertaken before a person is brought to trial is additional to the time allowed taken for bringing a prosecution to trial. I suspect that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will be able to satisfy me on this point.

Mr. Ryman: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has just made a completely false point. It is well established that it takes time to collect and examine forensic evidence. Inevitably, charges are brought and the forensic evidence is offered later when it has been assimilated and statements have been produced.

Mr. Griffiths: If I am on a bad point, the Solicitor-General will be able to meet my point entirely. One of the attractions of the House is that one can elicit clarity from Ministers and the apprehensions of those outside can thereby be lessened.

But the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) is not entirely on a good point. His party took a strong line on this. The agreement that he has shown to the proposition that investigations take time and this must be allowed for was not accepted by the Opposition during debates on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. On the contrary, the Opposition opposed the idea and, on a number of occasions, voted that way on three-line Whips. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, who does not always slavishly follow his party's line, did not do so.

I turn finally to costs. Originally, because of the expected very high cost, the Government opposed bringing in the Philips recommendations in the timeframe suggested. I shall not embarrass my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General by citing the estimate that I was given but I believe that the costs will be a great deal more than the financial memorandum suggests. I do not know whether my figures are accurate, but it has been broadly put about that the 600 police officers who are in one way or another engaged in prosecution throughout the country—apart from those in metropolitan London—will be replaced by about 400 solicitors. Lest the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon is under a misapprehension—he suggested that the police are better paid than the solicitors—I must tell him that 600 police officers are a great deal less expensive than 400 solicitors. Those police officers are not prosecuting full time, but are performing other duties as well. I believe that basic staff costs will be higher than has been suggested.

The Conservative party has rightly committed itself to containing public expenditure. That is central to everything that we seek to do in our economic and social policies. The Government, however, have drastically increased public expenditure in relation to law and criminal justice. In a sense, I am one of the shop stewards who have probably helped to bring about the largest public expenditure increase in a long time on the police. I am sure that that was a correct decision by the Government.

In addition, over the past two years, the Government have, through the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, introduced new costs with the tape-recording of all interrogations—and rightly so, but there will be a cost. We have introduced a requirement for a new consultation procedure between the police and the local community—and rightly so, but it will have a cost. We have required detailed training of the police in all the new procedures provided under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, in particular, custody officers and all that goes with that—and rightly so, but there will be a cost. We have brought about a new police complaints procedure and authority—and rightly so, but it will have a cost. We have vastly increased the paperwork of the police—not so rightly so, but it will have a cost.

Taking all those matters into account, I am worried that further costs will be incurred as a result of passing the Bill.

The Bill is a good one. But if we will the end, we must will the means. That goes without saying. I am worried that the aggregate cost of all those changes will place severe pressure upon the cash limits of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. From experience I know that when his cash limits are pressed, police manpower often suffers. There are now 1,200 fewer police officers in post than there were a year ago. At the end of a year in which we had the miners' strike and at the end of a period during which all police establishments increased from the appalling levels that were left by the previous Labour Administration, police manpower establishments have rightly rapidly increased. Yet largely because of rate capping and partly because of the additional costs being incurred at the centre, actual police manpower levels are falling. We were not elected to achieve that.

All these proposals involve additional cost. I am anxious that it should not be taken from the police manpower budget. I make that appeal to the Chancellor on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friends the Home Secretary and the Attorney-General. If as a result of these important new measures the cash limits imposed upon the Home Office need to be expanded, let them be expanded. Let not the costs be taken from the police manpower levels.

I welcome the Bill. It will remove burdens from the police. It will separate the investigation and apprehension of criminals from the prosecution of offences. The Bill deserves to be passed, but there are some consequences that need to be thought about carefully.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) began by pointing out that he was the only non-lawyer to have spoken. He played on the value of his contribution because of that. I noticed that he slightly resiled from that position when it came to the matter of serving on the Committee. The hon. Gentleman's point of view is important. I must confess to being a lawyer but one with no professional knowledge of the practice of criminal law in England and Scotland.

As a Scot representing a Scottish constituency, however, I have considerable knowledge of the workings of an independent prosecution service. Some of the fears expressed about it when the idea was first mooted for England and Wales by Justice as long ago as 1970 were somewhat misplaced. The fears expressed by the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr Carlisle) about the risk that a national prosecution service would lead to a national police force were completely misplaced. No centralisation of the police force in Scotland has flowed from the existence of a national prosecution service.

I welcome the Bill's purpose and the establishment of an independent prosecution service, as do my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Social Democratic and Labour parties.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: Liberal.

Mr. Maclennan: I do not know about the Social Democratic and Labour party. As the Bill does not touch the other side of the St. George's channel, its views are understandably not being expressed in the debate.

I welcome the Bill because I believe that it will ensure that the legal processes involved in prosecuting offenders are separated from those who are responsible for investigating crime. The arguments put forward by the Philips Commission on that point were compelling.

The Government were right to opt for a national rather than a local service primarily because that will ensure uniformity of practice throughout the country, and less because I believe that undue influence would be exercised upon a local service. I wholly support a decentralised police force—I am completely opposed to a national police force—but it has been disgracefully subject to local political pressure, notably by some irresponsible Labour-controlled local authorities or Labour-dominated police authorities, and at no time more than during the miners' strike.

The reason for supporting a national independent prosecuting service is that we wish to ensure high and uniform standards of conduct. I welcome the assurance given by the Lord Chancellor that the same rules of professional conduct will be required and expected of those in the service as of those in private practice. It is important to establish clearly in the public mind that the new service is not an extension of the Civil Service but a legal service wholly separated from the Administration.

In the light of the remarks of the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South, it must be said that the separation of powers in this country is much less than Montesquieu described. There is some benefit in the legislature having a link with the judiciary, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman illustrated with his experience as a recorder. It was of considerable benefit to the House to hear views expressed by someone who has had to act in a judicial capacity. I would not, therefore, argue to the limit for the separation of powers.

I echo the concern expressed by the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South about the possible impact of clause 4 of the Bill. I hope that the Solicitor-General will have something to say about the concern that the clause may give rise to Treasury pressure to reduce expenditure on the use of independent barristers for prosecuting work. Like the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I take the view that that would be a wholly retrograde and undesirable consequence. I hope that our anxiety can be set at rest.

The broad framework of the Bill seems to me to be right. I do not offer the kind of grudging support to the principles of the Bill that was offered by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) on behalf of the Labour party. He seemed to be saying that he agreed with the Bill but, because he was speaking for the Opposition, had to find reasons for refraining from giving it his benison. That is the kind of unconstructive opposition that leads to frivolous suggestions.

One frivolous suggestion that the right hon. and learned Gentleman made was that as a result of a provision of the Bill a statutory inquiry should be established in five years' time. Apart from any other consideration, it would be quite ridiculous to place the shadow of such an inquiry on those seeking to operate the independent service. Secondly, if such an inquiry were to be required by law —which seemed to be what the right hon. and learned Member was suggesting—it would be likely to freeze the practice during the next five years, when a flexible approach to the administration of the independent service is needed so that as problems arise they can be corrected, if necessary by administrative action, and not be put into some kind of capacious bag to be looked at when the statutory inquiry is set up.

The broad framework is, I think, right, although I accept what has been said about costs. Like the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, however, I do not believe that the costs argument should have weighed against the introduction of the independent service. I believe that the Government, at an earlier stage in their life, were wrong when Lord Whitelaw refused to contemplate this on the ground of cost.

I turn now to a number of matters of detail on which some concern has been expressed. The first relates to the provisions on the setting of fees and expenses and, in particular, the setting of fees for counsel. I do not understand why the Bill proposes that the Attorney-General should settle the fees of prosecuting counsel by regulation. It would be infinitely preferable that it should remain a function of the Lord Chancellor to fix the level of fees for prosecuting counsel as he does for defence counsel. Indeed, prosecuting counsel should have a right of appeal to the taxing master.

This is not a pettifogging issue; I believe it to be a matter of some importance from the point of view of principle. The principle is that those who appear before a court ought to be represented by the best advocate available and should not be in any different position because there are different scales of fees for counsel prosecuting and for counsel defending. Perhaps I have not expressed that as clearly as I might. It is important that both sides in a case should be similarly remunerated for their effort. Furthermore, if we move down the track proposed in the Bill there is some reasonable expectation that it will disturb what has been called the "cab-rank rule". I hope that the Government will consider that point, because I cannot see that there are any advantages in what the Bill proposes.

Similar considerations apply with regard to witnesses' costs and expenses. In the Bill there is a certain confusion about this because under clause 19(3) the Lord Chancellor appears to have the power to regulate witnesses' expenses, but under clause 14 the Attorney-General seems to have the same power. That is perhaps a point that could be better dealt with in Committee.

On another important point of detail I should be grateful if the Solicitor-General would say why the Government have made the proposal that prosecution costs should be payable to private prosecutors only in the case of indictable offences. As I read the Bill, that is likely to put at risk the possibility of prosecutions for summary offences being initiated privately by important bodies such as the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children or the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Although such prosecutions are rare, the costs of them should be reimbursable out of public funds, as is the case with indictable offences. I hope that that matter can also be looked at.

Another issue central to this debate, and about which I intervened in the Home Secretary's speech, is the question of the extensive powers to set time limits—a principle with which I am in full-hearted accord. I reiterate the point that I endeavoured to make in my intervention, but with greater clarity. I do not object to the concept of setting time limits, but this is a responsibility which ought to rest not with the Secretary of State but with the Lord Chancellor, who has the power under section 77 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 to set the minimum and maximum periods which may elapse between a person's committal for trial and the beginning of the trial in the Crown court.

It seems odd that the Lord Chancellor, who is responsible for the administration of justice, including the efficient management of the courts, and for the allocation of resources as between courts so as to ensure the maximum efficiency of the court service, should not have this particular power in respect of time limits. If we are to have a properly administered criminal court service, it is desirable that the Lord Chancellor should have that responsibility and, indeed, that all aspects of the administration of criminal justice should effectively be in the hands of a single department. It is known that many Social Democrats and Liberals favour the concept of the establishment of a ministry of justice, which would of course bring about that end. I regret the splitting of responsibility in what is now clause 22.

I turn now to the old clause 22, although only briefly because, like other hon. Members who have spoken, I welcome its demise. The proposal that the Court of Appeal should give advice on sentencing policy on a reference from the Attorney-General in respect of a particular case seems to me to show peculiar insensitivity to our legal traditions. It would be a highly unsatisfactory way of attempting to answer the perfectly legitimate question how best to ensure that the views of Parliament — and it really is ultimately Parliament's responsibility — about the appropriate sentences for particular offences are translated into effective decisions by the courts.

The Government's original proposal had few friends. I suspect that it was a gesture, but it was a misconceived gesture. I do not think that the Home Secretary, in his remarks upon the future of this principle, gave the commitment that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds seemed to think he had given. It was not my understanding that he had undertaken to introduce any such proposal in the future Criminal Justice Bill or, indeed, in any legislation. He simply reminded the House that there was such a Bill in the pipeline and that he had an open mind. I think that that is a graceful way of backing down, and is certainly not to be taken as an attempt to reintroduce a wholly unacceptable proposal. I would prefer to give the Home Secretary the benefit of the doubt on that issue. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad that other hon. Members in the Conservative party take the same lenient view.

The Bill is not devised for the benefit of lawyers, although lawyers appear to have dominated the debate. The Bill is devised for the better administration of criminal justice. I believe, on the basis of the experience that we have had in Scotland of an independent prosecution service over a long time, that it will be as successful in England and Wales as it has been generally in Scotland.

I should like to refer to a point of detail in the remarks of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds about the police. I was not aware of his point about minor criminal offences, but it is my understanding that in Scotland at least, if there is any element of criminality in an allegation against the police, the matter is referred by the chief constable to the procurator fiscal. If the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds is right, it would be wise to look at the Scottish experience, which has not given rise to great difficulties. It seems to be a suitable protection for the police.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I am not only right, but the matter has now been enshrined in the statute of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, in that a chief officer will now be able to determine, at his discretion, whether a criminal charge against a police officer is a major one, in which case it must go to the Director of Public Prosecutions, analogously with the procurator fiscal, or whether it is a minor matter, in which case he will deal with it through discipline procedures. It is that mischief to which I object.

Mr. Maclennan: I was not referring to the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act described by the hon. Gentleman, which I accept. I was questioning whether the position would remain the same after the passage of the Bill that is now before us. It seemed to me that it might have the effect of repealing that provision. It would be extremely helpful if the Solicitor-General were to address himself to that question. I turned away from the conclusion of my speech because I was interested in what the hon. Gentleman had to say. I, like him, am concerned that the police should not be singled out for especially unfavourable treatment under the Bill.

This is a good Bill, and I have no hesitation in saying so from an Opposition Bench. Whoever said earlier that this was not a partisan matter struck the right note. Unfortunately, it was not said by the spokesman for the Labour party.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): The Government are rightly doing something more about law and order. They are making the prosecution of the offender more effective. New powers were given to the police by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, but since we live in an age in which the individual is considered to be more important than he probably ever has been before, there must be a balance of his rights against the increased rights of the state. That is why an independent prosecution service separating the power of investigating offences from the power of prosecuting offenders is such an important and welcome element in that balance.

So far, so good. The Government are introducing an independent prosecution service, and that is what everybody wants to see. Unfortunately, they then proceed to go wrong. We could have had a national service or a local service. If national, we could have had it centrally directed or locally directed, or we could have had a local service with nationally directed features. There are strong reasons for having a national service, but there are also strong reasons for not having it centrally directed, yet the Government have fallen hook, line and sinker for a nationally, centrally controlled system. They have swallowed the bait prepared for them by the Civil Service, and they are making us look a bit silly about it.

In whose interest is it always to have a centralised control system of anything, with a large, expanding bureaucracy? Why, the Civil Service. Which party is it which has as its principle the decentralisation of control rather than its centralisation, and the reduction of bureaucracy rather than its expansion? Why, the Conservative party — this Government's party. So I come quickly to the first reason why I am unhappy about the Bill. It runs counter to what I, as a Conservative, stand for — the minimum of centralisation and the maximum of decentralisation.

Of course, there might be no alternative to doing an un-Conservative thing if reform and improvement are to take place, but that is not the position here, because the Philips Royal Commission report on criminal procedure produced a sensible alternative — a national system which was not centrally directed but was locally based and directed. Therefore, my second reason for dissatisfaction with the Bill is that it specifically rejects what I regard as the much more sensible approach of the Royal Commission, which stated in paragraph 7.24:

"a centrally directed national prosecution system for England and Wales is neither desirable nor necessary".

Secondly, in paragraph 7.27, the report stated:

"the most practical solution and the one that is likely to offer the best means of achieving local accountability is to work upon the basis of existing police authority areas with a modified form of supervisory authority."

Let us consider what centralisation is likely to lead to. First, to centralise, one needs a large national organisation. A small national organisation will not do. It never has done for anything that is under central control, because one will need monitors to see how the system is working out in the sticks, one will need people to come and go, reporting on how the matter is working, and one will need supervisors — not just typists, and not just minor functionaries, but people who are in control and able to supervise. They will all add to the burden of large central organisational control and, therefore, to costs. Will this be the first time that costs will have been accurately forecast by Ministers speaking from the Front Bench, or will the costs be considerably greater?

The Conservative Government are fulfilling all their manifesto pledges by decentralising every nationalised industry known to man, and God bless them in their efforts. Why? One reason, we are told night and day—I agree with the reason — is that centralised control is always more expensive. If matters are allowed to proceed in their normal evolutionary way in local areas through local systems, which have an independent element because that is what this is about, the system will be much more cost efficient. We advance that argument in every other case, but miraculously that is the reverse of our arguments today. My right hon. and learned Friend assures us that the costs are limited and will be as stated in the Bill.

Secondly, the measure is not likely to strengthen the morale of solicitors, because solicitors who have locally based organisations which are performing well and efficiently will feel threatened. Along will come a nationalised, centralised organisation and solicitors, already destabilised by the measures which the House is taking about conveyancing, will feel edgy.

Nor, thirdly, is the measure likely to strengthen the morale of the young Bar. Several hon. Members have referred to it. The young Bar are barristers who have just qualified and who are beginning their careers at the Bar. They do a fair amount of local prosecution work, and their confidence, expertise and morale grow according to the work that they perform. However, they are like everyone else and wish to earn a living and to have a job. Obviously there will be work for the young Bar under the system, but it will not be as members of the young Bar. Increasingly they will be tempted into the more bureaucratic process —the safe life with holidays with pay, pensions and all that goes with being a civil servant working for the state boss. That is one of the serious features which we can consider, but not prove, might result from this over-centralisation.

When we remove young barristers, we dry up the process by which the independent Bar is sustained. It will not be long before that source of entry to the Bar slows down. That, together with the other features of the Bill, which will inevitably give to solicitors the right of audience in places where they do not now have such a right, means that it will not be long before the independence of the Bar begins to be swallowed up in this general centralising process, which has been the dream of civil servants for many years.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I do not disagree with all of my hon. and learned Friend's points. However, before he leaves the House collectively to burst into tears over the appalling prospects of the impoverishment and demoralisation of the legal profession and over impecunious solicitors and barefoot young barristers, how can he claim that that will be so when the measure will remove 600 police officers from their duties as prosecutors and increase the number of prosecuting lawyers by 400?

Mr. Lawrence: If the measure increases the number of lawyers prosecuting, it will increase them only if there are more cases. There will be more cases only if there are more police officers arresting people committing crimes. I hope that that will be the case, but it has not happened hitherto, and we cannot be certain that it will happen in future. If more lawyers are employed that will be good, provided that they are not employed by the state service. My hon. Friend is entitled to make light of my attitude to this matter, but the independence of the Bar is precious. It does not just happen, and it will not continue. The professions will become fused, and solicitors will appear for clients with whom they have a personal friendship. That is what happens in the United States, where the professions are fused. The independence of the Bar and the purity of our legal system will be undermined when that system takes over. We must guard against that.

There are signs in the Bill that that may happen. Not only I, but the young Bar and the Bar associations think that. Therefore, every hon. Member, whether he thinks highly or otherwise of the legal profession, should be worried about that and be careful lest we introduce a measure which speeds up the fusion of the professions and dilutes that especially important aspect — the independence of the Bar and the cab-rank principle, to which the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) referred.

Mr. Maclennan: Are not the hon. and learned Gentleman's fears somewhat exaggerated in the light of our experience in Scotland, where an independent service has existed for many years and where there is no move towards the fusion of the two sides of the profession?

Mr. Lawrence: Experience of law and order matters in Scotland never ceases to amaze me. There must be a secret reason why everything seems to work just right in Scotland. I am happy that it does, and I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will soon adopt from Scotland the flexibility of licensing hours, which has brought about a reduction in the amount of violence and crime contrary to expectation. We have much to learn from Scotland. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right and that my fears are exaggerated. I hope that I am wrong and that my fears do not come about, although the Bill makes it more likely that they will occur. Afterwards, it is too late to start worrying.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) said that this was not a privatising measure. He is right. It is a nationalising measure, and a Socialist measure. As such, it was rejected by the moderate right hon. and learned Gentleman, who seemed to despise its Socialist nature when he spoke against it. It is a state employee's measure.

Fourthly, there will be a centralising function to the usual Crown prosecutors. At the Bar, those who must pass on the work of local prosecutions will tend to use their usual people — the usual Crown prosecutors — unless someone says, "Spin the work around. Give it to someone else. Make sure that everyone has an opportunity of doing this kind of work." The cab-rank system will be less likely to operate. That is directly contrary to the views expressed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General in relation to Treasury Counsel prosecuting in the Central Criminal Court. In that context, he has said that we should spin the wheel so that Treasury Counsel does not automatically carry out that function and members of the criminal Bar generally can take part, perhaps leading to a fresher, shorter and more efficient use of resources than the system into which we have slipped. I wonder what my right hon. and learned Friend thinks of the reversal of that in the Bill.

[Mr. Lawrence]

For those general reasons, centralisation of this kind is likely to be dangerous. Is it really wise to reject the views of 14 of the 15 members of the Royal Commission, who regarded the scheme as undesirable and unnecessary?

My third reason for unhappiness about the Bill is that it will more readily lend itself to politically motivated direction. Strangely, the Government make the opposite point. They say that as there is politically motivated direction in county councils the matter should be centralised so that it does not happen. That may be true when many county councils are under Labour control and some are seeking to lean on local police forces in relation to miners and others while the central Government, under Conservative control, are pure and behave perfectly properly, taking no part in the judicial process.

Let us consider, however, the situation that might arise if a Government were formed by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), a gentleman who has been in government in the past and who sees nothing wrong in pickets getting carried away to the point of violence when acting in the cause of the working man's right to employment in the pits. Is it far-fetched to suggest that a Government under the control of such a person might make an edict that there should be no prosecution of pickets in those circumstances? Something very similar certainly occurred when a far more moderate Labour Government reversed all the processes of legal morality by granting amnesty to the Clay Cross councillors. Moderate men and reasonable lawyers took the view that that was in order. One has only to look a step further to the eventuality — unlikely, one hopes — of a politically motivated power applying its Left-wing principles to a national prosecution service.

My fourth concern is that the logic of a national prosecution service may lead to a national police force. Once there is a national prosecution service, it would be so much more convenient for it to relate directly to a national police force than to a large number of local forces under county council control which might take decisions unhelpful to central prosecution policy. At present, local police forces work well and have a close democratic connection with local people, but they could easily be swept aside in the interests of centralised efficiency. The present system of local prosecutions, made independent of the police, would serve perfectly well. If change is needed, it should be based on the existing system. We Conservatives believe that all change should be evolutionary, not revolutionary, but the Bill proposes a revolutionary process—a centralised, Socialist process.

I am sorry that I could not be friendlier to part I of the Bill, but I am about to be even more unfriendly to another aspect of our deliberations. An astonishing feature of our debates has been the posture adopted and maintained with surprising tenacity towards the introduction of what is essentially a charade, a plaything and a spoof—the old clause 22, which may come back in a new guise in a new Bill. We are told that the Government have not forgotten it and that they are very much persuaded by the strength of the argument, but that there is no need to hold this Bill up in the meantime.

Who is persuaded? No one who has listened to the arguments has been persuaded, apart from my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and his colleagues. Those of us who practise at the Bar and who know the views of members of the Bar and of judges cannot but be astonished at the deafening silence of the Lord Chief Justice on this, although we were told that he was the originator of the scheme. I do not believe that he was even present when the matter was debated in the House of Lords, probably because it would have been inconvenient to have everyone turning to him and asking, "What do you think about this, Geoffrey?" I do not believe that the Lord Chief Justice thinks much of it at all.

It is suggested that the Court of Appeal should solemnly gather at 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon in the Lord Chief Justice's court and pretend to consider the evidence in a case referred to it by the Attorney-General, with only a transcript of the evidence, and no knowledge of the demeanour of the witnesses, and then deliver a pretend sentence, without any power to change the original sentence, and without having spent days on the case as the trial judge did. In other words, it would simply state that in a similar type of case, in similar circumstances, a defendant with a similar past might appropriately have received such and such a sentence. The prospect of a charade of that nature being undertaken with equanimity by Her Majesty's senior judges should be enough to raise substantial doubts about the whole idea.

It would be a different matter if the judges involved could change the sentence, if they could try the person again without having seen the demeanour of the witnesses and without the knowledge that the jury had. There might be some sense in that, although not much. The public would be able to make known their view that a pat on the head and tuppence out of the poor box was an inadequate sentence for someone who had raped four women, and that 25 years would be more appropriate. However, for the public to be told that the man would have been given a sentence of 25 years if he had appeared before those judges, but that nothing has been done because the judges are not empowered to give an additional sentence, will not cause a very loud sigh of relief. Is it likely that the public will say, "It is good that we have gone through this charade. We feel much better about the case"?

Mr. Maclennan: What about the converse position? It might be that a man who was to languish in gaol for 25 years should languish for only 15 years.

Mr. Lawrence: It is unlikely that in those circumstances the Attorney-General would refer the matter to the Court of Appeal, because the counsel of the man who had received the savage sentence would appeal in the normal way. The process is meant to apply only to sentences thought to be inadequate. There is now no right to appeal against the inadequacy of a sentence.

Mr. Ashby: Do not the same objections apply when there is an appeal against sentence? The courts do not see witnesses. They hear arguments and read the transcript. Surely the better point is the double jeopardy point. It is a cornerstone of British justice that people should not be put in jeopardy twice.

Mr. Lawrence: The double jeopardy point is a good one, but as the Court of Appeal has no power to increase the sentence there can be no objection to the matter being considered again by a tribunal which has not seen witnesses. The worst that can happen is that the tribunal will say that the judge before whom the case came initially knew best and that his sentence is not to be disturbed.

However, the double jeopardy point is important, and it was brushed aside in a cavalier fashion by my right hon. and learned Friend.

Happily, the appeal measure is no longer part of the present Bill. However, to say that it will increase public confidence is no answer to the criticisms. The public will be shocked by the realisation that the tribunal can do nothing and that the measure involves no change. In that case, why not leave things as they are? At present, the Lord Chief Justice comes down like a ton of bricks in any case where there has been a patently absurd sentence. He asks the judge for an explanation. If the explanation is acceptable, nothing more is heard. If it is not, the Lord Chief Justice issues a guideline to the effect that in such cases it should seldom, if ever, be the rule that there should not be a sentence of imprisonment, for two, three or four years. Such guidelines have been issued in drug-peddling cases and others, and they have been most effective. Thenceforward, the judges, who have to keep in touch with practice directions from the Lord Chief Justice, have known that in certain circumstances the convicted man should go to prison for, say, a minimum of two years.

The proposal has a third dangerous aspect. The Attorney-General is to refer the matter to the Court of Appeal. Where does the Attorney-General appear? He appears in this place. If the Attorney-General were given power to refer sentences to the Court of Appeal, his question time would consist of questions from a long list of interested hon. Members about why the case of Bloggs, James, Smith or Brown had not yet been referred to the Court of Appeal—or the play-games committee. His life would be a misery. Nothing would be achieved, except that our local papers would note the fact that the hon. and learned Member for Burton, for instance, had raised in the House the case of Bloggs and Bloggs and that the Attorney-General had stated that he had decided not to refer the case to the Court of Appeal. If he were to refer every such case to the Court of Appeal, the court would have to sit night and day, and that play-games court would become an interesting sideshow for foreign tourists. Nowhere else in the world would such an absurd situation exist, and the respect which we are led to believe the rest of the world has for our system of law and order would quickly evaporate.

The whole idea is nonsense. My right hon. and learned Friend has been warned that it is nonsense by all the members of the Bar, all the solicitors and all the judges. For all that I know, the Lord Chief Justice may have warned him too. I ask my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to pass on to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General the request that he should not be so stubborn. Either the Government will have to eat humble pie, or we will look extremely stupid.

I have three nice words for the Government. First, there is the implementation of the section 48 pledges for the pilot scheme, as a result of which statements for the prosecution are served upon the defence in the magistrates court. That is superb. In the pilot areas, the scheme has resulted in a large number of pleas of guilty. The sooner the scheme is implemented nationwide, the sooner there will a massive saving of time in our courts. Trials will be processed more speedily, there will be less likelihood that witnesses will forget their evidence, and there will be more opportunity for justice to be done. I give the Government 100 per cent. approval on that point.

Secondly, the Bill contains an enabling power to set a time limit on prosecutions. It is as unsatisfactory as all enabling powers and, because it is so vague, more unsatifactory than most. However, it is time that the Government had power to put a time limit on prosecutions. In cases where they were getting a little slow and behindhand, nothing would do more than such a rule to spur the police on to get their tackle in order. Such a rule is long overdue.

Thirdly, I welcome the rationalisation and clarification of the question of costs in criminal cases, though I do not entirely understand why it is necessary. I thought that many of these provisions already existed. If not, I welcome them. Costs in criminal cases are an important factor which is too easily overlooked.

I have three hopes: first, that there will not be a vote tonight, because if there is my personal position will be a little difficult; secondly, that my fears about the Bill will not materialise; and, thirdly, that I shall not be invited to serve on the Standing Committee.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): I am delighted that the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has not repeated his marathon performance of a previous debate. I feared at one point that he might. His speech was amusing if irrelevant. Perhaps I might make some serious observations about the Bill in just a few minutes.

I am surprised and sorry that a political and partisan element has been injected into the debate by some hon. Members. This subject has nothing to do with party politics. Hon. Members should be more sensible and treat the subject seriously. I am also surprised and disappointed that a great deal of time has been wasted on discussing a clause that is not in the Bill—what profit is there in that —rather than those that are and the many practical problems that will arise from the establishment of an independent prosecution service.

I believe that the standard of prosecuting services in Britain, with few exceptions, is extremely high. The quality of staff in the counties and office of the Director of Public Prosecutions and that of the solicitor for the Metropolitan police is high. It is important to maintain the high standard. It was not always thus. The House will know that the standard used to be abysmally low in some parts of the country. We all know where they were. The present high standards are getting higher and the first aim of the Bill should be to set up a department that insists on extremely high professional and ethical standards.

The task of prosecution is to bring the facts of the case to the court, and to do so efficiently and as speedily as possible with fairness and clarity. The tradition established by the DPP is good in regard to general policy. The weakness of the Director's department is that, because of the overwhelming volume of work and the shortage of personnel, cases sometimes do not receive the attention that they ought to receive at each stage. The new service will have many growing problems in attracting sufficient able, experienced and expert staff to enable it to be run efficiently and fairly. The lead must come from the top. Ability, fairness and high ethical standards permeate throughout a department from the top. The ever-open door at the director's department and at the solicitor for the Metropolitan police's department is healthy. Everyone can consult somebody with years of experience. That tradition is valuable and should be maintained.

[Mr. John Ryman]

When the new service is established, the director will have a huge department within which will be merged all of the county prosecuting solicitors' departments and the department of the solicitor for the Metropolitan police, which I suggest merits separate consideration. There will be immense problems. The Solicitor-General and the Home Secretary have been good enough to listen to my representations in private. I know that there is considerable anxiety among experienced, highly competent and conscientious staff in county prosecuting solicitors' departments and the department of the solicitor for the Metropolitan police about what will happen when the new service is set up. It is essential that the standards are high. The learning and experience gathered over many years should not be dissipated or lost.

The Home Secretary has told us that the final edition of the management consultants' report has not yet been delivered. However, we have had interim editions, day in, day out, and a chance to examine them. It is clear from the comments of prosecuting solicitors' departments throughout the country that the management consultants have not investigated the practical problems fully enough. The report has been a lengthy process. I do not doubt that it has been conducted objectively and fairly, but it wholly lacks realism in many respects. I shall not trouble the House with a list of examples, but the report suggests that 10 minutes be allocated to a member of the new department checking an indictment. That statistic was produced after a great deal of research, but it is wholly unrealistic. I defy anyone to check an indictment in 10 minutes. It is physically impossible, even if the person concerned has a background knowledge of the case and has familiarised himself with the statements in the case. No doubt such practical details can be sorted out later.

I have been interested in these matters for some time. The Royal Commission report was published some two years ago. The Solicitor-General was a Minister of State, Home Office when I had an Adjournment debate—at about 2 am—on the criminal justice report, to which the hon. and learned Gentleman kindly replied. I have had much time to consider these matters and I have had much help in that from members of the present Government and the previous one. There is little to quarrel with in the Bill, but I am worried about the practical implications of setting up the prosecution service. If the management consultants' recommendations are followed too precisely and various concessions are not made, the quality of the new service might suffer. It is most important that that does not happen.

Will the Solicitor-General give us the Government's reaction to the establishment of the new service, especially on staffing? We are not asking for any guarantees or undertakings, but it is most important that those who work in county prosecuting solicitors' departments, the Director's office and the department of the solicitor for the Metropolitan police know much more precisely what their professional future is to be. This is a matter not simply of money, although money is relevant, but of status, service and career prospects.

I suggest that London is quite different from the provinces in these matters. The biggest prosecuting department outside London is Greater Manchester, with about 6,000 indictment cases a year. The figure in London is about 18,000, three times as high. London is different from the rest of the country for two reasons: first, because of the volume of work, and, secondly, much more so because of the large number of Crown courts. In the Thames valley area, which covers three police forces, there are six or seven Crown courts. There are many Crown court complexes in London that have within them six or seven courts. That is why London is completely different and merits different consideration. I understand that the proposal is to have three separate areas in London, each with its own officials and administration to administer what is now the Metropolitan police area of London. There will be serious problems, which the Government should consider, in dealing with the new department in regard to London.

I shall give the Minister only one example. The tradition in London, unlike many areas outside, is that at the Crown court there is a large number of staff from the department of the solicitor for the Metropolitan police who oversee a case from committal to trial. Experienced, qualified, competent and conscientious staff prepare the papers, see the officers, prepare the notice of additional evidence and so on. That is not the practice in the country where all sorts of variations take place. Sometimes the papers are prepared in a solicitor's office miles away from the court and there is no contact between the court and the solicitor's office unless a telephone call is made. The same applies to the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, where the people who are sent to court at the moment have not got the authority to make decisions. If instructions are required on a particular point, a telephone call has to be made to the professional officer in the director's office.

The purpose of the Bill is to change that principle. The proposal is that a qualified lawyer should see the papers at an early stage so that he may advise as to the formulation of charges; he will be able to advise the officer in charge of the case what witnesses are required, what additional statements should be taken and what further inquiries should be conducted. That is one of the biggest changes that the Bill makes.

That change should not interfere in any way with the present system, which is completely satisfactory, whereby experienced and qualified people see the case through from the date of committal. In the Metropolitan police area at every Crown court there are highly qualified and experienced staff who deal with these matters. I got the impression from the report of the management consultants that they did not appreciate that the system in London was different from the system in many other parts of the country, although I have been reassured on this point recently by officials from the Law Officers Department and the Home Office.

I hope the Solicitor-General will reassure me and others who are interested in the topic as to the future of staff in the department in London. They do not want to become bureaucrats and administrators. They are lawyers and they want to remain as lawyers, using their expertise as lawyers in the new department. It is most important that their skill and experience should be retained. Things will be difficult enough. The new department should not risk losing people who have spent years learning their trade and getting experience. I know the Solicitor-General is sympathetic in considering the anxieties that I have expressed on this point.

We want the new prosecuting service to succeed, but it will not succeed unless those who have spent their working lives in the service of the public in the prosecuting solicitors' departments, in the director's department, and in the Metropolitan police solicitor's department can look forward to a worthwhile and satisfying career in the new department.

It is a complete waste of time to concentrate in this debate on topics that are remote from the direct ambit of the Bill, but are to do with criminal justice generally. Discussion about leniency of sentences, the sentencing power of the courts, rights of appeal and so on is wholly irrelevant.

I should like to clear up a point about an intervention that I made in the Home Secretary's speech. I asked him whether it would not be a good idea for power to increase sentences to be given to the criminal division of the Court of Appeal. He misunderstood my intervention. It was not about the clause that was rejected by another place. It was a completely different point. To discourage frivolous appeals, would it not be a good idea for the Court of Appeal criminal division to have the power, which would no doubt be used sparingly, to increase a sentence if an application for leave to appeal against the sentence disclosed that the original sentence had been manifestly too lenient?

Mr. Hind rose——

Mr. Ryman: Ironically the legal position is that Crown courts can, on appeal against sentence, increase the sentence, although I have only once come across a case where that happened. It is wholly anomalous that a Crown court should have the power to increase a sentence if there is an appeal against sentence and the Court of Appeal criminal division should not have the same power. Both should have it, or neither should have it.

Mr. Hind: The hon. Gentleman has already made the point that I wished to make. It is that this anomaly exists between the appellate jurisdiction of a Crown court to increase sentences and the Court of Appeal, which does not have such a power. The Court of Appeal tends to rely on the system of deleting remission for a prisoner who pursues his appeal too far. If the system was changed, as the hon. Gentleman has suggested, frivolous appeals would be avoided and any advantages within the rules of the prison system that an individual would gain during the period running up to appeal would be lost. I agree fully with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ryman: I am delighted that somebody agrees with me about something. The point was made earlier that I do not slavishly follow my party into the Division Lobby. Perhaps not, but I always support the Labour party except on the occasions when I do not. It would be far better if hon. Members did not adhere rigidly to party political doctrine. I was appalled by the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) which was crude and doctrinaire. It is far better to judge these matters on their merits. On the merits this Bill will do a great deal to make the prosecution service successful, with a highly professional and ethical standard, a high degree of confidence and efficiency and a high quality of staff within it.

The cost of this Bill has been glossed over by every hon. Member who has spoken today, by the Home Secretary and in all the commentary about the Bill that I read before coming to the debate. The cost of the establishment of the service must be enormous. I have heard the figure of £5 million mentioned, but that is absurdly low. The cost will not be anything like as little as that. Before a single salary is paid, a single piece of office equipment is bought or any of the additional new staff are taken on, the Bill enjoins the service to have new offices, which must not be within the courtroom precincts. There is a specific provision in the Bill for local authorities, but many of them may find it financially impossible. Both Crown and magistrates' courts will have to provide new buildings to house the new department.

The cost of all this will be astronomical and I hope that the Law Officers and the Home Secretary will join in twisting the arm of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In a Government who are committed to reducing expenditure, we shall have the unusual spectacle of the Law Officers' department and the Home Office greatly increasing public expenditure. If this service is to succeed, a lot of money will have to be spent.

If the standard is to be high, we have to pay the lawyers properly. Those starting the new department should not be just the failures from the Temple. If we are to attract high quality lawyers from both sides of the profession, and high quality clerks, they must be given decent salaries. I do not mean astronomical salaries, but realistically attractive salaries to attract men and women of the right type. That will cost a great deal of money.

The Government will have to come clean sooner or later about the estimated cost figures, even if the negotiations with the Treasury are not completed. I understand that some of these posts have already been advertised, but the Bill has not gone through the House and therefore is not law. I am told that in Hertfordshire, for example, advertisements are appearing for posts in the new prosecuting service. Similar advertisements are appearing in the press and other local legal publications elsewhere. Perhaps the Solicitor-General can help me on this point. How can those advertisements appear advertising posts at certain salaries if the legislation has not gone through the House and if negotiations with the Treasury have not been completed? How can money be earmarked for salaries? It is all very well to anticipate events, but unusual things happen in the course of legislation.

I emphasise that the people setting up the department will have to be paid handsome salaries. There must be no stinting or we shall not get the right quality of people. Perhaps these are Committee points, which can be dealt with later, but I should like the Solicitor-General to answer them.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): I suspect that the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) will be reminded time and again about his remarks on party politics. I agree with much of what he said about the prosecution, but he was a little unfair on my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who spoke before him. Like my hon. and learned Friend, I had some fears about the Bill. I thought that it was over-centralising the prosecution service, and I know that in Leicestershire, part of which I have the honour to represent, there were great fears.

However, since the Bill was first announced, we have had the White Paper "Proposed Crown Prosecution Service", which was published last December. Having read the paper carefully, all my fears were allayed. The service will be regionally organised—I suspect that we shall have a Leicestershire prosecution service—and the cases which have traditionally been dealt with by the Director of Public Prosecutions will still be dealt with by him. Those cases which require a great deal of expertise, such as some of the fraud cases, will be dealt with by those parts of the department which have the expertise. There will be a saving and undoubtedly an improvement in the standard of prosecution.

I welcome the Bill in its broad outline. It became necessary following the Royal Commission's report and because of the wide variations in practice throughout the country. I wish that I had the strong belief of the hon. Member for Blyth Valley that the prosecution service is of a uniformally high standard. I do not think that it is. I think that it varies from the excellent to the indifferent. Arrangements for prosecuting also vary. Some counties, such as Hertfordshire, use independent solicitors entirely, and they are very good because there is good rapport between them and the police, and the work is spread around. I have not seen bad prosecutions in Hertfordshire. That is an example of the good rapport that there can be between the independent solicitors, of whom there are several, and the police.

In Surrey only one solicitor is used, and although he is in private practice he is virtually a police prosecutor. My knowledge is of the Metropolitan police solicitors, who are of the highest standards and the greatest objectivity. It is a service of some size and is able to attract people of the highest calibre. However, we cannot judge the rest of the country from the Metropolitan police solicitors alone. Smaller areas do not have the advantages of London.

Putting all these prosecutions under one department —the DPP—has attractions. Those attractions are there provided that the organisation is, as it will be, regional, and that the various needs of the area are taken into account. I agree with the hon. Member for Blyth Valley, who disappeared as soon as he spoke, that we shall require prosecutors of the highest calibre. It is no good expecting to have the service that we require from people who have not succeeded within their own professions. Therefore, we shall need to pay people well to attract them into the top echelons of the service.

The advantage of a Second Reading debate is that one can talk about what is not in the Bill as well as about what is in it. There is one big omission from the Bill. The public generally think that all prosecutions for criminal offences are brought either by the police of by private individuals. The public are wrong.

The Home Secretary said that the reasons for the Bill included the need for an independent prosecution service, openness, accountability, consistency and the timely prosecution of offences. He emphasised the need for an independent prosecution service.

There are other prosecuting authorities apart from the police. The special investigations department of the Customs and Excise brings charges on the importation and possession of drugs, the importation and possession of obscene articles and the evasion of duties. Those are not difficult offences to prosecute. There is nothing specialised about Customs and Excise prosecutions. Similar cases are dealt with by the police. The same people defend them, and often the same barristers prosecute them. Yet the Customs and Excise has a vast prosecuting department, with any number of solicitors.

Are we looking for real savings and for a proper state prosecution service? If so, why is the Customs and Excise department excluded from the Bill? I can see no justification for its exclusion. I know why that has been done, and I know about the difficulties which the police and the Customs and Excise have in co-operating with each other. Perhaps there is some trading-off between the Customs and Excise prosecuting department and the police prosecuting department, but there can be no justification for the expense involved in maintaining two prosecuting authorities when one would do.

If we are to have independence, openness, accountability, consistency and the timely prosecution of offences, why are the Customs and Excise excluded? People go to prison for anything between six and 12 years for drug importation offences. They are serious offences. Why are the Customs and Excise excluded from the Bill?

What about the port police, who deal with offences in port areas? What about the transport police? Why are their prosecutions not to be conducted by the central prosecuting agency? I have not asked a parliamentary question about the number of police forces or prosecuting authorities in this country, but I know that there are very many of them. Why, for example, are prosecutions by the Atomic Energy Authority police not to be conducted by the independent prosecution service?

What about the Post Office, which prosecutes television licence offences? What about the vehicle licensing sections of the Department of the Environment? What about the regional traffic commissioners, who prosecute offences involving heavy lorries? What about the inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive? What about the Inland Revenue?

I understand that the new authority will have a large department which will be highly specialised in fraud cases and will probably have available computers through which it can run figures and highlight where fraud is occuring. Why should the Inland Revenue maintain a separate prosecuting department with a vast supply of solicitors and other staff?

I see no reason why the new authority should not be a proper prosecuting authority using the guidelines set out by the Home Secretary. The independence that is so necessary should be open to all. If I were to be prosecuted for an Inland Revenue offence, I should like to have that independence, openness, accountability and consistency, though perhaps not the timely prosecution of the offence.

With all the fervour that I can produce I say that a coach and horses has been driven through the Bill and that it is not good enough to have a Bill which deals only with police prosecutions and not with prosecutions generally.

If we brought the Inland Revenue experts into the new prosecuting service—jobs will be protected under the commission—for the general prosecution of frauds, considerable savings would be achieved. The same would be true if we brought the Customs and Excise experts into general drug cases.

I share the doubts that have been expressed by hon. Members about the costings in the Bill. The way that we are heading is a very expensive way. However, if we used the many prosecuting departments for the nation in the new prosecution service we could achieve the suggested savings.

Unlike the hon. Member for Blyth Valley, who is still not in his place, I raise the vexed question of clause 22, which has been taken out of the Bill, without apology. The Home Secretary threatened the reintroduction of the clause. I agree with the many hon. Members who have said that clause 22 should not form part of our criminal process. It was shallow, it was hollow. It meant nothing and would merely involve deciding which judge was to be bashed this week. The other place was right to throw it out.

I would never accept that the prosecution should have a right to appeal to the Court of Appeal for an increased sentence. The principle of double jeopardy is very important. It has been hallowed within our criminal law system not simply for five or 10 years, but has grown up over hundreds of years. It should not lightly be thrown away by anyone, and especially by the hon. Member for Blyth Valley. It is so easy to say that we should change the system, but there is a knock-on effect. If we undermine something that is so fundamental, that has an important effect on the whole process of criminal justice. It is something that we should preserve.

I welcome the provision on timing. I was a sponsor of a Bill presented by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). The Bill did not get very far, but I am glad to note that its sentiments are echoed in this Bill. It is essential that justice should be speedy, because memories fade. There are delays on both sides, and they happen not only in the Crown courts but in the magistrates courts. We must ensure that undue delays do not happen. We must impress upon the judiciary that it must be even-handed in this matter.

If the prosecution presents a notice of additional evidence at the last moment, that may delay a trial, because the defendant would have to make further investigations. Many trials have been delayed by the late service of such a notice. Where that happens and trials may be unnecessarily delayed, judges should be prepared to refuse to grant the submission of that evidence. Too often judges will say that they cannot stop the submission of that evidence, but that the defendant has the right to ask for two or three weeks to investigate the matter. There must be fairness on both sides.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) that these matters must be even-handed. I do not believe that the delays necessarily arise in the way that has been expressed in the House. I welcome the fact that, in certain cases, the prosecution is now disclosing its evidence in advance. That could help to bring about speedy trials in magistrates courts. Cases often go to the Crown court because the magistrates court is unable to cope adequately with the volume of cases. Magistrates courts are often unable to cope with defended cases which may last for more than a day. Indeed, they do not seem able to cope with cases which may last for three or four hours.

All those who have practised in the courts have experience of attending a court when a particular day has been set aside for a case. On arrival, they find that the overnight charges will last until 11 am, the further remands will last until 1 pm, the case might then start at 2 pm, but at 3.30 pm the magistrates say, "Sorry, but we have a tea engagement and must finish early." The case is then deferred for perhaps two weeks, or even three months. That happens time and time again. Therefore, it is no small wonder that solicitors advise their clients to go for trial in a Crown court if they are to obtain any sort of justice. At least then the trial will begin on the due date and continue until it is finished, and there will be a jury to judge the case.

I criticise those who think that the solution to the problem is to build more and more Crown courts. That is wrong. However, nor is the solution to be found in building more magistrates courts. We should find a better way of organising magistrates courts. There should be more stipendiary magistrates, and there should be better organisation of the whole process. That would alleviate much of the problem in the Crown courts. It is trite and easy to go along the road of building more Crown courts.

I remember when there were only a few courts in London, but they coped. We have now more than quadrupled the number of courts in London. The number of offences has not quadrupled, yet there is still the same delay in cases coming to trial. Therefore, putting in more money is not the solution. Everyone may think that it is the easy solution, but it is not. The better solution would be to reorganise the whole system. There should be better organisation of the list system, better organisation of the way in which we charge, and the whole process should be changed. Indeed, perhaps too many people are being charged with trivial overnight offences, and they should be dealt with in a different way. Charges relating, for example, to being drunk and disorderly take up a great deal of time.

Although I believe the Bill to be a good measure, it does not go far enough. It will be far more expensive than we originally thought. It will deprive a great number of people who may have committed offences of the very safeguards which the Bill originally envisaged. There will be first-class and second-class offenders. The first-class offenders will be those who have been arrested by the police. They are fortunate, because they will have an independent prosecuting authority looking after them. If I am to believe my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary—and this is the whole basis for setting up the service—the second-class offenders will not have the advantages of the independent prosecuting service. That sort of anomaly must be considered.

Why should the independent prosecution service not cover the military police, the naval police, the RAF provost police and the Ministry of Defence police?

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): And the transport police.

Mr. Ashby: I have already mentioned the transport police. I have not previously referred to the armed forces police. I see no reason why they should not be subject to the same safeguards and the same prosecuting authority in this country, and probably abroad. There would be no difficulty about someone going abroad when cases were being prosecuted. So many of those cases could be prepared in this country. After all, people who have committed offences and are court martialed are defended by barristers and solicitors, so why should there not be the same prosecuting authority? The laws are virtually identical, so we are concerned with the same offences. I apprehend that there would be a great saving in the defence budget, and that should commend itself to the Secretary of State.

8.10 pm

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): It is about 20 years since I was the pupil of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and trod in his footsteps in the eastern counties. During the intervening years many aspects of our criminal justice system have changed. If this measure is passed, another chapter in that evolving story of change will have been written.

In those 20 years or so I have appeared as counsel and sat as a recorder in cases which have been conducted on the basis of four different systems, each with its own strengths and weaknesses. First, I appeared in a few cases in magistrates courts in which the police were their own advocates. The advantage of that was that it certainly was quick, and it was probably cheap, but it had the grave disadvantage of not looking much like justice. I remember to this day the embarrassment of a young police officer being re-examined, no doubt by his chief superintendent, to try to repair a hole which had emerged in the course of the prosecution case in cross-examination. We can now put that behind us without any sense of regret.

The second system which I have seen operated at first hand is that by which the police themselves instruct privately local firms of solicitors on the ordinary client basis. That system is close to my heart. I was brought up under that system in East Anglia. The system is to this day in operation in Leicestershire, and I know that they will be sorry to see it go. It has great strengths. It enables the police to brief local firms of solicitors whose standards are of the highest and to receive advice apposite to the locality.

But for all its strengths, the system has weaknesses. It leaves open the suggestion that a prosecution has perhaps not been brought when it should have been brought, for local reasons, or that a prosecution has been pressed further than justice required. Therefore, although I feel with the police in Leicestershire with my heart, with my head I am against them, and as with the first system of which I have had experience, the time has come to wrap it up.

The third basis on which prosecutions are conducted —it is now the most common basis—is that of county prosecuting solicitors, or, in the metropolitan police area, by the metropolitan police solicitor. The strength of that system is that it provides for a police authority comprehensive legal advice on a regular and accessible basis.

I pay tribute in particular to the managing clerks of the Metropolitan police solicitors' department who over the years have rendered sterling service in the cause of the administration of justice. Mr. McGrory, for many years at the Old Bailey, and Mr. Walter Ball, at the other side of the square and latterly across the river, set high standards which their successors followed. They were managing clerks of the old school.

If the new service is to prosper, their successors must display the same standards of integrity and competence. I hope that when my right hon. and learned Friend supervises the work of the staff commission which is to be set up under clause 12 he will ensure that the successors of the managing clerks of the Metropolitan police and county prosecuting police service will suffer no loss under the new system and that they will continue to be the backbone of the new, as they were of the old.

The disadvantage of the county prosecuting system— I include the Metropolitan police system—is that for all its merits it lacks the independence which is required of a successful prosecuting service. Only recently, when I was instructed by the Metropolitan police, I advised that the results of certain police inquiries which had been conducted abroad should be disclosed to the defence. It was much to their advantage, and to the disadvantage of the Crown, that that course should be taken, but it was clearly the right course to take.

Within hours of my tendering that advice, the two zealous police officers, who were disappointed to receive it, had gone hotfoot to one of the solicitors of the Metropolitan police saying that they did not want to comply with the advice that I had tendered and that they thought that I was letting the side down. They were, of course, properly put in their place by the solicitor to the Metropolitan police. The fact remains that they felt able to make that journey.

I am confident that under the new system police officers who are disappointed with the advice given by prosecuting counsel will not think it appropriate to repeat journeys of that sort. They and everyone else will be able to see that it is a truly independent service and that the solicitors who are acting are not solicitors representing the police.

The fourth system of which I have some experience is that conducted by the Director of Public Prosecutions. The advantages of that system are well known—the integrity of the organisation, its independence and the high standards that it sets. However, as with all organisations, it suffers from disadvantages and weaknesses.

As at present constructed, on occasions it is remote from the local flavour of cases which are, under the current rules, referred to it. Under the new system, of central supervision but under local operation, some cases which at present are referred for examination and conduct by the director centrally will find their way to the local Crown prosecutor. Thus, those who bemoan the changes that we are contemplating as excessive centralisation fail to recognise that in some respects, in day-to-day operation, cases will be dealt with in the areas in which they arise. We shall have improved the present system under which the Director of Public Prosecutions operates.

The staff of the Director of Public Prosecutions occasionally labour, through no fault of their own, under another disadvantage. Because of the pressure of time, they sometimes find themselves acting as a post box between the police who have sent them a case and the counsel they are to instruct. In some cases the police have been known to say that the papers have been gathering dust in the director's office. After inquiry by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, the papers have been found to be with the police. Under the new unified system, the tendency for briefs to fall between two stools — sometimes they appear to do so—will be eliminated.

Although I have twinges of regret, I welcome the proposals in the Bill. Two other topics have exercised the minds of certain hon. Members, the first of which is the matter of appeal against sentence by the Crown. Although I know that I am very much on my own in saying this, I have always been puzzled by the fact that a dissatisfied defendant could go hotfoot to the Court of Appeal and get his sentence reduced, but, when a manifestly unjust sentence had been passed by a court, virtually nothing could be done if the offence had been tried on indictment. Reference has been made to some minor exceptions to that, and one still remains. The Crown court still has all the powers on appeal that the original magistrates court had available to it. Therefore, if so minded, the Crown court can increase the sentence. Is that at odds with the double jeopardy rule?

The former Court of Criminal Appeal used to have power to increase sentences. Lord Chief Justice Goddard on occasions did so, with salutary effect. Was that in breach of the principle of double jeopardy? Although I accept in its strictly literal sense the argument that the prosecution is not involved in sentences, I think that by implication that is a lot of pompous nonsense. Almost inevitably it is the prosecution that furnishes the court with the facts—either in aggravation or in mitigation—that enable it to assess what is a just sentence. There is nothing wrong with the prosecution fulfilling that role, not only at the first instance when the case is tried but in the Court of Appeal when the sentence may be reviewed. There is no difference in substance between the approaches at the two levels.

We frequently see testimonies to the public interest in those sentences that are a threat to the safety of the public because they are unduly lenient. They leave the public with the feeling not merely that the law is an ass but, in a number of instances, that it is a dangerous ass. That is a most unhealthy state of affairs. I would encourage my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to continue his pursuit of finding an acceptable way to alleviate this public disquiet.

I would even have gone so far as to accept the benighted clause 22—not because it was acceptable but because I would have viewed it as a partly open door which the public, once they had been able to insert their shoulder, would assuredly have shouldered open to bring about a full right of appeal against sentence. I know from my experience at judicial conferences that the judiciary almost to a man is completely against that measure; so is the vast body of opinion in my profession. I am not deterred by that. Some matters are too important for the Bar and even too important for the judiciary. Public disquiet about manifestly unjust sentences is one of those matters, and something must be done about it.

The second topic that concerns hon. Members involves the clauses that will impose a time limit on the completion of cases. The first time a case fails because time has expired under the new provisions will compose a number of minds wonderfully in the area in which it takes place. I think that it will be an effective way of composing minds throughout the prosecuting system — the police in bringing the papers together, the prosecuting service in briefing counsel, and counsel in drafting the indictment and getting the case ready for court.

The pulse of some cases falls to a lamentably low level on some occasions. One wonders whether a case is still alive. It requires a positive act of resuscitation to bring it back to life, sometimes years after its birth. That is regrettable and, under these clauses, it will end.

I welcome the changes that the Bill makes. There will be the usual touch of nostalgia that all lawyers always feel about worthwhile legal reforms. The legislation will mean that some of my legal experience of the past 20 years lies once again on the shelves of legal history.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): When we gather to debate the Second Reading of this important Bill I am sure that one of the most important matters on our minds has been the origins of the legislation. We go back to 1978, to the Royal Commission under Sir Cyril Philips. In that connection, I see on the Benches many of the cast from the old Police and Criminal Evidence Bill which fell immediately before the last general election. They look as young as they did on that occasion.

I am delighted that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) did not pursue the pathway that he pursued the last time he addressed the House on the Water (Fluoridation) Bill, keeping us here for five and a half hours. Perhaps the reason is that tonight he was speaking without a fee.

I am especially concerned about one of the important features which has been brought to our attention and which was the kernel of the issue involving the Royal Commission. On page 127 the report states:

"the arrangements are characterised by their variety, their haphazardness, their local nature and at least as far as the police are concerned . . . the nature of the investigative and prosecutorial functions".

There was considerable complaint about the lack of consistency. The House speaks with one voice when it seeks consistency through the provision of these services. I agree with all the comments of my right hon. and hon. Friends who have stressed the need for a high quality service in keeping with the tradition of our legal system.

As recently as 24 hours ago, I received an important message from my constituency which expressed anxiety that 400 members of the legal profession would be needed to administer the service in the courts. My local chairman of magistrates has been in touch with me and suggested that the figure could be nearer 700. It is a matter of speculation. I am worried that there have already been moves within the legal profession, in particular, among those engaged at local court level, to move to higher paid positions, and that that action has been taken before the House has given approval to the Bill. It is also a matter of anxiety to many people, including myself, that 600 police officers will equal 400 barristers. That is the equation that will be used in the manning of the service.

The service is new. It has received wide acclaim in the House today. We must guard it jealously to ensure that it is presented in a fine and honourable way.

I associate myself with the considered comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), who said with feeling and from considerable experience that the cost of administering the service must not come from the Home Office budget. As a devoted disciple of the Conservative party, I am worried by the fact that we spent £1 billion on the police service in 1979 and that by 1983 we were spending £2·5 billion. That is the measure of the Government's commitment to law and order. I should be sad if the Home Office budget were reduced to cater for the service envisaged in the Bill.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) mentioned in his most excellent speech an important factor which occupies the attention of all engaged in the legal process—that there should be a speedy conclusion to cases brought before the courts. In many instances, the failure to have a speedy conclusion to a case is not the fault of the prosecution.

The House has always been generous to me, and I am sure that on this occasion, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will grant me licence while I relate my work on the Home Affairs Select Committee. I was staggered when I went to Brixton prison—the biggest remand prison in Europe. I spent several days there studying the procedures. I was astonished beyond belief to find that there were people in prison who had been on remand for a year. That would be unacceptable if it were the fault of the prosecution, but those men were there for a year because of the defence. I was even more horrified when several prisoners told me —I use this expression because it was the one they used to me — that they were "working the system". The system is that if they have a number of previous convictions and are likely to be sentenced to, for example, five years' imprisonment if found guilty when they appear before the Crown court, it is better for them to remain on remand where they have the benefit of daily visits and their own food. The fact that the man has been in custody for a year is taken into account when the judge sentences him. We should have justice, because that binds us in the House, but we should have it speedily for the sake of the prisoner and the prosecution.

During the debate, we have heard the voices of management consultants, the police, the legal profession —solicitors and barristers—and two recorders. During my many years in the police, I often prosecuted in cases such as those referred to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer). His was a history lesson, and he made me feel old when he related that experience. When we prosecuted we knew about the case and its background. On sober reflection, and perhaps with a touch of nostalgia, we look back on those cases and the relationship between the police and the public, and when the pages of history are written that will be seen as commendable and as something that brought the police and the public together.

I have spoken about all those voices, and I should like to speak now about the voice of the people who elected me and gave me the great privilege and honour of representing them in the House. I must tell the House of the unpleasant features of my work as a dedicated servant of my constituents. If we are to have justice my soul's cry is that we have equal justice throughout the country because no one is above the law and, by the grace of God, no one is beneath it. One of my constituents was arrested for damaging a padlock valued at £1·68. He was taken to prison and spent three weeks there. At the end of three weeks, he was found murdered in his cell. There were subsequent trials, but no conviction.

I am speaking with the voice of my people when I say that that should never have happened. But it did happen and, tragically, when I visit the widow and the two children of Mr. Barry Prosser I realise that, if we had had a fair prosecuting system, as envisaged in this Bill, when I went to that house and met the dog and the family I would still have met Mr. Prosser. People tell me about such cases in my visits to the constituency and in correspondence. I listen to the voice of the people and I beg those on the Treasury Bench to do so. The people are saying exactly what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South is saying—that perhaps there should be provision for an appeal by the prosecution against the sentence.

I had a constituent who was brutally assaulted in her home. She was left for 36 hours with her injuries and, as a result, she died. The assailant appeared before the court. The tragedy of the abuse of and disrespect for the law meant that that man, who had previous convictions, was sentenced to five days in prison.

The voice of the people is saying that there should be a right of appeal by the prosecution. If it is right—as I believe that it is—that the convicted should have the right to appeal against conviction and sentence, it is equally right that the prosecution should be granted the facility, in exceptional cases, to appeal against the sentence. But the law of this land must always be saturated with compassion.

I am particularly opposed, because of my former experience as a police officer, to any concept of a national police force. I lived through an era in the police service when the small forces of some 200 men gathered together and formed larger forces. A new concept came into the criminal investigation department — the concept of regional crime squads. Those squads were working to the absolute maximum as regards their area of responsibility. If we are to have a national prosecution service, it is vitally important to satisfy the people that that service is at least at regional level and is administered and negotiated at regional level rather than at national level. In that respect I very much agree with the argument of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton.

I believe that the people will welcome this Bill because it has the priceless virture of independence. It removes from the police the burden of determining prosecutions. That will be welcomed throughout the land. There have been suggestions—I will put it no higher than that—that there will be an opportunity in future legislation perhaps for the provision of an appeals procedure. I believe that the legal profession—the prosecuting profession, if I may so describe it—will use it with the greatest care and very rarely.

I hope that, in responding to this debate, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will do me the courtesy of mentioning, in particular, clause 18 concerning the award of costs against the accused. I should like an assurance from him that when any person is convicted of an offence in the Crown court the court may make an order for such costs to be paid by the accused to the prosecutor as it considers just and reasonable. Perhaps this is the wonderful spirit of compromise, but I believe that if there is an appeal to the Crown court and the person making the appeal has gained financially as a result of his actions—and that appeal, as we have heard from the legal profession, which has been very well represented in this debate, is a very expensive exercise—if the appeal is lost there should be an opportunity under clause 18 to make an order for costs and it should be used. One of the great problems is that the laws are there but they are not used or implemented and are thus held in contempt.

It is in that spirit that I welcome this Bill, with its origins in the Royal Commission. I welcome the voice of public opinion that has brought about these changes by evolution. However, I give a guarded warning to the Ministers on the Treasury Bench that many people will be looking very carefully at the costs of the measure and the question of an appeal by the prosecution in certain circumstances, and will look forward to the proper implementation of clause 18.

With those comments, I wish the Bill godspeed.

8.47 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): One of the major concerns that I first had in considering the prosecution service was that the distance which has traditionally been maintained in the English legal system between the executive and the judicial prosecuting function should continue. The Bill does that quite admirably and I hope that in carrying out his functions the Attorney-General will maintain impartiality in making decisions on prosecution and speaking on behalf of the Government as their Law Officer. That distance is very important in the structure of our constitution, although unwritten.

The Bill, which I very much welcome, takes the system of prosecuting one great step further forward. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) outlined the different systems that exist. Perhaps in his nostalgia we see many of the failings of the existing system. The most important failing at the moment is that the police, in every case where a prosecuting solicitor acts, are the clients. Therefore, they give the instructions, and the pattern of behaviour of that prosecuting solicitor or barrister appearing for the Crown is dictated very much by the views of the police.

Over the years, the maintenance of the fiction that a barrister, once charged with a case, controls it and directs its course has led to the idea that the prosecution is conducted by counsel, particularly in Crown court cases. Having seen practice at the Bar in both the provinces and London, I regret that in London that fiction has been further eroded to a large extent. However, the Bill will restore the original position.

From personal experience, on several occasions, I know that police officers are charged with the investigation of the case. They gather the evidence, come to court and, particularly in London — it is totally unheard of in parts of the north of England—they sit behind counsel all the way through the case, both before and after they give evidence. In my opinion, that is a monstrous situation, which the Bill will see the end of. The consequences are that the case is directed by a police officer, who may come to court during the year up to perhaps a maximum of 20 times, to deal with 15 or 20 different charges. As a consequence, he takes no overall view of the policy considerations that are necessary in the prosecuting department covering the whole area. Therefore, his experience and influence are limited and, in many respects, bad.

The Bill places into the hands of a group of professional lawyers the control and policy direction of prosecutions within a defined area. Those who, like myself, have practised in the provinces and who have detailed experience of the county prosecuting solicitors departments can see the strength of adapting that policy to the problems of the locality and dealing with them through an overall policy. That is what the Bill will do. It will take away the influence of the police in deciding who should deal with what, what the accused should be charged with and the overall direction of the case. A fresh mind, which is objective and based on decided policy, perhaps gathered over a period of time, will direct the policy.

It is important to look at the way in which the system will go. I can tell the House from experience that particularly in West Yorkshire, where I know the system extremely well, a representative of the prosecution service sits in every Crown court. The cases in magistrates courts are prosecuted by a solicitor representing the county prosecuting department. The Bar does not appear in the magistrates courts, except in very long cases in West Yorkshire. Despite what I have heard and the reassurances that have been given, I must warn my colleagues in the metropolis that that is the way the system will go.

In each case before the Crown court, if there is a representative of what will no doubt become the metropolitan Crown prosecutor's department, that will be a welcome help in the prosecution of cases. In places such as inner London there are perhaps one or two staff from the prosecutor's department covering 12 or 13 courts. If a crisis arises and there is a need for the prosecuting solicitor to give a further opinion, particularly when counsel clashes with the police over the direction of the case, someone coming into the case who has had nothing to do with it is handed the papers and told, "The case is based upon this. It has been going for a fortnight. I am sure that you will pick it up quickly." Such a practice will, I hope, come to an end.

I join my hon. and learned Friends who have said that 400 solicitors taking over the system throughout England and Wales will be totally inadequate. Looking at the costs, I am sure that there will be much greater overheads than have been suggested so far. We shall find that the present county prosecuting solicitors departments will appear very much like Rolls-Royce departments when they are compared with the metropolis, which will be like a 1935 Austin. There will not be a uniform system if the existing county prosecuting solicitors departments are run side by side with the newly created department. In my experience of the London system, the department is too small. There are too few solicitors. I echo the tribute of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South, who said that the people there worked very hard. They do, but there are too few. They cannot possibly cover properly the prosecution problems which this city faces.

The second matter with which the Bill is concerned is the delay over trials. Again, London compares unfavourably with the provinces. When I first came down to London on a regular basis as a Member of Parliament, I used to return on the train with a former colleague at the Bar who is now a circuit judge, sitting at Southwark. He used to say to me that it was not unusual for him to try a case that was 12 months old. In the metropolis, because of the sheer inefficiency of the organisation in the courts, the time taken to bring cases to the Crown court is far too long. We have seen the effect of that recently. A year is too long. Witnesses' memories decay. One even loses track of witnesses. If a 12-months-old case were tried in the north of England, it would be described as an old case. If we look at the record of the north-eastern circuit in particular, we find that the average time for a case to come before the Crown courts is between four and six months, and that is from arrest to trial. We should be working on such a time limit.

I hope that the Home Secretary will draw on the Scottish experience when he draws up his regulations for the time for cases to be brought to trial. I hope that we shall see a real tightening up of the system in London, to the betterment of speedy justice in the area. Twelve months on remand in custody at Brixton is totally wrong. The problem must be solved. Only the House can solve the problem.

Hon. Members have spoken of cases where defendants who knew that they were facing long sentences deliberately played the rules of the prison to ensure daily visits and privileges, such as cigarettes, parcels, and visits from wives or girl friends. We must consider the rules carefully, because we can also make the system more efficient in that respect. Unfortunately, the Bill does not deal with that matter.

[Mr. Kenneth Hind]

When the Home Secretary draws up his regulations, perhaps he will consider carefully the success of the provincial circuit in listing cases and dealing speedily with them, especially compared with London. It is unfortunate that I am the only hon. Member to have spoken in the debate who has a great deal of experience of practice in the provinces.

Hon. Members have mentioned matters which are not included in the Bill. I take the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) that the Bill does not include the other aspects of prosecuting that exist—Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue and the transport police. I do not accept what he says about the armed forces or the Atomic Energy Authority police, but there is room for the inclusion of the Inland Revenue police and Customs and Excise.

Many large drug prosecutions are taking place in which customs officers and the police worked side by side in the investigation and consequent prosecution. I am thinking of the importation and distribution of drugs, especially where officers from both branches are working underground to bring about arrests and subsequent trials.

I am pleased that the Bill does not deal with the movement of cases from Crown courts to magistrates courts—I disagree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) about that—in the sense that the right of jury trial has been a fundamental plank of our democracy. That should always be so. My hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) referred to the man who stole a padlock worth £1·68. If an elderly person is accused of stealing from a supermarket and has 60 years of good character behind him, he may think that as a matter of principle he should be tried by his peers. That is one reason, above all others, why the right of jury trial should be preserved.

We often avoid summary trials. It is a fact of life that if we took three lawyers from these Benches who practised in the courts before they were elected, the tribunal would probably be extremely cynical. They would say, "We have heard it all before. We have met such clients." However, the point of a jury trial is to bring 12 members of the general public from their ordinary walks of life to deal with the matter. They do not apply the cynicism of a lawyer, but introduce a draught of fresh air. They apply the objective values of daily life to the problems. A movement towards more magistrates court cases merely for reasons of cost is bad, because it undermines a fundamental principle on which our unwritten constitution relies.

I shall address my closing remarks to the missing clause 22. Much has been said about it. The most fundamental problem with the clause as it was drafted was simply that if a mother or father of the victim of a manslaughter case felt that the judge was wrong to impose two years imprisonment or probation on the convicted manslaughterer and knew that if the case were referred to the Court of Appeal it would examine the facts and decide that the convicted person should have got 10 years instead, they could do nothing about it and the convicted person would be able to walk the streets a free man.

That is highly unsatisfactory. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South may have been right when he said that this was a matter for constant examination by judges in their sentencing conferences and for the Lord Chief Justice to give sentencing directions in the Court of Appeal to make it clear to recorders and Crown court judges how the policy should be operated.

Overall, this is a very good Bill. It is a big step forward for the judicial system and one that has been needed for a long time. I hope that the House will give it full support and appreciate that we may be making history today.

9.5 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): I suppose that a past interest is no interest at all, but I place on record the fact that I used to practise as a solicitor in Leicester. In Leicestershire the police do not have a prosecuting solicitors' department but use solicitors from private practice, of whom I have been one. If I were to base my judgment today on my experience of the way in which the system has worked in Leicester, I should be arguing for the dismantling of the prosecution service and for the police to be able to hire those solicitors whom they regard as right for the job. It is necessary, however, to take a broad view and, although things have worked well in Leicester and, I believe, in Derby, there have been problems in other parts of the country.

A number of solicitors employed in that way have not been prepared to apply their own judgment to cases given to them by the police. The same applies to less experienced members of prosecuting solicitors' departments. Having been asked to appear for the prosecution in a magistrates court, they may be far from happy with the case and feel that the evidence does not justify the case going ahead but they are reluctant so to advise the police, perhaps fearing that they may get a reputation for being a "softie" and that the police may not seek their services in the future. In other words, solicitors in private practice and young advocates making their way in prosecuting solicitors' departments may hesitate to crib at directions given to them by the police. That is undoubtedly a weakness in the present system.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) has said, the police still prosecute in many cases. Even in Leicester not all work is given out to solicitors. The police are closely associated with the case, which my hon. Friend seemed to regard as an asset. The problem is that they are also closely concerned about the outcome. In that situation, I believe that there is some danger that justice may not be done. I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) that justice must always be our target and one of the main criticisms of the present system is that it is patchy.

As I have said, the existing system has worked very well in Leicester, but other parts of the country have been less fortunate. Indeed, in some areas the attitude of the prosecution has varied from week to week. More than once I have been acting for the defence in cases in which the police had no objection to bail one week, with the result that bail was granted, but the following week—without any new facts having come to light or any suggestion that other offences might have been committed, but merely because a different police officer or prosecuting solicitor was appearing in court—bail was suddenly opposed and the defendant remanded in custody.

I hope that one of the benefits of instituting a national prosecution service will be that guidelines will be laid down for those whose job it is to prosecute cases and that there will be a degree of uniformity throughout England and Wales. At present, in many areas, the public have lost confidence — perhaps fairly in some cases — in the police. I hope that if the power to decide to proceed with a case is removed from the police confidence will be restored.

Some hon. Members have said that they are afraid that by setting up the centralised prosecution service we shall create a bureaucracy. However, if it leads to even-handed justice, the measure will be welcome.

I now wish to raise two specific points. Clause 11 makes provision for the transfer of staff currently employed by local or police authorities. Is there to be an element of judgment, when the transfer takes place, of the ability of members of staff who have previously been working for prosecution departments, or is the clause merely intended to deal with the formality of the change of employer?

Clause 18 is about costs. I hope that the Government will take note of the fact that in the past there has sometimes been injustice when the prosecution has succeeded in a case and, after the conviction, has set a figure for the costs of the case. In a large number of cases in which I have been involved, that figure has not been justified or explained to the court. Inevitably, however, the defence solicitor has to accept it and the court will make an appropriate order. According to clause 18, a convicted defendant can be ordered to pay "just and reasonable" costs. May I be assured that, because of the inclusion of the words "just and reasonable", it will be necessary for the prosecution to give a brief justification of its figure? In a number of cases the costs have escalated, perhaps because of the illness of a prosecution witness or the absence due to other work of an advocate whom the prosecution wished to take a particular case. In the end —I am thinking mainly of cases in the magistrates court — the prosecution may have mentioned a figure for costs not all of which, in my opinion, should have been the responsibility of the defendant. I hope that the words "just and reasonable" will mean that those who apply for costs will need to outline to the court how the costs were arrived at.

I turn to what I may call the missing clause. Whenever a profession, even my own, closes ranks, I become suspicious. The comments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South must carry some weight. Whenever a sentence is passed that seems ridiculously lenient, there is a great deal of public disquiet. It is surely reasonable and proper that the prosecution should be able to take the matter to an appeal tribunal that could comment on it. I hope that the House will not accept the view of another place, and that the Government will decide to reinstate the clause.

I wholeheartedly welcome the Bill.

9.14 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Bill touches but lightly on party politics and its principal provisions are welcome to the Opposition.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) described the Bill as a revolutionary Socialist measure. If it is—I have my doubts about that—we should have some more of it. Conservative Members present do not strike me as fitting the description "Revolutionary Socialists" and their leader, the Home Secretary, would not identify himself as one. The Bill sets up an independent prosecution service for England and Wales similar to that in Scotland, and establishes statutory time limits on the prosecution of criminal cases. In principle, the proposals are welcome and have been recognised as such by almost everyone who has spoken today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) rightly paid tribute to the standards of the prosecution service. Our support for an independent prosecution service implies no criticism of those who service the existing machinery. I have a high regard for their work. Our support for the establishment of a separate and independent service is based on the key conclusions reached by the Royal Commission on criminal procedure that the present arrangements are defective and fail to provide a filter to avoid bringing to court cases which lack merit. Only yesterday I raised at Question Time such cases with the Attorney-General.

The Royal Commission concluded that the functions of the police chief should end with the decision to seek prosecution, after which the case should be dealt with by an independent service which could, if it felt it was right to do so, discontinue the prosecution. I am worried about how the relationship between the new service and the police will work in practice. I envisage substantial scope for argument between a police chief who wants to prosecute and a newly independent service which argues that the evidence is not strong enough. It would not be right to establish a service in such a way as to encourage a chief constable to settle every local argument by appealing for a national decision from the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions.

I fully appreciate that good working relations between the police and the prosecution service will be of considerable importance. However, the relationship that has existed hitherto is being changed. It is important that that happens in practice as in well as in theory.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley that the staff of the new service deserve some consideration. It might sound trivial, but the job title is important. I am grateful for the Government's recognition of that. If the new service is to be firmly established, the staff commission will have to be able to meet the legitimate anxieties of employees and clarify matters such as the tenure of office and continuity of service.

I hope that the new service provides a career structure that attracts able people and enhances the administration of the law. It is right that the legally qualified officers of the service have the same rights of audience as practising solicitors. I welcome such provision. I noted the reservations of the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), but I do not share them.

I wonder whether the Government will consider the idea of an inspectorate for the new service. I recognise the strengths of examining the possibility of that and understand that the annual cost of such an institution is not prohibitive. Perhaps we should return to that issue in Committee rather than go into it now.

The intention is that the new service will be a national service for England and Wales. I understand the desire of the Government to provide a service free of undue local influence. The narrow decision on whether the evidence warrants prosecution should be taken professionally, without lay and political intervention. That means that it should be taken without lay and political intervention nationally as well as without such intervention locally. However, it must be said also that policing policy and the generality of the administration of justice are matters of considerable public concern. It is the failure of police authorities to get to grips with these issues, largely because of the power of chief constables over operational matters, that leads to public concern and some public disquiet.

Somewhere in the system there has to be accountability. The issue may run wider than just this Bill, but it is long overdue for review. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) spoke in some detail about accountability, which is a live issue. Without canvassing a solution, may I content myself with saying that it is a subject to which the House must return.

Advocates of the Bill hope that it will at least halve the current 14,000 referrals to the Director of Public Prosecutions. I hope that that turns out to be the case. So that we may see how well the new structure is serving society, I urge the Government, in spite of what Conservative Members have said, to give consideration to reviewing the new structure after a year or, at the very most, within three years of its establishment. There should be within the Bill a commitment to review. I am not expressing an opinion on the type of mechanism, but there should be a way of picking up loose ends and things that have not worked out as we might hope.

I was taken with the argument advanced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) who urged the case for a review. He referred to his reservations about centralisation. Given the concern that he expressed and the concern of the Association of County Councils, may I add my voice to their call for some mechanism to examine the workings of the new structure that we are setting up?

Hon. Members have referred not just to what is in the Bill but to what we thought might have been in it. I was slightly saddened to hear the Attorney-General intervene in the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon and refer to his mailbag. The one method that should not be used for deciding whether a sentence is just or unjust is that whereby individual members of the public write to express their opinion, based probably on nothing more than what they have read in the newspapers. Inevitably the popular press will print what it thinks people wish to read and will not provide even a popular balanced version of the proceedings in court.

The proposal in the original clause 22 was superficially attractive. I understand what the Home Secretary said: public opinion runs deeply on sentencing policy. However, the original clause 22 was not the way to deal with it. The method that was outlined in that clause was fraught with so many real dangers that I hope we have heard the last of it. May I confine myself to saying that I am glad it has been dropped from the Bill, not least because of the other matters in the Bill that have general agreement?

The prosecution of juveniles was referred to in another place and it is right that it should be discussed here, too. It is touched on lightly in clause 27. We all accept that there are special features to juvenile crime. To deal with it solely through the mechanism of punishment, as one would deal with adult crime, is not sufficient. We shall go into this in more detail in Committee. There is a case for a separate and distinct department to deal with the prosecution of juveniles.

On time limits, I wish, as do my hon. Friends, that the proposals were more definite, but I welcome the principle and I understand the Government's arguments. I particularly welcome the Home Secretary's statement that the field trials will test how and not whether we should have time limits. I hope that the trials result in definite dates being fixed. I accept that they may have to be different initially for different parts of the country. However, the case in principle has been well made in the debate today, and no hon. Member has spoken against the principle of having time limits.

I have no experience of the criminal law—the only way in which I would have is if I had been on the receiving end of it. As a union official for the then General and Municipal Workers Union before I came to the House, I had to deal with the civil law. I administered the legal services on behalf of the northern region. The regional secretary, Tom Burlison, courageously pursued pioneering case law on asbestosis. I had bitter experience of seeing defendants, usually insurance companies, delay cases, waiting for the applicants to die because the compensation that would go to their families would be less than what would go to the defendants. It was not nice to see that being done, and it prejudices me in favour of time limits. The law should be promptly available to everybody.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) referred to the part of the Bill that states that some matters will not be referred to the prosecution service. I had assumed that this was to deal with minor matters, and I had not appreciated that there was an issue involving minor offences committed by police officers. If that is the case —perhaps the Solicitor-General will clarify the point—I have some sympathy with the point of view expressed by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds. It would be difficult for a young police officer who has done something wrong, but is not such a substantial crime that it automatically comes before the courts, to be in a position in which his superior was holding that offence over his head. Even with the best of intentions, that is not the right way to deal with these matters.

Some hon. Members have been unduly alarmist and over-critical about the costs of establishing this new service. It is worth the cost; it is a justifiable expense. However, so that we can see precisely to what we are asking the House to commit itself, it would be of assistance if, in Committee, the Government could table an explanatory note showing how the costs are arrived at. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds said that he was concerned about the effect of the Bill on police manpower, and the hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) made the same point. However, as I understand it, the only part of the Bill relating to manpower is the freeing of some 600 policemen from other duties, and I should have thought that that would be welcomed.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton put up a strong case for his trade union, and, as a trade unionist, I do not think any the less of him for that. As only the third non-lawyer to take part in the debate, I hope on behalf not just of the profession but of the people that the outcome of our deliberations will be the better administration of justice.

9.29 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): We have had a remarkable debate which has been characterised by the diverse and deep experience of every hon. Member who has spoken. The debate has benefited considerably from that.

I shall begin by dealing with a number of matters of detail, because the debate has not lacked attention to detail in relation both to what is in the Bill and what is not.

The right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), whose support for the Bill I noted with gratitude, said that there should be a provision requiring the Bill to be reviewed, perhaps within five years. I remind the House that clause 9 provides that the Director of Public Prosecutions should make an annual report, that the Attorney-General should publish it and that it should be laid before Parliament. Under clause 9(3), the Attorney-General may provide by regulation that certain matters should be dealt with and that the DPP should report on those matters. That gives Parliament an effective means of keeping a close monitoring eye on how the Act is working.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said that if a five-year period were written into the Bill we would freeze practice when we needed flexibility and responsiveness to experience in the early years. There was some force in the hon. Gentleman's comments. I do not think that there will be any lack of scrutineers of, or commentators on, the working of this radical new measure. Therefore, I cannot hold out the prospect of meeting the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon in that regard. However, I agree that it is important that a close eye should be kept on how the Bill develops.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about the status of chief constables and chief Crown prosecutors. Decisions on the gradings of chief Crown prosecutors and other posts in the new service will be taken in the light of the consultants' report which will be submitted shortly. It is important that chief Crown prosecutors and all prosecuting members of the new service should be remunerated on a basis that ensures that they provide the high standards that will be required.

Mr. John Morris: As this is such an important matter, will the Solicitor-General give us an assurance that he will seek advanced guidance from the consultants so that we shall know the salaries before we debate the matter in Committee?

The Solicitor-General: That will depend on when we get the consultants' report. It is expected at the end of this month, but it is the Government's intention to place as much information as possible before the Committee and the House.

The right hon. and learned Member said that he was disappointed that there was no provision in the Bill for advanced disclosure of prosecution material, but, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) pointed out, that provision has already been implemented in legislation that will take effect next month. A pilot scheme for that legislation is already having satisfactory consequences. I do not think that there is anything between us in that regard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) raised a point of detail when he asked about specific provisions in clause 3 in connection with alleged minor criminal offences by police officers. The Bill does not alter the current position under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Chief officers will still be required to submit reports about complaints to the director where there is an allegation of crime unless the chief officer is of the view that there should be no criminal proceedings. Usually, the report will go to the director before proceedings are instituted, but in wholly exceptional circumstances an officer might be arrested and charged —for example, for murder. If there is any further matter of detail in that regard it can best be dealt with in Committee.

My hon. Friend also raised a point about the number of police officers currently engaged in prosecution duties. It is not only 600 police officers as he suggested, but the equivalent of 600 full-time posts. That is an important point which was not made clear in the debate.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland asked why time limits should not be imposed by the Lord Chancellor. The time limits will have an effect across the criminal justice system. For example, they will have a bearing on the state and occupancy of remand prisons. It is thought much more appropriate that they should be fixed by my right hon. and learned Friend rather than by the Lord Chancellor, whose existing power is relatively limited.

The hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Ryman) asked about the future of the staff in the Metropolitan police solicitor's office. I listened to him with sympathy. There will be no shortage of work that will be both challenging and rewarding and that will make full use of the very considerable degree of expertise and experience to be found among the staff of that department. He also asked whether certain posts had been advertised. Some have been advertised by the director in those areas that currently do not have a county prosecuting solicitor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) asked whether the "just and reasonable" provision in clause 18 meant that the prosecution had to justify its request for costs. It must certainly be prepared to justify its request and it is open to the court to test the claim. That is perfectly proper.

I hope that I might be allowed a personal note, having dealt — not very excitingly — with matters of detail. However, they were important matters and I hope that I have managed to deal with most of them, if not all. I was pleased, although not surprised, that my right hon. and learned Friend had managed to secure a slot for the Bill in this Session's legislative programme. I was not surprised because when the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill was before the House, the then Home Secretary, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Whitelaw, made it clear that the Government accepted the need for an independent prosecuting service. It is not accurate to say that he had at any earlier time dismissed the suggestion as costing too much money. During the passage of that measure he made it perfectly clear that we were committed to it. I was particularly pleased because, when I was in charge of that measure in Committee, I was met with a certain scepticism about the firmness of our intention to legislate.

The House will remember that the first part of the Philips Royal Commission report deals with the investigation of offences while the second part deals with the independent prosecuting service. I was, frankly, surprised by the width and intensity of the criticism that we met for not having implemented the recommendations of both parts at once. It was said in some quarters, and somewhat repeatedly, that we wanted the one without the other and that we were never going to do the second part.

Sir Cyril Philips, the chairman of the Commission, made it clear in a letter to The Times that he never envisaged that we could do both at the same time. Indeed, it would have been an immensely unwieldy process, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds pointed out in his speech. We could not have done them both. As Sir Cyril Philips said, the Government were on course and he hoped that the second part would be done shortly.

Not surprisingly, the ending of the present unitary arrangements — by which the police investigate and charge offences and then, in most instances, go on to prosecute the suspects as well — has been widely welcomed by hon. Members and has been seen as the Bill's most welcome provision and reform.

That welcome came from the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) and, among others whom I have not mentioned, my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn), who gave a moving account of a personal experience from his constituency, cases which led him to support the independence which is the key to the system which the Bill is designed to establish.

It was not through any finding of deliberate unfairness or partiality in police prosecuting policy that led the Royal Commission to make its recommendations. On the contrary, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds will recall, the Royal Commission said:

"A police officer who carries out an investigation inevitably and properly forms an opinion as to the guilt of the suspect. Having done so, without any kind of improper motive, he may be inclined to shut his mind to other evidence telling against the strength of the evidence he has assembled."

If we had no reason for anxiety about the way in which the system is working now; if we had no reason for anxiety about the delays before a suspect is brought to trial when, for example, he is kept in custody; and if we had no anxiety about the proportion of those acquittals which occur because the judge has either directed or ordered acquittal, we might more readily put up with carrying on with the present system. But we have anxiety on each of those scores.

I will not labour the matter because in his opening speech my right hon. and learned Friend drew attention to the delays that occur on remand in custody or on bail. It is legitimate, however, to say that in spite of the efforts of the Lord Chancellor — who has provided 50 new courtrooms in Crown courts and 45 more circuit judges, and plans to complete 50 more courts in the next three years—the sheer pressure of work in the Crown courts results in an average wait, after committal before trial, of nearly 10·5 weeks when in custody and 15·5 weeks when on bail. That is on a national basis. As several of my hon. Friends pointed out, in London the position is worse, the figures being 16 weeks and nearly 26 weeks respectively.

When cases come for trial, 25·9 per cent. of not guilty pleas lead to acquittal by the jury and a further 22·9 per cent. are acquitted or discharged on the order or direction of the judge. A survey carried out for the Royal Commission showed that in about 20 per cent. of cases there had probably never been sufficient evidence. It is plain, therefore, that our present prosecution arrangements cannot by justified by the claim that the selection of cases is beyond improvement. I take very much the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North that on occasions solicitors do not tell the police that in their opinion there is not sufficient evidence. In this context, the Royal Commission reported:

"this empirical evidence gains support from some people with wide experience of prosecution work—"

that point has been reinforced in this debate—

"evidentially weak cases have been continued by the officer in charge, sometimes in the face of continuing advice from the lawyer with the conduct of the proceedings".

Those words reflect a feature that has been widely criticised. Under our arrangements, the chief constable is the client of the county prosecuting solicitor or the equivalent prosecuting officer. I do not believe that that is right. The debate has evidenced a wide degree of support for the proposition that the client should be the community and not the chief constable. That factor is of particular significance where private solicitors are employed to advise on prosecutions rather than county prosecuting solicitors or solicitors employed by a police authority. That is the reason why the Royal Commission made it an essential feature of its proposals that there should be a division of responsibility between the police and the prosecutor so that someone with legal qualifications shall make the various decisions that are needed to ensure that, so far as practicable, only properly selected, prepared and presented cases come for trial. The Bill provides this. That is why it has been so widely welcomed.

Most controversy during the debate has concerned local or national accountability. I listened carefully to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton. The Royal Commission criticised the present arrangements as lacking in openness and accountability and not making for consistency in policy and practice. My hon. and learned Friend said that a Conservative Government should always decentralise, never centralise. He said that there was more risk of politically motivated direction if we centralised. I must disagree with my hon. and learned Friend on each of those points. Maintenance of objective is the first principle of war. It should also be the first principle of political action. Our objective is to achieve a prosecuting service that is independent of improper influence. My hon. and learned Friend says that it is un-Conservative to centralise, but I suggest that it is fundamentally un-Conservative to tie oneself to dogma for the sake of dogma when informed forecasts show that the object will be damaged if one does. All the informed forecasts give us their answer. Virtually every comment on the Royal Commission's recommendations on local control stated that this will not work and that there is too great a risk of political influence. That is an important point.

I remind my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton of a leading article in the Daily Telegraph shortly after the publication of the Bill. It stated that the "Prosecution of Offenders Bill proposes a 'nationalised' centrally controlled system, staffed by 2,500 civil servants of whom some 1,300 woud be lawyers, and costing the taxpayer an estimated additional £4 million a year. This should be seen, however, as the necessary price for ensuring that so far as possible prosecution decisions and policy remain free from political interference."

I was surprised to hear my hon. and learned Friend say that he thought that more political interference would result if we followed this course. Does he wish the prosecuting officers in the police force regions to be subjected to the same type of pressure as chief constables have, on recent occasions, had to face from those in political authority in their areas? I thought that his point was fundamentally wrong.

If there is to be local accountability, the Crown prosecutor must be adequately protected from the risk of improper influence. In the course of our extensive consultations no one could suggest a scheme for local accountability which adequately protected the Crown prosecutor from the risk and, at the same time, avoided the split between responsibility for the service and for the resources that will fund it. I do not believe that we could be confident that if they were given control over prosecution decisions, all authorities would act as responsibly as the best undoubtedly would.

At present, the decision whether to prosecute rests with the chief constable, as part of his responsibility for operational questions. I was asked by the right hon. Member for Halton whether there was any evidence of political pressure upon a prosecuting solicitor. There was a report that the county prosecuting solicitor for Derbyshire was told by the county council that he could not use and would not be given funds to use counsel to prosecute people accused of offences arising out of Mr. Scargill's recent strike.

I come to the subject of delegation to local decision. The principle is that prosecution decisions should be taken locally except in cases of importance or difficulty. I say to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton that under the provisions of the Bill, as he is aware, some decisions which at the moment are reserved to the Director of Public Prosecutions will be taken locally by the Crown prosecutor. That is decentralisation which is achieved by the Bill.

The Government have decided in favour of block transfer of existing staff because of practical difficulty of individual recruiting and because of our confidence in the general quality of staff currently employed in prosecuting solicitors' departments. There will not be the usual examination. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North asked about that. There will be a block transfer because of the experience that those people have had. The exact numbers required will depend upon the report of the management consultants. The working party estimated 578 extra lawyers and 218 extra support staff. About 600 police officers are currently engaged in a full-time prosecuting role.

As to the staff of the service, the Government wholly agree with what has been said about the need to maintain a high quality, but it will of course be open to the director to designate as Crown prosecutors qualified people from either branch of the legal profession within the service. They will have identical functions. I have been asked about clause 4. It is designed only to ensure that.

As was made clear in the other place on 17 January, it is no part of the Government's intention to use that clause as a means of altering the balance between the two parts of the legal profession. The Government hold strongly to the view that the public interest requires the continuance of a strong and independent Bar, and that rights of audience in the Crown court should accordingly continue to be confined as at present to an independent Bar which prosecutes and defends. That was accepted, I think, by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon.

I hope that what I have said meets the anxieties of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South. I confirm that clause 4 does not confer upon prosecuting solicitors the right of audience in the Crown court now enjoyed by defending solicitors under the provisions of a direction made by the Lord Chancellor under section 83 of the earlier Act. Those points were mentioned by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's response and purpose in introducing time limits is to reduce the delay in bringing cases to trial in magistrates and Crown courts. The Lord Chancellor is already introducing new management measures to enable targets to be set and met. The principal recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee's report in June last year was for the adoption of time limits. It said that there should be preliminary trials to test what limits might be feasible having regard to the special difficulties in London and the south-east. The Home Secretary had already put in hand re-examination of that issue before the recommendation was published.

I am grateful for the welcome given to these proposals by the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon. They were welcomed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South and by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds, who expressed anxiety about the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. The time limits—the clock, as he put it, that was established and wound up and started to tick by the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act—have nothing to do with the time limits that we are dealing with here. Under the police Act, those time limits relate to what happens before charge. Under this Bill, the time limits relate to what happens once the prosecution has been commenced.

I am grateful for the very wide support which clause 22 has generally received. I do not think that I need say more about that.

As to costs, the major change effected by the Bill is in the funding of prosecutions. The Crown prosecution service will be directly funded through the normal Vote procedure and this removes the need for the courts to award costs on a case-by-case basis from public funds in cases instituted by the police. The Lord Chancellor is also empowered by regulation to enable courts to order one party to pay costs incurred by its opponent as a result of an unnecessary or improper act or omission. That is a valuable disciplinary measure and will enable courts to take a greater hold over, for example, prolix counsel or dilatory solicitors.

An important change is that the Government have agreed that even if a defendant is acquitted in a summary case the court may make an order for the payment of his costs out of central funds. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West that the normal practice will be to exercise discretion in favour of the defendant unless there are positive reasons for not making such an order —for example, where the defendant's own conduct may have brought suspicion on him and misled the prosecution. It will no longer be necessary for a defendant to be acquitted on all counts in one indictment.

A fair amount of time has been taken up on the issue of what has been called old clause 22, now no longer in the Bill. This is by no means an open and shut issue. A number of considerations have to be taken into account if we are to do justice to the feelings of our constituents. It is important to remember that the full facts, including sometimes some of the most influential facts, that have led to the passing of a sentence simply do not get given full weight and sometimes are not even mentioned in a necessarily short media report. On the other hand, there really is a feeling—as my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West expressed it — of helpless frustration among members of the public in the rare case of a really mistakenly lenient sentence. That is what lay behind the Government's initiative.

I was very grateful to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) for saying that he well understood what lay behind the Government's thinking. My right hon. and learned Friend has stated his position upon that, but, lest there be any misunderstanding, it bears repetition.

I have had warning orders, and therefore I shall conclude by saying this, having sat here throughout this extremely interesting debate. Not long ago a very distinguished legal journalist said to me that he was extremely surprised that the Government had introduced this Bill. He is a regrettably frequent critic of the Government. I asked him why he was surprised, and he replied, "I never thought that you were actually going to do it." This Bill, which so commended itself to that journalist, I now have great pleasure in commending to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES BILL [Lords] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Prosecution of Offences Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) sums payable in respect of expenditure incurred by the Director of Public Prosecutions in the discharge of his functions;

(b) any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State or the Attorney General which is attributable to that Act;

(c) any sums required to meet payments ordered to be made out of central funds; and

(d) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums so payable under any other enactment.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Police

10 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I beg to move,

That the draft Police (Anonymous, Repetitious Etc. Complaints) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 4th April, be approved.

It may be for the convenience of the House if we take also the following two motions:

That the draft Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals Etc.) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 26th March, be approved.

That the draft Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 26th March, be approved.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Yes, that will be convenient.

Mr. Shaw: We are debating this evening three of the six statutory instruments required to allow the Government to bring into force part IX of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 on 29 April 1985. The six instruments fall into two groups.

The first is made up of the Police (Discipline) Regulations 1985, the Police (Discipline) (Senior Officers) Regulations 1985 and the Police (Complaints) (General) Regulations 1985. They were all laid before the House on 2 April, having been made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary on 28 March. They do not need the approval of the House and are therefore not before us at present.

The second group is made up of the Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations 1985, the Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals Etc.) Regulations 1985 and the Police (Anonymous, Repetitious Etc. Complaints) Regulations 1985. They have been laid before the House in draft form and, before they can be made, the drafts need approval by resolution of both Houses of Parliament. It is these latter regulations which are before the House this evening and for which I am asking the House's approval.

The six regulations will be complemented by the Police (Appeals) Rules 1985, which will deal with appeals to the Secretary of State by police officers against the decision of their chief constable, or against the decision of the police authority in the case of senior officers, and which will be laid before the House on 18 April. Together with the Act itself, they will provide a new and, in the Government's view, a much improved framework for the investigation of complaints against the police and for the determination of disciplinary proceedings against police officers of all ranks.

Part IX of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act will abolish the Police Complaints Board and establish a new Police Complaints Authority. It is only right—I am sure that the House will agree with this—that I place it on the record that the Police Complaints Board is not being abolished for any failure on its part. Far from it. Within the powers which the relevant legislation gave it, the board has done a thoroughly professional job of examining with an impartial eye complaints and investigation reports and chief constables' proposals for disciplinary action against officers whose behaviour had led to the complaint. I am sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House will agree that Sir Cyril Philips, the chairman, and his colleagues and their predecessors at the board have done an excellent and worthwhile task and laid an invaluable foundation on which to build.

The new authority will have two main functions. It will take on the valuable job at present performed by the board in looking at complaints investigation reports to determine whether appropriate disciplinary action is being taken. As a new and important task, however, it will be required to supervise the investigation of complaints of the most serious kind and will have power to supervise the investigation of complaints of slightly less seriousness. I shall refer shortly to the draft Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals Etc.) Regulations, which deal with such matters.

I remind the House that Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint the former Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, Sir Cecil Clothier, as the authority's first chairman. Sir Cecil will, of course, be well known to many of us, and I have not the slightest doubt that the energy and firmness that he showed in his former post will prove to be of the utmost value in his transfer to the no less intricate and sensitive area of complaints against the police. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has, in addition, already announced that Admiral Bell of the present board and the right hon. Roland Moyle will support Sir Cecil as his deputy chairmen. He hopes to announce the names of other members of the authority shortly.

I do not wish to pre-empt that announcement, but I can assure the House that they will bring a wide spread of experience and expertise to the work. Two are lawyers, and of those one is a barrister with a long career in business, the other a solicitor and part-time supplementary benefit appeals tribunal chairman. Two have long experience in industrial personnel management. Two have a background in community and race relations. We have an ex-Army officer and a ship's master with fleet administration experience. One is, like Admiral Bell, formerly a member of the Police Complaints Board. Add to that breadth of experience a commitment to work full time with the authority, and I am convinced that they will make up a very strong team indeed.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The Minister has not said anything about the geographical spread and the locations from which the members have been drawn. Will he assure the House that they will not all be London based?

Mr. Shaw: The new authority will be London based. It will have a permanent membership, as I have said, which will be drawn from various parts of the country. It is, however, open to the authority in due course to consider the possibility of regional offices for regional work and, on the investigative side of the authority's work, travel into the areas concerned will take place.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Perhaps I missed what my hon. Friend had to say, but how can he tell us about the background of the chaps without naming them? Is there a constitutional difficulty? Can he tell me whether any of them has a background in police work?

Mr. Shaw: My answer is in two parts. First, we would wish to announce the team when it is complete. I have spoken of those who have so far accepted my right hon. Friend's invitation to serve. Secondly, it is not the intention that they will have been involved in police work. We are dealing with an authority which seeks to have complete impartiality and independence in dealing with the work that is brought before it. My hon. Friend will agree that in the case of the Police Complaints Board many such people gave substantial and distinguished service to the handling of police complaints while that board existed.

The second innovation of part IX of the Act is the introduction of a system to provide for the informal resolution of complaints which, while they require examination, can nevertheless be handled in a way which stops short of reaching the full complexity of a thorough formal investigation, with all that that entails. The draft Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations 1985 will deal with that.

Thirdly, the Act provides a more formal framework of responsibility than exists at present for the investigation of complaints against senior police officers, that is to say, those of a rank higher than chief superintendent. Except where a complaint against such an officer has to be referred to the Police Complaints Authority on the ground of its seriousness, that new procedure is not before the House tonight. It is set out in the Police (Discipline) (Senior Officers) Regulations, to which I referred briefly earlier.

Finally, there is an improvement in discipline procedures, of which I should remind the House. This is the provision in the Act for officers of chief superintendent rank and below to be legally represented at hearings where they face the three most serious punishments available to a chief constable—dismissal from the force, requirement to resign or reduction in rank. Again, the provision and the way it will work are not before the House tonight but are part of the package of measures which will come into force on 29 April.

The Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations will apply to those complaints which do not require the full complexity of a formal investigation. I have deliberately avoided using the word "trivial" about complaints, as the complainant regards any complaint as serious. However, the House will agree that many issues can be described as small and of lesser importance than those which would require the full examination procedure. However, it is only fair to recognise that positions arise in which a member of the public is left angry or concerned enough about a police officer's actions to want, not so much to trigger the full complaints procedure as to draw them to the attention of someone in authority and to seek an explanation or possibly an apology. The informal resolution regulations have been designed to that end.

A further prerequisite to informal resolution is the Act's requirement that the complainant must give his consent to the use of the informal procedures. That means that even if the police are perfectly satisfied that a particular complaint might be informally resolved, it is in the last resort open to the complainant to decide whether to accept that form of resolution. If he wishes, a full investigation of the complaint can be made. I stress that the complainant must be satisfied that this is the system which he wishes to use and that informal resolution is both sufficient and satisfactory to him. If he is not so satisfied, the full investigative procedure can be carried out.

On the draft Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals Etc.) Regulations, I remind hon. Members that section 87(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act already requires referral to the Police Complaints Authority of all complaints alleging that the conduct of a police officer resulted in the death of or serious injury to some person. "Serious injury" is defined as "a fracture, damage to an internal organ, impairment of bodily function, a deep cut or a deep laceration."

The instrument before us deals, first, with other types of complaints which must be referred to the authority. In these cases, however, it will be left to the authority to decide whether or not to supervise the investigation of the complaint.

The White Paper "Police Complaints and Discipline Procedures", which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary laid before the House in October 1983, indicated that there would be a category of complaints below the most serious group which would be required to be referred to the authority for discretionary supervision. This category would consist of complaints alleging corruption, less serious cases of assault having resulted in actual bodily harm and other serious cases reflecting adversely on the reputation of the police service. Draft regulation 4 of this instrument fulfils that undertaking.

Regulation 5 sets out the powers of the authority to impose requirements in relation to investigations. A further proviso is included to ensure that the authority cannot, through inadvertence or pure ill luck, impose a requirement which would adversely affect the admissibility of evidence at a criminal trial or make adequate evidence hard to obtain. Finally, the regulation requires the authority to consult a chief officer before imposing any requirement as to the resources that he should make available to an investigation and to have regard to any representations that he might make.

The draft Police (Anonymous, Repetitious Etc. Complaints) Regulations are a re-enactment of part of the Police (Withdrawn, Anonymous Etc. Complaints) Regulations 1977. The part relating to withdrawn complaints is now to be found in the Police (Complaints) (General) Regulations, which are not before the House. The remaining parts will allow the authority to dispense with the requirement that a complaint should be investigated in certain circumstances. The first is where a complaint is anonymous. The second is where a complaint is substantially the same as a previous complaint and contains no fresh allegations. The third is where it is not reasonably practicable to complete an investigation.

As I have explained, the three sets of draft regulations need to be viewed as part of the wider system of procedures which offer a fair and workable approach to complaints against the police. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The Opposition have serious reservations about the complaints procedure introduced by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, but within that context we do not wish to quibble with the three instruments. They are satisfactory within the context of the Act, although the Act itself is far from satisfactory.

I have never understood why the Government chose yet again to become involved in such a complex method of dealing with complaints, although the present system is better than the previous one, which had the unenviable record of being disliked by everyone. Nevertheless, when I spoke at a Police Federation meeting the other week a diagram showing the operation of the procedure was produced which made some of the diagrams produced by the GLC and the metropolitan counties in relation to the Local Government Bill look like minor jigsaw puzzles and showed a number of ways of resolving complaints to be both convoluted and unnecessary.

I have always believed that there is much to be said for simply introducing the existing ombudsman system, which would have the advantage of allowing Members of Parliament and councillors outside London to take up complaints in the first instance. If the complaint was satisfactorily resolved at that stage, there would be no further involvement and one of the instruments before us would not be needed. Cases which could not be satisfactorily resolved between the chief constable and the Member of Parliament or councillor could be referred to the ombudsman, as in the case of complaints relating to housing, social services or taxation. Following the Second Reading of the Prosecution of Offences Bill today, there is a further safeguard in the ability to turn to the independent public prosecutor if criminal behaviour by a police officer is alleged.

All in all, there could have been a far simpler and less complex system than the one put before the House in connection with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, but, within the context of the legislation to be brought into effect on 1 April, I have no quibbles.

I welcome what the Minister said about the appointments. I personally welcome the appointment of Roland Moyle, who used to be a Member of this House. I welcome the others too, but I do not know them. I knew Roland Moyle when he was a Member of the House, and I am sure that he will do an excellent job. I do not doubt that the other members whose appointments have been announced will also do a good job.

If the Minister has not finished compiling his list, I ask him to consider making the body as wide as possible so that it reflects as accurately as possible the structure of society. The Minister was right to say to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) that people involved with the police should not serve on the board. I do not believe that they would wish to do so.

There would be a case for including a trade unionist or someone with similar experience. I also hope that the fact that half the people of this country are women will be recognised. There should be some female representation. The ethnic minority groups will have a great deal of concern about the police complaints body and I strongly urge the Minister to ensure that they are represented on the committee. I hope that the Minister will make use of this opportunity.

I hope that in due course we will have a complaints procedure that is far simpler and less convoluted, and which will be fully accepted by public and police alike. I suggest that the Government should consider a system such as I have outlined tonight.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I, too, welcome what my hon. Friend has told us about the status of the new police complaints authority. Nothing could more clearly show the importance that Government and Parliament attach to it than the fact that the chairman is to be appointed by the Prime Minister and will be no less a person than the former Ombudsman, Sir Cecil Clothier. Having worked with them over the years, I should also like to pay tribute to Sir Cyril Philips and to Admiral Bell. I am delighted that Admiral Bell is to continue as deputy chairman of the authority. I also agree with those who knew him in this House that Roland Moyle will be an admirable member of the new authority.

I have to take issue with the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), who implied that people should, as it were, be appointed to the authority by constituency. He believes that a member of an ethnic minority should be appointed, a trade unionist, a woman and so on. I understand the need for a broadly based authority that will enjoy public confidence. However, the worst that could happen would be that the members of the authority had to vote according to their constituency interest. That is the opposite of what is sought, and I am sure that that is not the hon. Gentleman's intention. The selection of those who are to serve in a quasi-judicial role should reflect their personal integrity, experience and authority and not the fact that they represent a body of opinion that may have a certain attitude to the police service.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith said that it would be inappropriate for a former police officer to serve on the board. His anxiety was that, because of his connection with the police service, such a person might be inclined to vote his ticket. The same logic must be applied to the remainder of those who are to be appointed. I hope that there will be no conscious decision to select people as representatives. They must stand on their own merits.

I am not a total admirer of the new police complaints system. I have been involved in the matter for far too long —since the 1976 legislation, which was introduced by the late Dr. Summerskill on behalf of the Labour Government. It was a disaster. We knew that it would not work. A further effort did not work satisfactorily, as Sir Cyril Philips was good enough to say in his triennial report. We now have a third attempt. The system is immensely complex, and I shall confine myself to the informal resolution procedure.

The police service already has an informal resolution procedure. Anyone who wants to make a complaint can go to a police station and if there is a sensible sergeant there —there usually is—he will try informally to resolve the complaint. It is my experience that in seven, and possible nine, out of 10 cases, the complainant is upset at the time because of an incivility, a misunderstanding or excessive officiousness on the part of a police officer and there is an informal resolution because the sergeant or inspector explains the situation.

We are now importing, under the guise of an informal resolution, a rather structured and formal procedure. It will require some paperwork, which is spelt out in the regulations. The complainant must have the informal procedure explained to him and he will then have to consent to it. Knowing the police service, that will have to be in writing. Almost implicitly, the complainant might imagine that, by agreeing to an informal procedure, he is abandoning his right to take the matter further. There might be a problem there.

Similarly, the officer will have to give his consent. It would be extremely odd if the consent of the complainant had to be sought but the wretched police officer's did not. I understand from the detailed consultations between the Police Federation and Home Office officials that the consent of both parties will have to be obtained. That will not always be easy. Police officers are sometimes on rest days, they might be away on a course or even on a picket line. There will be problems in getting the consent of the officer in question.

I understand that an honest third party will have to be found, although, surprisingly, that is not mentioned in the regulations. That third party will have to sit in while the informal resolution procedure takes place. I cannot recall the name that has been given to the outside party in the Criminal Evidence Act 1984, but a member of the good and great in the local community will be asked to sit in on the conciliation procedure to ensure that all is well done. I must not complain about that, but I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that experience will work out as I am suggesting. There will be some formality in what was previously informal. That is regrettable. The House has agreed that that should be so, and it would be wrong for me to go back over it, but I am worried about how the informal resolution procedure will take place.

My hon. Friend the Minister said that when a chief officer of police deals with a police officer under the discipline regulations and exercises his great power to sack, demote or change severely the career of that officer, there will henceforth be a right of access to a lawyer. That is right. It was a hard-fought battle through more than one session of the Committee stage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. At the end of the day the police service as a whole is glad that Parliament agreed to that. There is, however, the question of the cost. At the moment the costs are to be borne by the voluntary funds of the Police Federation. I am not certain whether that would sit well with the Opposition. They might take the view that in trade union matters it should be dealt with differently, but it was part of a bargain entered into between those of us who were involved in the matter and the Government. The Government were reluctant to see a lawyer introduced, but eventually, when there was no majority on the Committee to get the Bill through without that provision, the arrangement was that the Police Federation could have a lawyer, provided that the lawyer was paid from voluntary funds.

I want to put this point precisely to my hon. Friend. If as a result of the Police Federation using its own voluntary funds the lawyer demonstrates that the chief officer is wrong, and that he has unjustly brought a charge that could lead to dismissal or demotion, what happens then? Are the funds of the Police Federation still to be at risk, even though it has demonstrated that the chief officer was wrong? That would be contrary to the case in all other courts of law and would be unjust. I hope very much that the Police Complaints Authority, which is to have an oversight of all complaints that are made by members of the public against the police, will have no less an oversight of those cases where police officers are brought before their chief officers under discipline and are treated badly. What is sauce for the civilian goose ought to be sauce for the police gander. I mean by that that there should be an even-handed approach.

I remind the House that discipline in the police service can be onerous. There is no lonelier man than a young police officer brought up before his chief, who has virtually absolute power over him and who could, until the introduction of a lawyer was agreed, operate like Captain Bligh of the Bounty, with an inconsistency between one police area and another that is not very much short of scandalous. In circumstances where a police officer has been wrongly treated, the Police Complaints Authority should have a duty and power to oversee that injustice as well as any injustice that is done by the police to members of the general public. I ask my hon. Friend to comment on that.

In regard to anonymous complaints I am glad that an order is being introduced. All that it does for practical purposes is to allow the new Police Complaints Authority to operate in exactly the way that the Police Complaints Board did.

I conclude with a general point. We have gone through a year or so in which the police service has been castigated more severely perhaps than at any other time. Throughout the miners strike large numbers of people in police authorities condemned their own men; large numbers of people in important trade unions alleged that the police service is a brutal, national, political force imposing trade union law. Even in the House we have had bitter exchanges. Against that background, when the House comes to consider the new arrangements for complaints against the police it should recognise that the Government are demonstrating by these orders and by section 9 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act that, far from our having a police service that is non-accountable, we have a police service that is being made to account more than than any other police service in the world. It should be recognised that what Government are doing here on behalf of civil liberties of the police themselves gives the lie to all of the allegations and objurgations that have been made against the police service over the past year.

I cannot say that I welcome all these orders. I accept them as part of the package that was concomitant with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

10.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) is known as the spokesman for the police interest. I do not pretend to that position. There is a duty on hon. Members to uphold both law and order — as the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis says in the new Metropolitan police handbook—and the rights of the citizens. What I have to say on these regulations comes within that context.

I share the scepticism expressed by the spokesman for the other main Opposition party, the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). Although the new authority will be better than the present one, it will not be good enough. A system which appears to be the Establishment at work will not succeed in gaining public confidence. We do not want on it members who represent their vested interest and vote accordingly, we want people who will examine appropriately the many different complaints that are made through the channels set up under the authority, and who can increasingly gain the confidence of the communities, which they are meant to look after.

I welcome the appointment of the new chairman, who has a good track record. I welcome also the appointment of the other main members, but I have a specific suggestion. It comes from the practical experience over a relatively short time — the two and a bit years that I have been an hon. Member—of complaints against the police recorded and brought to me. It is vital that, of all the groups in the community, our young people have confidence that the police act properly. It is vital that they can be confident that the way that the police are examined produces an impartial, publicised, efficient, quick and effective adjudication.

We all know that the court system produces some correct and some incorrect results at the end of trials. If the solicitor and counsel do a good job—they do not always — people are well represented, and juries fulfil their duty and convict where they should and acquit where they should. However, we all know of occasions where the system has failed because it has not even begun to address the real latent complaint behind the complaint brought against the police.

I can give an example to illustrate that general complaint. Two weeks ago, I was sitting in my office in the Norman Shaw building on Friday afternoon. The House had just risen. My constituency is near by, and so my constituents, like those of other London Members, feel that they can get to their Member of Parliament to get him to act quickly in an emergency. I had four phone calls within the space of half an hour from adult constituents complaining of police behaviour in Surrey docks during the arrest of one teenager. The complaints did not come from his family, who were away from home at work. They came from people coming home, meeting their children from school and so on—the neighbourhood. One after the other, and independently —I checked this—they attested to the fact that the police had over-reacted.

At the moment, that case is being considered. It has not gone through the procedure yet, because I advised that it should not. I advised that it was better that I should, as I did that afternoon, phone my chief superintendent, to raise with him the concern, then ask the constituents involved to write to me, go and see them myself and seek to establish what had gone on. I asked why there had apparently been an unnecessary over-reaction to someone who may or may not have been misbehaving—that is an issue to be resolved—but who was clearly dealt with in a way that the community found unacceptable.

The criticism is specific. It does not reflect my view of the general behaviour of the police in Southwark. In general, they do a very good job and I intend no reflection on the generality of police work. However, the Minister knows that there are occasions when that sort of incident needs careful investigation. It is vital that we have available people who are experienced and impartial enough to ensure that those who are most vulnerable and most aggrieved if the system does not work — the categories who will persuade us that we need to revise the system again if it does not work—will be looked after properly.

The largest such group is the young—the adults, legislators and parents of the future. I do not say that there must be an 18-year-old or a 21-year-old on the authority, but the PCA must make it its business to ensure that young people feel that they are being understood. The list of the great and good do not always understand the need for that.

Although I welcome only parts of the proposed procedure, I particularly welcome the informal resolution procedure. I disagree with the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds because I believe that it is vital that there should be a category of complaints that can be dealt with in a way that avoids the long bureaucratic delays that occur in the present system.

I hope that the new procedure will not get bogged down in bureaucracy, but, above all, I hope that when people go to a local police station to make a complaint they will be made clearly aware of the procedures and rights open to them, as they are in other areas, such as civil rights and welfare rights. I hope that it will be made clear to people that once they decide to invoke the law to help them, certain things flow from that. For example, a case becomes sub judice.

There is a failing in the system. I did not serve on the Committee on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill—my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) represented my party — so I did not participate in the debates on the system, but I find that people either do not use the procedures and feel aggrieved because they do not know their rights or their chances of being upheld, or they launch into the system and find that it takes over the complaint and their chance to do anything about it is suppressed. That happens especially if there is a long delay. Even if there are no criminal charges and no trial, a long delay means that the effective remedy is not achieved. The Minister will know the phrase, "Justice delayed is justice denied."

It is important that the PCA has the staff and experience to allow efficient redress, particularly under the informal resolution procedure, where the police and the citizen agree the solution. That is the better method.

The second set of regulations relate to the mandatory referral upwards of matters of importance. The most important are obviously allegations of assaults—actual bodily harm and so on. The authority must deal with those cases.

I hope that, as in other areas of Ombudsman-type adjudications, we shall have a periodic presentation of facts to the public, through reports and other channels. We should have a proper assessment of how the law deals with matters such as self-defence. A complaint of assault by a police officer often arises out of an arrest and the self-defence that a citizen feels he is entitled to use. That is a difficult matter for the courts.

When there are referrals upwards, I ask that there is soon established a clear set of guidelines which make the practice of the authority compatible with criminal law and the criminality of those forms of assault, and where people know that if they are arrested in circumstances in which they believe that the police have overstepped the limit, they can properly present their case, with any appropriate evidence.

The example that I cited earlier was a case in point. People may witness what they believe to be an instance of the police overstepping the mark. That must be looked at by the authority. Perhaps matters of assault could be dealt with separately from other matters so that there is a quickly established procedure and people know that they can go to an experienced person in the authority who deals with these matters. It is a specialist area of importance, to which the House has decided the authority should have particular regard. I ask that the authority arranges its affairs so that people know exactly how it will deal with complaints, that they will be properly dealt with and that all the evidence will be considered and adjudicated upon.

The Minister will remember that during our debates in Committee on the Local Government Bill only a month ago we discussed how it was appropriate, and the methods that could be employed, to ensure that during inquests the families and others involved had the opportunity to present their case properly. The Minister accepted that there was great dissatisfaction with adjudication in inquests on both matters of fact and allegations. I ask that the authority immediately takes on a special responsibility, when dealing with mandatory referrals of assaults against persons, to establish a clear code of practice and a clear method of dealing with them which encompasses all the evidence and reports back to the aggrieved and other interested parties.

On the third set of regulations, the Minister quoted the guidelines set down in the schedule. I am aware that we are signatories to the European convention, which is right and proper. I do not hold the Nationalist sovereign view that we always get it right. Is it clear that these regulations have the same criteria as are applied when one takes a complaint to the European Commission? Certain categories of complaint are dismissed because they are repetitious, anomalous and so on. It is important that we are consistent, otherwise similar definitions, which in practice mean different things at different levels of what is a heirachy of appeal, give rise to problems. It is a practical question. It is not terribly important, but there are people who make complaints but do not wish to pursue them because they are anomolous. However, they raise important issues. I hope that we can be consistent at the lowest level of complaint under the regulations with what we do on the highest level of sovereign decision which is often taken for us by the European Court of Human Rights.

The scepticism which I voiced at the beginning of my speech does not mean that I and my colleagues do not wish the new authority every success. We have confidence that the regulations will give the new authority the confidence that it needs to be able to do its job. Whatever the details of the practice, I hope that these regulations and others will make it clear to the public what their rights are, that their complaints will be comprehensively investigated, that everybody who wishes to have a say may do so and be listened to sympathetically, however difficult that may be, and that there will be a speedy, comprehensive and—within the parameters of the Act—publicised report back to the aggrieved so that justice may be seen to be done as well as, I hope, being done.

Mr. Giles Shaw: With the leave of the House, I will respond to the points that hon. Members have made.

I am grateful for the appreciation of hon. Members in all parts of the House for the work that the present police complaints board has done under its current chairman, Sir Cyril Philips, and for the broad welcome that has been given to the appointment—by Her Majesty, I remind hon. Members—of Sir Cecil Clothier to his new post as chairman of the new police authority. It is important that the House should give its general support at the outset of his task.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) drew attention to what he felt were cumbersome and complex regulations, but he did so in the context of suggesting that an ombudsman system should be applied to the police service in general. He will know that that was discussed during the passage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, when it was agreed that the idea of a complaints ombudsman, as it were, should not be proceeded with.

[Mr. Giles Shaw]

We took the view, to which we still firmly hold, that the solution that we propose will provide a direct and efficient system that meets the needs. The House should recall that we are dealing here not just with the investigation of complaints from members of the public who have been aggrieved by police actions or activities, but also with the discipline side within the force. For example, it is inevitable that records will be kept and that there will be a degree of complexity, so reflecting the disciplined way in which police forces are run. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), as so often, was right to remind the House that there is a strict and extremely formidable code of discipline to which all police officers subscribe.

That aspect is also within the purview of the new police complaints authority on the disciplinary side of its work. Thus, there must be a structure, and inevitably it will be formal in print, though I assure hon. Members that, on informal procedures, every attempt is made to simplify matters to the point of great simplicity indeed.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds that there is no intention of involving a third party. It will be between a complainant and an officer, and it is hoped that such issues can have a very quick resolution indeed. I accept the point made by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that one problem concerning the public's perhaps lack of confidence in the existing procedures is due to their time-consuming nature. It is inevitable, for example, that should civil proceedings intervene those proceedings must take place before there can be an adequate handling of a police complaint. We judge that the informal resolution procedure will be kept to the absolute minimum, in time and content and in the number of persons involved.

It is crucial that the House recognises that a great many complaints are capable of being resolved in such a person-to-person way. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds pointed out, that is the way in which many complaints are dealt with now. There is nothing new in that in principle. What is new is to set out clearly where the rights are and where the citizen can go to get the quickest possible resolution of a grievance. Of the 16,000 complaints currently handled, well over 2,000 come within a category known as "incivility." It is likely that many of those complaints could be resolved rapidly by a generous use of the informal resolution procedure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds was concerned about the costs of legal representation, particularly in cases where the Police Federation case was upheld and where, therefore, the chief officer's case was lost. I am aware of my hon. Friend's tenacity in this matter. He will be aware that the question of the payment of costs for the representation of officers acquitted was fully discussed during the passage of the Bill and that the Government took the view at that time that such a provision should not be included in the measure. I know that my hon. Friend thinks that there should be such a provision. The matter was considered, and it was agreed not to include the provision in the Bill.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: My hon. Friend is not putting the matter exactly correctly. The matter was not discussed because we did not contemplate the case where, because of the lawyer's intervention, the federation won its case and the chief officer lost his.

Will my hon. Friend answer this case? The chief officer is provided with a lawyer at public expense. The accused police officer is provided with a lawyer only voluntarily at the expense of the Police Federation. If the chief officer loses his case, his costs will be paid from the public purse. If the Police Federation wins its case, apparently it will not have the benefit of public funds. How can it be right to place a chief officer in a position where he receives money from the taxpayer—whether he wins or loses, whether he is right or wrong, whether he is just or unjust, whether he is venal or not — whereas when the officer using funds provided voluntarily by the Police Federation is acquitted and is seen to be innocent in every respect he is not given the same benefit that the chief officer gets, even when he is mistaken and is shown to be wrong?

Mr. Shaw: I take my hon. Friend's point. There is no question but that there is a disparity in the present arrangements. This issue was debated thoroughly in another place during the passage of the Bill. It was considered that there should not be special provision. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds says that that is an unfair arrangement. I put it to him that there has been a fairly steady evolution of the extent to which the members of the Police Federation can obtain legal representation and the use of facilities for the reimbursement of those costs. At the moment that is based on the federation's funds. The federation is a large and significant organisation which is able to do that. The same cannot be said of the chief constables. There are fewer chief constables. I shall take the matter on board for future discussion, but I am afraid that, within the context of these regulations and the Bill, that must remain the position.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey referred to the specialist role of the authority dealing with serious complaints. That authority has a special role, and there is nothing to prevent it from, for example, reporting to the Home Secretary about certain incidents or the characteristics of certain incidents that draw themselves to the authority's attention as requiring special treatment. It is not wise to assume that the authority will field specialists in certain categories of complaint. The authority will be composed of a chairman, two deputy chairmen and 10 members. About half that membership will deal with the discipline side and about half will deal with the investigative side. It would be difficult, because of those small numbers on the authority, to say that there would always be one person who would specialise in one type of complaint.

I assure the House that the authority will comprise people who have been appointed for their professional and relevant skills in handling these issues. It will not be composed of token representatives from either ethnic groups or geographical areas; it will be primarily composed of those who can discharge these duties on a professional level. The duties are considerable.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith asked about the representation of women on the authority. At the moment, three of its members are women. At least one authority member is from an ethnic minority group. But those people are not on the authority simply because they are members of specified groups. They are there because they bring relevant, professional expertise to the job.

The biggest distinction between the authority and the police complaints board is its professional full-time nature. That allows the chairman's role to become significant in maintaining and determining a standard by which the complaints and discipline procedures are dealt with.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful to the Minister for clarifying that matter. No one was arguing that those people should be there merely because they were female, black, Asian or whatever. The argument that I used strongly — the Minister seems to have conceded this—is that there are plenty of people from those groups who have the professional ability to do the job. It is important that they are on the board. If that is what the Minister is saying, and I understand that it is, I welcome it.

Mr. Shaw: Yes, I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

In recommending the regulations to the House, I return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds. We already have a highly professional police force and significant restraints laid upon the behaviour of members of that force by virtue of the discipline procedures. Chief officers already have a high degree of independence in the control and discipline of their forces. It is because of that that the police complaints authority and the regulations which analyse and set out some of its powers have to take in hand the reputation and high standards already established.

It is no part of the work of the police complaints authority to seek to undermine or, as it were, pull down the edifice of police discipline which has been established over so many years and which results in the United Kingdom force receiving a great degree of world-wide respect. We believe that the police complaints authority will take forward by a large measure the degree of public confidence to be attached to the police complaints procedure, to provide it in a way which is more accessible, ore understandable, and I hope speedier than that which presently obtains, but, above all, make it one which satisfies all parties—those who complain and those who observe the discipline code in the police.

I ask the House to accept the regulations.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Police (Anonymous, Repetitious Etc. Complaints) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 4th April, be approved.

That the draft Police (Complaints) (Mandatory Referrals Etc.) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 26th March, be approved.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

That the draft Police (Complaints) (Informal Resolution) Regulations 1985, which were laid before this House on 26th March, be approved.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BILL [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 69 (Second Reading Committees), That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Question agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BILL [Lords] [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Industrial Development Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums required by the Secretary of State for defraying out of such money the expenses of the English Industrial Estates Corporation.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

PETITION

Transport Bill and Rates

10.57 pm

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I wish to present two humble petitions from the citizens of Birmingham resident within the electoral constituency of Yardley. The first, signed by 635 persons, states

That the proposals contained in the transport Bill 1985 will have a detrimental effect on the residents of the City of Birmingham who use public transport, will put in jeopardy the West Midlands Passenger Transport integrated transport system . . . will threaten the country wide concessionary fares scheme used by Senior Citizens, disabled, unemployed and school children, and will cause further loss of jobs in the transport industry within the Birmingham area, and will also have a damaging effect on those who remain working within the industry and those engaged in the bus building industry.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House reject the Transport Bill 1985.

To lie upon the Table.

Secondly, I present a petition signed by 740 of my electors. They humbly petition as citizens of Birmingham and members of the Sheldon Residents Association

That the House recognise the implication and full extent of the drastic and outrageous 43 per cent. Rates increase to be levied by the City of Birmingham District Council.

Wherefore your petitioners pray humbly that your reject the proposal made by the City of Birmingham District Council.

I join them.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Ray Honeyford

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

10.59 pm

Mr. Marcus Fox (Shipley): This Adjournment debate is concerned with Mr. Ray Honeyford, the headmaster of Drummond Road Middle School, Bradford. Just a few of my constituents send their children there. This matter has become a national issue—not from Mr. Honeyford's choice. Its consequences go beyond the issue of race relations or, indeed, of education. They strike at the very root of our democracy and what we cherish in this House above all—the freedom of speech.

One man writing an article in a small-circulation publication has brought down a holocaust on his head. To my mind, this was a breath of fresh air in the polluted area of race relations. He was not in conflict with the Secretary of State or indeed with his education authority. I quote from the chairman of the council's education committee:

"It is clear that Mr. Honeyford is not and has not acted in any way to be labelled a racist. Council documents show that he has implemented the authority's policy."

Indeed, because the chairman of that committee is a Conservative, to show how unbiased they are, the principal middle school officer, Mr. Donald Thompson —not to be confused with the Whip of that name—said in the Telegraph and Argus on 20 March 1984:

"Mr. Honeyford was unquestionably very able. We have had no complaints about him at all. All this controversy has stemmed from the publication of an unfortunate article. He has always done well by all the pupils at the school."

How, then, did all this business start, we may well ask, and I hope to enlighten the House? What did Mr. Honeyford say in his article in the Salisbury Review? He dared to suggest that in a classroom dominated by coloured children white children suffer educationally. Mr. Honeyford should know, because in his school 92 per cent. of the children are of Asian origin. If he had commented the other way round, that in a school with 92 per cent. white children the 8 per cent. coloured children were at a disadvantage, he would have been praised by his present detractors, not vilified.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Not so.

Mr. Fox: It is all right the hon. Gentleman saying "Not so". Let him just listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I have listened.

Mr. Fox: The hon. Gentleman has not heard half yet. In practice Mr. Honeyford is trying to rectify the situation in his school by emphasing that all his children are British —I see that the hon. Gentleman agrees; that is hopeful —and that English should be their mother tongue. How on earth will they be integrated in our society if they are not fluent in our language? He is not saying that other cultures or languages should not be respected. He points out that most of the children get these all the time outside school. This is inevitable. Something like only 10 per cent. of their parents speak English and only 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. write it. So it is obvious what language the children get at home.

Mr. Honeyford believes that schools must place British culture and history at the forefront of the curriculum for all pupils, black and white. It is a fact that the parents of the children in question chose to come and live here of their own free will, were given British citizenship and therefore must accept that our British educational system is the best possible for their families.

This is not a new policy. Over the decades other minorities from many countries have accepted this. In my own constituency there are Jews and people from eastern Europe who have accepted this without question. And I believe that the vast majority of the parents of children at Mr. Honeyford's school know this and want their children to do well through the sort of teaching that he has given. One would think that somehow in this day and age it was racist to teach English.

What are Mr. Honeyford's qualifications? He has taught at that school for four years. He has a first-class record. There are 540 children at the school, and it is oversubscribed for the next school year. Obviously, he has the confidence of the majority of the school governors —[Interruption.] I hear those rumblings, but only a few days ago in the Telegraph and Argus of 7 April, Mr. Ernest Kinder, chairman of the school governers, said:

"I have received many letters of support from parents and, as far as the board is concerned Mr. Honeyford is the right man for the job at Drummond Road. We feel that every individual is entitled to voice his opinions and therefore we do not want to discuss the matter."

I am sure that the majority of parents support Mr. Honeyford. Not one child has been withdrawn from that school in spite of the vicious campaign that has been orchestrated against him over the past 12 months. The vitriolic attacks on him must have had an enormous effect in terms of undermining his authority and teaching. It is to the shame of those people that they have never given any thought to the effect on the children. The staff support him. I defy anyone who has visited the school—perhaps the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) would like to say something about this, if he has visited the school—to dispute the fact that it is a good school where discipline and authority are maintained, and the children are happy and are being educated in a good environment. No racist could control such a well-run school, with dedicated students learning and speaking English. [Interruption.] I hope that people outside the House will be noting the noises made by the only Liberal Member present in the house, the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft). Mr. Honeyford's enemies have deliberately exaggerated the article that he wrote for their own ends. I remind the House of what the Secretary of State said in a speech to the chamber of commerce in Reading:

"To emphasise racial differences could create untold damage to race relations."

He has also said:

"The Government is committed to the principle that all children of whatever race or colour should have an equal opportunity to benefit from education. At the same time they should also be able to feel that they belong in a true sense to Britain."

It is right to uphold family traditions and values and to have pride in our ancestry, but we are also full members of British society, whatever our origins.

Who are Mr. Honeyford's detractors? Who are the people who have persecuted him? They have one thing in common—they are all on the Left of British politics. The Marxists and the Trots are here in full force. We only have to look at their tactics, and all the signs are there. Without a shred of evidence, Mr. Honeyford has been vilified as a racist. Innuendos and lies have been the order of the day. He has been criticised continuously through the media, yet most of the time he has been barred from defending himself and denied the right to answer those allegations by order of the education authority. The mob has taken to the streets to harass him out of his job. Some 150 demonstrators marched from the school to the education offices in Bradford.

After that rent-a-mob besieged his office, the director of education, in a blue funk, announced a major review. Ten educational advisers descended on Mr. Honeyford's school to investigate it. A few paltry recommendations were made, one being that he should improve relations with the parents—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Members should listen. As the vast majority of the parents do not speak English and do not come to the school as normal parents would do, he sought to meet them. He wrote to all the parents in Urdu and English explaining his intentions and, along with an experienced education welfare officer, who, by the way, comes from the new Commonwealth and knows all about those problems, he went to their homes. It was a worthwhile task. At every house that he visited he was greeted with respect and pleasure. What happened after Mr. Honeyford visited 40 or 50 families? A leading figure behind the parent action group made objections to the director of education, and the exercise was stopped. That is hardly an exercise in democracy. On the one hand Mr. Honeyford was asked to do just that, and on the other those who saw the success of it stopped him. So much for the council's claim that its race relations policy was based on encouragement, tolerance and concern. The officers showed cowardice. They could have dealt firmly with the Left-wing agitators months ago.

The same people visited the parents and, although the majority of parents cannot speak or write English, 200 similar letters arrived on the desk of the director of education asking for Mr. Honeyford's dismissal—I am justifying the Trots and Marxists being involved. Last October, a governors meeting at city hall — [Interruption.]—I hope that the Liberal party would not indulge in this sort of business.

Mr. Meadowcroft: If the hon. Gentleman will let me——

Mr. Fox: I have no intention of doing so.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I know.

Mr. Fox: I give way.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Gentleman may be doing himself a disservice. Will he accept that I came to listen to him because I may have more sympathy with what he is trying to say than he thinks? For example, I do not believe that the thought police have a place in our democracy. What I read and what I am advised by my Liberal colleagues is basically that whatever the writing on the paper, there is a feeling that Mr. Honeyford has not conformed with the spirit of multi-cultural education. What does the hon. Gentleman suggest should be done to resolve the problem, rather than to exacerbate it, as he is doing tonight?

Mr. Fox: From the minute when the hon. Gentleman came into the Chamber he has disguised from me the fact that he is in sympathy with my remarks. I shall come to his point shortly.

Last October a governors meeting at city hall was interrupted by the most incredible scenes which sought to influence them. It was well reported in the various newspapers. Those people are out to destroy the career of a person who has spent a lifetime in teaching. Recently, they formed an alternative school. I remind the House that some people in the area wanted a separate Moslim school in the first place. Therefore, it was not difficult to get the bandwagon rolling. The children were picked up off the streets in minibuses which took them to the illegal school. Environmental health officers were not permitted to monitor the food being transported from local cafes to the school. Even the chief executive of the council was refused admission. So much for anxiety for the children. They were obviously being used.

The matter culminated in a six hour meeting, at which the vote was eight to seven. I now understand why the hon. Member for Leeds, West is present. It was the vote of the Liberal leader of Bradford city council that resulted in the suspension of Mr. Honeyford. She has since virtually retracted her comments. It all boils down to the fact that there is deep public anxiety at this injustice. The council and its officers have lost public support over the issue. I have a petition which a constituent collected in 20 hours, on which there are 6,000 signatures. I shall give it to the Minister before I leave.

The race relations bullies may have got their way so far, but the silent majority of decent people have had enough. The classic intolerance was when some employees of the council stopped Mr. Honeyford from attending a race relations course, where he would supposedly learn the error of his ways, which was the council's policy. They said that he could not attend because he was a racist. The employees, not Mr. Honeyford, were opposing the council's policy. That confirmed my worst fear about those courses. I knew exactly the sort of people who would be running them, and the racist policies that they would adopt.

The matter has reached the point where the morale of headteachers in our area has never been so low. One headteacher claims that 40 have taken early retirement. Although the council may make a generous offer, that seems to be a coincidence.

"I think Bradford is a very sick authority because it is ruled by those political zealots who are on the race lobby bandwagon."

She touches a chord there. The authority of head teachers has been undermined. If Mr. Honeyford is ultimately dismissed, where will it all stop? The withdrawal of the right to free speech from this one man could have enormous consequences and the totalitarian forces ranged against him will have succeeded. This is not the only attempt that has been made in Bradford to stop the conduct of public affairs by other than normal means. It cannot and must not be allowed to succeed.

There is no doubt that the parents are distressed, but the school could soon return to normal under Mr. Honeyford. There is enormous public support for him. I hope that the lord mayor elect of Bradford will reconsider his own position. If he wishes to improve race relations in the city during his year of office he should not forget that he needs the good will of the majority. A little magnanimity from him would be most welcome. A previous Labour lord mayor, Councillor Norman Free, who opposed me and lost in two general elections, is now a friend of mine. He is as appalled as I am at the treatment that Mr. Honeyford is receiving. There is grave public disquiet at the behaviour of local education chiefs and the involvement of political extremists and at the fact that a matter of such great public concern was decided by a subcommittee and not by a full meeting of the council. It is feared that even if the school governors support reinstatement at their next meeting they may be overruled.

The staff are behind Mr. Honeyford, as are the majority of the governors, and thousands of people have signed petitions. His union, the National Association of Head Teachers, supports him and both local newspapers—the Yorkshire and North Humberside Times and the Telegraph and Argus—have published editorials saying how wrong the suspension is. Even a leading article in The Times has stated that Mr. Honeyford deserves to keep his job. It concludes:

"Mr. Honeyford is a heretic and his fate deserves the widest possible attention."

It is not too late to take action. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will monitor the situation extremely carefully.

A number of my hon. Friends have asked to express their support in the remining few minutes. Obviously, I must give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), as Mr. Honeyford is his constituent.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Mr. Honeyford may be a constituent of the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg), but the vast majority of the parents are my constituents. The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) has referred to me in the debate and when I had an Adjournment debate some months ago I readily gave way to him. I appeal to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to ensure that there is a fair balance of views in this short debate and to allow me to intervene in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I have listened carefully to the point of order and I must put the record straight. An Adjournment debate is personal to the Member who is successful in the ballot, but it is not for that Member to decide who shall be called next. The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) may give way to an intervention, but he must not try to tell the occupant of the Chair who is to speak next.

Mr. Fox: I gave the hon. Member for Bradford, West the opportunity to intervene earlier in the debate, but he did not seek to do so. He has not written to me asking to take part, as my two colleagues have. I shall therefore give way to my hon. Friends the Members for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) and for Keighley (Mr. Waller).

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that more than half the time allocated for the debate has already been taken. I am sure that the House wishes to hear the Minister's response, although that, of course, is for him to decide.

Mr. Madden: Further to my point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wrote to the hon. Member for Shipley asking to speak in this debate. I also wrote to the Minister asking if I might speak. The supporters of Mr. Honeyford are zealous in claiming the right of free speech to express their point of view. They are equally zealous in trying to stop those who oppose them from expressing their point of veiw. It is clear that they are trying to do that in this debate. The parents who have lost confidence in Mr. Honeyford are overwhelmingly my constituents — the school is in my constituency — and I therefore ask for the right to speak on their behalf in this short debate to express a point of view which is contrary to that of the hon. Member for Shipley—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must follow the procedures of the House, which provide that the Adjournment debate is personal to the hon. Member who has been successful in the ballot. It is also the practice to hear the Minister's reply, and we have already taken more than half of the time allocated to the debate.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): I am grateful to——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not unfair to the House that an hon. Member should raise a matter that concerns another's constituency, refer to that hon. Member, implying that he will be able to put the record straight and answer all of the abuse, and for that hon. Member then not to be given an opportunity to speak?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is for the occupant of the Chair to follow the procedures. It is for the Minister to decide whether time should be taken out of the last 10 minutes available by another hon. Member. An Adjournment debate is a personal matter for the hon. Member successful in the ballot. It is for the Minister to decide.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): My hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) informed me that he had been approached by my hon. Friends the Members for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) and for Keighley (Mr. Waller), and I accepted that. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) presented me with a note about half an hour before the debate started. I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the debate is entirely the prerogative of my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley.

Mr. Sumberg: I am grateful to my hon. Friend——

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must protest again that this is most curious. I have not been aware, during my eight years in the House, that an Adjournment debate is the personal property of an hon. Member, especially when the debate is about a school in another hon. Member's constituency, the person named in the motion is not a constituent of the hon. Member who has been granted the debate and when that hon. Member refuses to give another hon. Member, who is mentioned during the debate, an opportunity to reply to grossly misleading information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the House that the Adjournment debate is a personal matter for the hon. Member successful in the ballot. That has long precedent. An hon. Member, whatever his interest in the debate, must reach an agreement with the hon. Member successful in the ballot and the Minister. I am honour bound to accept the procedures.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not clear that there is a convention in the House that if an hon. Member discusses matters in another's constituency, especially when he makes allegations such as have been made today, he gives that hon. Member an opportunity to at least express a point of view? Just as our procedures allow an hon. Member to have control over an Adjournment debate, so he should have regard to the conventions which allow fair speech. On an issue such as this, it is a grave abuse for an hon. Member to make allegations about a school in another's constituency and not allow that hon. Member to make at least a brief speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those may well be the merits of the case, but I am bound by the procedures. The Adjournment debate is personal to the hon. Member who has been successful in the ballot. Any other hon. Member must seek the agreement of the Minister and the hon. Member concerned.

Mr. Madden: Further to my previous point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You may recall that when I raised my initial point of order I referred to the fact that I had an Adjournment debate some months ago concerning the closure of a hospital in my constituency. In the course of my remarks I referred to a hospital in the constituency of the hon. Member for Shipley. He did not at any time seek my agreement, but he spoke immediately after I did in that debate, and I readily allowed him to speak. He tonight is denying me the opportunity to speak that I gave him some months ago. This is an abuse of the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Gentlemen that there is no injury time. Points of order are part of the Adjournment debate. All I say is that it is for the hon. Member concerned to decide, and I am trying to follow that procedure.

Mr. Sumberg: I want to make one single point. I am speaking in the House on behalf of my constituent. By the conduct of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) I have been prevented from doing so. I am here to defend my constituent's interest. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) for allowing me to do so. My constituent has not had the sort of freedom of speech that the hon. Member for Bradford, West has tried to deny to me. I shall sit down in the hope that the Minister may have five minutes to reply to the debate.

11.26 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Madden rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) must resume his seat.

Mr. Dunn: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to thank——

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In June of last year I was in extensive correspondence with the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the school which is the subject of this debate——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is an Adjournment debate. There are certain rules that apply to Adjournment debates. Unless the hon. Gentleman is contradicting what I am saying about the procedures, he must not delay the debate. We are almost at the end of the Adjournment anyway. I am sure that the House wants to hear the Minister's reply.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The convention of the House is that there is an opportunity for Members to express their point of view. The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) who introduced the Adjournment debate, has broken the convention of the House by denying——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that the convention is for each hon. Member to be responsible for his own conduct and his own speech.

Mr. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It cannot be further to a point of order which I decided was not a point of order.

Mr. Bennett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The convention of the House is that an hon. Member should have an opportunity to express a constituency point of view. If an hon. Member denies that, it is not surprising that hon. Members on this side feel aggrieved about the matter. He has not had the opportunity——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One may feel aggrieved on many occasions. My job is to protect the proceedings of the House.

Mr. Dunn: For the third time, I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) for obtaining this Adjournment debate——

Mr. Madden: He misled the House on every conceivable aspect.

Mr. Dunn: I wish to reply to the Adjournment debate in the minute or two that remains.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The Minister should blame his hon. Friend. It is his fault.

Mr. Dunn: We have come here tonight to listen to the point of view placed on the record by my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley.

Mr. Madden: It is a huge pack of lies.

Mr. Dunn: I wish to observe the convention of the House and respond——

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has described the words used by my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) as a pack of lies. Is that in conformity with the traditions of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not hear the hon. Member making a personal allegation. It was a general comment. I think that we had better hear what the Minister has to say in reply.

Mr. Dunn: The Minister, too, would like to make some points to place on the record. Let me say at the outset that I do not see it as my task to interpret events in Bradford, nor to respond to the calls that I have heard to intervene in the matter. I do not believe that I have available to me information on which that could be based. I must, therefore, restrict my comments to some of the general principles that have been raised——

The Question having been proposed after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at twenty-nine minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Wednesday 17 April 1985

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

The Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence, through illness, of MR. SPEAKER from this day's sitting.

Whereupon MR. HAROLD WALKER, THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, proceeded to the Table and, after Prayers, took the Chair, as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Redundancies

1. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average number of redundancies in Scotland between 1977 and 1979 and between 1980 and 1984, respectively.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): The number of redundancies in Scotland involving 10 or more workers, notified to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur, averaged 29,186 per annum for the period 1977 to 1979 and 47,207 per annum for the period 1980 to 1984. There are no statistics available where the number of redundancies is below 10.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Minister accept that the Opposition believe that these figures are totally unacceptable and that they will not be acceptable during the lifetime of this Parliament? Does he recognise that the result of the revaluation will be a tremendous increase in rates which will lead to further redundancies because many companies will go to the wall? When will the Government and the Minister do something about it, in particular his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is our mouthpiece at Cabinet level?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman seems to have forgotten that unemployment doubled during the lifetime of the last Labour Government. The Government's policies are designed to create a competitive economy. Output and employment rose last year. Business surveys are encouraging about the prospects for Scottish industry in 1985. As for rates affecting industry, the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the position. Manufacturing industry will benefit from the revaluation.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is the height of hypocrisy for Opposition Members to try to make political capital out of the increase in the number of redundancies during the lifetime of this Government, as many of them are the logical consequence of high inflation, low investment and uncompetitive work practices of the previous Labour Government? Does my hon. Friend also agree that we should be talking not about redundancies but about Scotland's share of the 350,000 new jobs which have been created during the last year?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Employment has been rising and the prospects shown by the business surveys are good. I was very surprised that the hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton) did not mention the increase in the work force at Terex or the fact that Honeywell has received contracts worth £35·2 million since January 1985. It does nobody any good to talk Scotland down.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister recognise the importance to Scottish employment of the 80,000 jobs in the financial sector? If so, will he welcome the amendment to the Trustee Savings Bank Bill and ensure that the Government do not seek to reverse it at a later stage?

Mr. Stewart: Of course, the financial sector is very important to the Scottish economy, as is the service sector as a whole. Two out of three Scots are now employed in the service industries. As for the amendment made last night in another place to the Trustee Savings Bank Bill, no doubt my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will note the position.

Agricultural Colleges

2. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received regarding the proposed reduction in funding for the agricultural colleges in Scotland set out in the receent White Paper on public expenditure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): Representations have been received from a number of organisations and individuals expressing concern about the proposed reduction in funding.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is this not arguably the Government's most short-sighted public expenditure cut so far? Is the Minister aware that more, not less, advice and research are needed in the present agricultural situation in Scotland? If the industry, and especially small farmers, can satisfy the Government that they cannot raise the £3·4 million cut by 1987, as proposed in the White Paper, will he reconsider the proposal so as to preserve this invaluable service?

Mr. MacKay: I accept that the service is invaluable to the industry, but it is worth pointing out that in 1987-88, when the reductions in public funding are fully effective, about £34 million of public money will still be going to research and development and advisory services in Scotland. That is a very considerable sum.

Mr. Bill Walker: Is my hon. Friend aware that in times of difficulty, when expenditure everywhere is under strain, farmers appreciate that every aspect of agricultural support must be examined, but that they expect continued support for upland and less favoured areas, where it is difficult to provide jobs, rather than for colleges?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend is right about the importance of keeping control of public spending, because farmers are among the groups most directly affected by higher interest rates which may result directly from Governments allowing public expenditure to get out of control. My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State is having talks with the Scottish National Farmers Union and the chairman of the Council of Scottish Agricultural Colleges and with college principals to ensure that the service provided is kept in as good a state as possible.

Mr. Donald Stewart: As the EEC has designated Scotland as having 87 per cent. less favoured areas for agricultural purposes, is not the Government's proposal totally backward and reactionary? Will the Minister explain why for 1987-88 the cuts in Scotland will be 41 per cent. compared with only 20 per cent. in England?

Mr. MacKay: The right hon. Gentleman will have to get himself a better calculator. The percentage reduction for Scotland is 41·5 per cent. and the MAFF reduction for England is also 41·5 per cent., so he will have to take the chip off his shoulder about this matter.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Under-Secretary of State confirm what the Minister of State said in a letter to me — that the grant for Auchincruive college in my constituency is to be reduced by £110,000 in the current year? How does he think that that can be achieved without redundancies? Will he also confirm that the Department has approved the setting up of an organisation, known as the Friends of Auchincruive, to try to raise money for the college through raffles and jumble sales? Is that how education is to be funded under the Tories?

Mr. MacKay: As I recall, the figures given in the letter to which the hon. Gentleman refers showed that spending this year would be greater than in the last year of the Labour Government, so perhaps we are doing better than his right hon. and hon. Friends were doing in 1978-79. We believe that the industry should make some contribution to the services, and we look forward to seeing the extent of that contribution before the colleges work out what savings will have to be made.

Mr. Ewing: Is the Minister aware that it is no surprise to the Opposition that he agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that education was not important? Is he further aware that his answer to the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) showed the same abysmal ignorance as the Minister of State has shown about the difference between the position in Scotland and that in England? Has he still not realised that the advisory services in Scotland are closely linked with the educational function, which is not the case in England, and that a 41 per cent. cut in advisory services will thus have a direct impact on education? Is he proud of that?

Mr. MacKay: If the hon. Gentleman reads the record of the exchanges in the past few minutes, he will realise that some of his remarks are quite wide of the truth. There is no reduction in the funding of the colleges' education function, although I concede that, due to the way in which their activities are integrated, there may be a marginal effect on the education facilities, but my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State will be considering that aspect with the principals of the colleges and others involved.

Agricultural Capital Grants

3. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Scottish National Farmers Union to discuss the impact of the reduction of agricultural capital grants.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State discussed this subject with representatives of the National Farmers Union of Scotland both on 10 January and at the union's annual general meeting on 8 March.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Secretary of State accept that a cut in capital cuts for agriculture will have a worrying effect not only on farmers but on small contractors in many rural areas who do the fencing and drainage work? There will be an effect on the whole rural economy. If, because of a reduction in the number of applications for grant, the saving in the present financial year is more than was originally budgeted for, will the right hon. Gentleman review grant rates later in the financial year?

Mr. Younger: We review the matter frequently anyway. Agriculture receives a massive amount of Exchequer support. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the capital grants figures. Last year, help to agriculture in Scotland was augmented by the doubling of the suckler cow premium, the enhancement of hill livestock compensatory allowances in the Highland Board area and the extension of the less favoured areas. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point about contractors being affected by changes in rates of grant, but the matter must be put in perspective. The amounts of grant are still very high in comparison with any other industry. For instance, there is a grant of 70 per cent. for field drainage in less favoured areas. That is a most generous rate of grant.

Mr. Corrie: If my right hon. Friend meets the NFU in the near future, will he discuss the ridiculous suggestion that milk quotas should be transferred from Scotland to any other country within Great Britain? It is vital that every litre of milk quota allocated to Scotland should stay in Scotland. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to assure us that that will be so.

Mr. Younger: That matter is under consideration, and I shall of course discuss it with my colleagues.

I should like to correct a figure that I gave a few moments ago. The figure for field drainage grant is 50 per cent., not 70 per cent.

Ambulance Service

4. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future of the Scottish ambulance service.

Mr. John MacKay: Last year my Department issued a document inviting views on the present organisation and management structure of the Scottish ambulance service. The comments received are being considered, and the outcome will be announced later.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are great suspicions that the purpose of the consultative document is eventually to hand the service over to private cowboy profiteers, and that considerable pressure is being put on Conservative Back Benchers so that that aim can be achieved? Will he give a categorical assurance that that is not the Government's purpose and that the service will not be handed over to private commercial enterprises, as there is abundant evidence that it is an efficient public enterprise?

Mr. MacKay: The document issued last August discussed whether alterations in the service might improve the service for patients and lead to a more economic and efficient use of resources, especially in the light of the growth of the use of day hospitals and the increasing demands on the ambulance service in running patients to and from day hospitals. Private contractors are already used to a limited extent in some areas for non-emergency routine transport,and there may be scope to extend their use. However, there is no intention at the back of my mind to privatise the whole ambulance service in Scotland, as the hon. Gentleman's fertile imagination suggests.

Mr. Bruce: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that in present circumstances the Scottish ambulace service is chronically under-funded? In my constituency, which has the fastest rate of growth of any part of Britain, new communities which have been asking for ambulance services for years have still not been allocated any. When a road accident occurs, there is sometimes a delay of over an hour before an ambulance arrives. Proposals to close rural maternity hospitals will further increase the strain on the ambulance service, as has the expansion of Aberdeen airport over the past few years. The extra strains have not been adequately supported or funded and there has been no adequate response to representations made.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman should check the facts. Current expenditure allocated for this financial year for the Scottish ambulance service is £24·8 million, compared with £11·3 million in 1978-79, when the Liberal party was keeping the Labour Government in power. We have expanded the ambulance service, which now employes more than 2,000 men and has over 800 vehicles. I accept that there is still some way to go in some aspects of the service, but a particular problem is the increasing number of patients who wish to be transported to day hospitals.

If there is a special problem in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, I should be delighted if he would write to me or speak to the chairman of the Common Service Agency, Sir Simpson Stevenson.

Unemployment

5. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the most recent unemployment figures.

Mr. Younger: Although the total numbers unemployed in Scotland fell in March, the seasonally adjusted trend was less favourable. Scotland is expected to share in the 3·5 per cent. growth forecast for the United Kingdom economy this year, and it is our success in producing and selling which will result in more employment opportunities.

Mr. Millan: Is the Secretary of State aware that the latest figures from Strathclyde show that male unemployment in the Govan and Kinning Park area is now no less than 35 per cent.? Is he further aware that similar figures can be quoted for many other parts of Scotland? In those circumstances, it is quite offensive for the Secretary of State to describe a Budget which will do nothing for Scottish employment as tailor-made for Scotland. If he cannot promise us the major changes in economic policy that are required, can he at least tell us what he is doing about particular threats to jobs in Scotland, such as the 1,000 and more at the British Rail workshops in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) and the jobs at the Rowntree Mackintosh factory at Edinburgh, which are to be transferred to England? What is he doing to save those jobs?

Mr. Younger: I share the right hon. Gentleman's great anxiety about local levels of unemployment in his constituency. That is why his area, which is in the centre of Glasgow, still has the highest priority in Scotland and the highest rates of regional assistance. The right hon. Gentleman will have been as delighted as I was at the Govan shipyard winning a £40 million order for a North sea passenger freight ferry, which will be the biggest passenger ship built on the Clyde for 12 years. The right hon. Gentleman has more reason than most to know how difficult it is to keep businesses competitive when the Government keep putting more impositions on it, such as the Labour Government's decision to impose the national insurance surcharge. Industry in Scotland benefits from the rate revaluation, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will remember it.

Mr. Malone: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the best hope for the unemployed in Scotland is for the climate for industry to become ever more competitive? Has that not been so under the present Government, and does my right hon. Friend agree that that is why there has been so much inward investment in Scotland in the past 12 months?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right. The flood of inward investment—"flood" is the word—in the past 18 months or two years shows clearly that the Government's easing of the burdens on industry is producing results. It is worth remembering how Scottish industry would be faring today if it had still to pay the national insurance surcharge — the tax on jobs — which the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and his party imposed when in office.

Mr. Ron Brown: Is it not a disgrace that many miners have been dismissed, not because they are SS officers or friends of the royals, but because they wanted to defend jobs and living standards? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is important that Jack Kane, the former Lord Provost of Edinburgh, be given a further mandate so that the conciliation service in the industry can take effect? Will the right hon. Gentleman support that as a democratic right?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety. Some of his constituents are probably worried. Employment with the National Coal Board is a matter for the NCB and its employees, according to the normal procedures. If someone feels that he has been treated unfairly, he should apply for an industrial tribunal to hear his case in the normal way.

Mr. Bill Walker: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the level of unemployment in Blairgowrie is now just below that of Dundee, and that whereas Dundee enjoys special status, Blairgowrie does not? We find that, with the recent revaluation, Perthshire and Angus are again required to sustain Dundee. We are looking for some sanity and fairness. Will my right hon. Friend speak to his colleagues about travel-to-work areas, as Pitlochry and Blairgowrie can never be described as travel-to-work areas?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate my hon. Friend's views. There are many places in the country where people would wish to see revisions of the travel-to-work areas. This is always looked at very sympathetically when new evidence is produced.

Mr. Wilson: If the Secretary of State believes in the value of indigenous as well as inward investment, will he be more forthright than his hon. Friends in relation to the Trustee Savings Bank in Scotland, which possesses something like £2·5 billion of assets which, if properly deployed, would be advantageous to the Scottish economy? Will he support the view that the TSB should remain a Scottish institution, in the same way as the Scottish Office gave its support to the Royal Bank of Scotland?

Mr. Younger: As to the events which took place in another place yesterday, the hon. Gentleman cannot expect me to go further, except to say that the Government will consider the results of that decision. As to the TSB Bill, there has been close consultation with everyone concerned for at least two years, and at all points TSB Scotland has made it clear that it favours the arrangements at present in the Bill.

Mr. Canavan: How much more Scottish unemployment will be caused by today's Government statement on privatising the naval dockyards? Is there no limit to this Government's doctrinaire privatisation programme? Can we eventually expect to see the British armed forces sold to Securicor?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman may think that is humourous, but he must have forgotten that the policy of the Labour party is to close down the Trident and Polaris programmes, which means that if there were again to be a Labour Government, which is extremely unlikely, there would be a jobs disaster at both Rosyth and Faslane. The Opposition must face that fact.

Mr. Maclean: For the benefit of those who do not wish to hear, will my right hon. Friend again confirm that the best way to keep down unemployment in Scotland is to ensure the right climate in which industry can compete, by reducing the burdens of national insurance and taxation? Was not the recent Budget one of the best ways of helping to reduce unemployment in Scotland for a long time?

Mr. Younger: I quite agree with my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that the Budget measures were specifically designed to encourage employers to take on new employees, particularly young ones. The extension of youth employment schemes will also be of great benefit to the unemployed. My hon. Friend is also right to point out that the measures that the Government have been taking over a considerable number of years have led to a great increase in confidence. As the latest CBI survey shows, it is expected that 370,000 new jobs will be created in the United Kingdom in 1985. There is no doubt that investment intentions and confidence throughout Scottish industry are now better than in the past.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, with a view to securing employment in the Scottish brewing industry, Scottish and Newcastle Breweries has launched a bid for Matthew Brown pubs and breweries in the north-west of England? Is he aware that Scottish and Newcastle has refused point blank to give any undertakings on both the future of the rural pubs in Cumbria, where 100 are at risk, and on the jobs of those involved in the two breweries in Cumbria? In the light of my protest, will the right hon. Gentleman now go to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and ask that this matter be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission? We do not want the bid to go through.

Mr. Younger: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, but, as he said, this is very much a matter for my right hon. Friend.

Teachers (Pay)

6. Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the Educational Institute for Scotland about salaries.

Mr. Younger: As I indicated in my reply to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 13 March, the general secretary of the Educational Institute for Scotland was present when I met representatives of the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education on 28 January and 15 February 1985. I have had no subsequent approach for a separate meeting, although I stand prepared at any time to discuss matters of mutual concern with the EIS.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, by holding out for an independent inquiry, the teachers have provoked and prolonged this strike? Will he make one more effort to bring them together around the table under the proper negotiating procedures to conclude this issue in order to prevent further hindrance to education for our children and difficulty over examinations?

Mr. Younger: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the EIS is now the only teaching union that is holding out against my suggestion that its real and deeply felt grievances should be considered properly by the joint negotiating committee. I also share my hon. Friend's hope that somehow the EIS may be persuaded to attend discussions to air those grievances. I have made it clear that I am only too willing to help.

Mr. Strang: Does the Secretary of State accept that in our view teachers have an overwhelming case for an independent review? Does he recognise that all the evidence of the last few weeks shows that the teachers are hardening in their determination to advance their just case? Does the Secretary of State further accept that we cannot continue in this way, as it is doing immense damage to our children's education? There is a responsibility on him to come forward with a major new initiative.

Mr. Younger: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's anxiety, which we all share, but he, as a reasonable person, must agree that during this protracted and unnecessary dispute I have continually made it clear that I do not deny the fact that teachers have grievances; nor do I refuse to discuss those grievances with them. One of their unions refuses to discuss the matter through the normal negotiating procedures. That is deplorable, especially as children's education is suffering.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the wide-ranging review within the framework of the SJNC remains on offer to the teachers, and that they have nothing to lose and probably a considerable amount to gain by accepting that offer?

Mr. Younger: I can confirm what my hon. Friend says. I have often made that offer, and I am reluctantly forced to the view that the EIS has rejected it. It is getting more difficult every day to find funds to put the matter right. I am still willing to do my best to help.

Mr. Eadie: Is not the Secretary of State guilty of double standards? He chastises the teachers for not using what he describes as the normal conciliation machinery, yet his Government have refused to allow victimised miners to take advantage of the conciliation machinery which has been established in the mining industry since 1946. If the right hon. Gentleman is so vociferous in supporting normal conciliation machinery, why does he not come to the Dispatch Box and defend the victimised miners' right to practice conciliation and use their consultative machinery?

Mr. Younger: The miners' strike is a completely different subject, and the Government have not done what the hon. Gentleman suggests they did. The matter of dismissed miners is entirely between the Coal Board and its employees. To draw a parallel between the teachers' dispute and the miners' strike is not a happy approach to the problem.

Mrs. McCurley: Does my right hon. Friend agree that although we have often been asked during the dispute to consider the pay standards awarded by Clegg or Houghton, we should consider what the Conservative Government have given to teachers and the increase in teachers' salaries since we came to power in 1979?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is right. As I have stressed in many letters to teachers, it is a myth that teachers' pay has fallen behind the cost of living since 1979—indeed, they have done rather better. It is worth drawing that to their attention, while still agreeing that they may feel that they are overworked. I am only too ready to discuss and to help to solve their problems.

Mr. Ewing: May I make a suggestion to the Secretary of State, which may help him out of the difficulties which he has created for teachers, parents and pupils in Scotland? Does he support the Tory-controlled Lothian regional council in setting up its emergency teaching centres and paying teachers £50 a day to work there? If so, why does he not make the same offer as a basis on which to begin negotiations with the EIS?

Mr. Younger: I have not made such a specific offer as that. I have offered—this cannot be stressed too much—that if the teachers produce within their negotiating committee a package covering pay and conditions of service, I shall consider such a package sympathetically and try to find a way of helping to implement it. As for Lothian education committee, it is responsible for dealing with the education of children in its area, and if it has taken sensible measures to provide some education for children who are deprived of it because of the teachers' strike action, it has the right to do so.

Drugs Control

7. Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with the level of action being taken to curb the trade in hard drugs in Scotland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): Strenuous efforts are being made with considerable success by the police and other agencies to curb traffic in illegal drugs. My right hon. Friend is continuing to give high priority to a range of measures to deal with the serious consequences of drug trafficking.

Mr. Wilson: Although I appreciate the stance that the Government are taking on this matter, I must ask whether they fully realise the nature of the raging epidemic in the use of hard drugs. Is the Minister aware that prevention is the best part of cure, and that only two months ago a Bangladeshi jute liner came into Dundee and was left unattended by the customs service for 24 hours, because, as a result of Government cuts, no customs officers were available in Dundee to deal with it? Does he further realise that two loads of drugs were subsequently found aboard that jute liner? In those circumstances, will he increase the money available to enhance the customs services and the police so that we manage to stop the drugs coming into the country before they do the harm that they can do?

Mr. Ancram: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government are in no way complacent about the drugs problem in Scotland. As he will know, the number of customs officers is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who announced last year that manpower in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise would be increased by 185 posts above the previous planning level. That includes 60 temporary posts, made permanent in 1984, to enhance general preventive controls, and 100 new posts specifically to combat drug smuggling in 1985-86. I understand that the Scottish position will be considered when the deployment of those extra 100 officers is decided.

Mr. Fairbairn: In addition to all attempts to prevent the trade in hard drugs, will my hon. Friend give the widest publicity to the harm caused by soft drugs, which are not only extremely harmful in themselves but which usually lead to an escalation of abuse into the devastating area of hard drugs?

Mr. Ancram: The Government believe that so-called soft drugs are harmful in themselves and often lead to the use of hard drugs. The Government will be taking the appropriate action to prevent those drugs, as well has hard drugs, from being used.

Mr. Craigen: As prevention is better than cure in this area, is the Minister satisfied that there are adequate links among all police authorities in Scotland and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise? Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Scotland has a word with the Prime Minister about giving the tackling of the drug problem a higher political priority than it has now, especially as the Prime Minister's social and economic policies tend to encourage this misuse?

Mr. Ancram: To deal with the hon. Gentleman's last question first, I do not know on what basis he makes that assertion. He will remember that in the late 1960s and early 1970s, when employment was high, there was an increase in drug misuse. In countries such as Holland and Switzerland, which have high employment, drug abuse is a serious problem. I accept that intelligence and co-ordination are important, and we work constantly to improve them. Indeed, six of the eight police forces in Scotland have specialist drug squads, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider sympathetically requests from police authorities for increased complements to deal with drug abuse.

Regional Policy

8. Mr. Malone asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from Grampian regional council concerning the effects of regional policy on employment in the Grampian region.

Mr. Allan Stewart: None directly, although I am aware of representations that the council has made to the Department of Trade and Industry on this subject.

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend will be aware that there is some concern that jobs are being poached from Grampian region by other areas in Scotland which receive assistance. Can he confirm that the Scottish Development Agency office in Aberdeen, which has been accused of poaching these jobs, has done no such thing? Secondly, can he confirm that that office has been instrumental in attracting substantial amounts of investment and industry into the north-east of Scotland?

Mr. Stewart: I can confirm that the SDA has denied allegations of poaching, and I pay tribute to its success in the north-east since opening the Aberdeen office. The agency has committed assistance to a variety of projects in the north-east, to the value of almost £8 million.

Teachers (Dispute)

9. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received about the Scottish teachers' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since October 1984 to 12 April some 4,000. As my right hon. Friend told the House earlier, a very reasonable way forward is through discussion within the Scottish Joint Negotiating Committee for Teaching Staff in School Education. The teachers' employers, the Scottish Secondary Teachers' Association and the Professional Association of Teachers would all be prepared to begin discussions on that basis, but the Educational Institute of Scotland is proving a stumbling block.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Minister withdraw his ill-informed, outrageous and downright provacative circular calling for striking teachers to be sacked? Instead of looking around for scapegoats, is it not high time that the Government accepted full responsibility for the crisis in Scottish education and agreed to the setting up of an independent review of teachers' salaries, which is a reasonable and legitimate demand supported by a majority of Scottish teachers, parents and Members of Parliament? There are a few notable exceptions, such as the Tory Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), and his boss, the governor-general there, who is still sufferyng from the effects of educational deprivation at Winchester.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member is a former member of the EIS——

Mr. Canavan: I am still a fully paid up member.

Mr. Stewart: Whether the hon. Gentleman is an advertisement for the Scottish teaching profession is for others to judge. I am not surprised that he is giving full support to the trade union which has taken the unprecedented action of the targeting of schools in the constituencies of Scottish Conservative Members, an action which no other trade union has yet taken. I should have thought that Labour Members should pay more attention to the position taken by other trade unions. Everybody involved in this dispute is prepared to negotiate, except the EIS.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend share the widespread disappointment that the teaching unions are not prepared to participate in discussions about performance-related pay, as this would provide a possible way forward and could be helpful in negotiations? Is he suggesting that the unions look at this as a possible way out of the problem?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is referring to the issues that have been raised in England. In Scotland, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has suggested a review of pay and conditions of service through the existing negotiating machinery. He has said that if an attractive package results he would be prepared to re-order his public expenditure priorities within the Scottish block. That offer has not been made to any other group of public sector employees.

Mr. Maxton: Why does the Minister not recognise that the teachers, and the EIS in particular, might be prepared to consider the offer if the Secretary of State were to make it clear that he would guarantee any increase agreed by the negotiating machinery? Secondly, is he aware that the teachers do not trust the management side because they know that it consists of the Secretary of State and no one else, and therefore is not independent?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The management side of the SJNC consists in the main of representatives of the education authorities, with only a small minority of representatives of the Secretary of State. I believe that the offer made by my right hon. Friend is entirely fair and reasonable. It is regarded by the management as acceptable, as it has been for some time, and by two of the other unions. By continuing its action the EIS is doing harm to pupils and doing the teachers' case and prospects no good.

Rating System

10. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration is being given to the reform of the rating system; and if he will make a statement.

13. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had urging reform of the domestic rating system.

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply of 14 March last about reform of the rating system. But I would add in response to my hon. Friend that the great majority of some 9,000 representations of various kinds which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have received about rates and revaluation have also urged reform of the domestic rating system.

Mr. Brown: As I do not carry in my head the hon. Gentleman's reply in March, perhaps he will confirm that the Government have not ruled out further assistance in the short term to domestic ratepayers and the consideration even of selective assistance to commercial ratepayers. If they have not ruled out those possibilities, when will they make a statement about them, and will they make sure that the bill is picked up by the Government?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman knows that domestic rate relief has been increased from £14 million to £102 million and that £88 million more was put into domestic relief last year. He also knows that the adverse effect of revaluation on domestic ratepayers was some £90 million. Although, obviously, there are variations within any sector of revaluation, the effects of revaluation in the domestic sector have been largely met by the increase that has been made in domestic rate relief. I am concerned about the serious effects on some commercial enterprises. Again, there are others that have gained from the revaluation. There is at present no statutory machinery for helping those who have been affected adversely.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a widespread desire in Scotland for a change in the rating system, which all reasonable people accept is an unfair system of raising local government revenue? Will he confirm that it is only the Conservative party that has the political will to change the rating system?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. As he knows, the Conservative party has never been happy with the domestic rating system. Last October a review was set up at ministerial level to look at the system of financing local government. The purpose of the review is to see whether a fairer, simpler and more stable system of local government financing can be found which will strengthen the accountability of local authorities while maintaining a reasonable balance between the interests of central and local government. The review is covering alternatives to domestic rating. It is also concerned with businesses which at present pay rates but do not have a corresponding voice in local government elections. It is too early to predict the outcome of these considerations.

Mr. Dewar: In respect of the commercial ratepayer, the Minister has managed to give the impression that the only factor stopping help for at least those hardest hit is the lack of any statutory machinery for doing so. May I assure him that, if he wishes to create that statutory machinery, the Opposition will give it every facility and will speed it through the House? Therefore, will he say whether he intends to move in that direction?

As for domestic rating relief, I expect that the hon. Gentleman is aware that, in correspondence with me, his right hon. Friend has said that he cannot give an assurance that the present level of domestic rating relief will be held at the current level through the rest of the quinquennium. Will he reconsider that and assure us that, while there may be negotiations about the level, it will not fall below the present 8p during the remainder of the five-year period for which the present revaluation runs? If he cannot, the domestic ratepayer will have to bear a greater and greater burden.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman is asking for confirmation of decisions which are not taken at this time of the year. As he knows, those decisions are taken at the appropriate time of the year. Obviously, we shall consider the position that the hon. Gentleman outlined in his question. We appreciate the fact that there are commercial enterprises which have been very hard hit by the revaluation. The House should not forget, however, that a large number of commercial enterprises have gained substantially as a result of the revaluation.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: Can the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State give us his explanation of this paradox? According to Scottish Office figures, the average rates per household are somewhat lower in Scotland than in England. None the less, it is a perceived fact that rates in Scotland, property for property, and specifically in the west end of Glasgow, are much higher than comparable rates in England.

Mr. Ancram: I think that the right hon. Gentleman is aware that ratepayers are not confined to the west end of Glasgow or, indeed, to constituencies such as mine. Council house tenants are ratepayers as well. Obviously, the preponderance of council houses in Scotland affects the figures. It would be surprising if the right hon. Gentleman were to say that we should not take council housing into account in compiling these figures.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Crime Statistics

34. Mr. Hirst asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many people in the Strathclyde region were charged with serious offences in 1984; and how this figure compares with those of the previous five years.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): Taking serious offences as those prosecuted under solemn procedure, 2,287 persons were prosecuted in this way in Strathclyde region in 1984. This compares with figures of 2,297 in 1983, 2,531 in 1982, 1,774 in 1981, 2,369 in 1980 and 1,711 in 1979. Industrial action by sheriff clerks' staff in 1979 and 1981 is likely to have affected the figures for those years and for 1980 and 1982.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the disquieting extent of serious crime in Strathclyde is such that it is highly irresponsible for Strathclyde regional council to refuse to bring up police numbers to establishment strength? Will my hon. and learned Friend and his ministerial colleagues use all their influence to persuade Strathclyde regional council to employ more policemen and get them back on the beat?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Nothing in the crime figures for Strathclyde that I have given would justify any decision to withhold officers from the police force in Strathclyde. Last year the chief constable of Strathclyde took a number of important initiatives in crime prevention, especially in the areas of worst deprivation. I should have thought that the regional authority would want to give every possible encouragement to those initiatives.

Procurators Fiscal

35. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many times during the last 10 years his Department has requested or instructed a procurator fiscal to move to a new post.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: During the past 10 years, four procurators fiscal, after discussion, were requested to relinquish their commissions granted under the provisions of the Sheriff Courts and Legal Officers (Scotland) Act 1927 and moved to other legal posts in the procurator fiscal service.

Mr. Walker: My hon. and learned Friend will be aware that the procurators fiscal are concerned about the pending legislation, which they see as something that will substantially erode their independence. Can he assure the House that when the legislation reaches the statute book it will not achieve that purpose?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It is intended by the proposal in the Bill to provide greater efficiency in the administration within the procurator fiscal service. Neither the Lord Advocate nor I have any oblique or sinister motive in introducing this change. We very much prize the independence that is enjoyed by procurators fiscal in Scotland. The last thing that we would want to do is to impinge in any way upon the integrity for which procurators fiscal are rightly renowned.

Mr. Donald Stewart: The hon. and learned Gentleman said that neither he nor the Lord Advocate had any oblique or sinister intention with regard to the legislation before the House. As the hon. and learned Gentleman is satisfied that the position of the procurators fiscal should be maintained, why is it necessary to make any change in the law? Is it not better to quieten all the doubts of the procurators fiscal by leaving matters as they stand?

The Solicitor-General For Scotland: The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that in Scotland the procurator fiscal enjoys a position of considerable independence, in particular with regard to the police forces and the general public. However, for many years he has been answerable for his actions to the Lord Advocate. All that is sought to be achieved by the change is to make an improvement in the administration and organisation. As the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate, for example, someone who is a fiscal in Stornaway will have far fewer responsibilities than a fiscal in Glasgow. We are seeking this additional power to enable there to be smooth administration.

Heavy Lorries (Traffic Offences)

36. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions there have been in the last 12 months in relation to traffic offences by heavy lorries; and what are the comparative figures for the previous 12 months.

38. Mr. Maxton asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions there have been in the past 12 months for speeding offences by heavy lorries; and what are the comparative figures for the previous 12 months.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Statistics giving the number of prosecutions for traffic offences committed in respect of heavy lorries only are not kept.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Solicitor-General explain why there was selective administration of law and order during the miners' strike? According to the information that he gave me, none of the cowboy coal convoys were convicted of speeding or dangerous driving, despite evidence submitted that those offences were taking place. Will he give an assurance that that will not happen in the future, in particular in relation to the Yuill and Dodds lorries, which got the South of Scotland Electricity Board contract by a dubious procedure, and which are careering——

Mr. Hirst: Say that outside.

Mr. Foulkes: I will. They are careering across the roads of Strathclyde, breaking them up and breaking the law. What action will the Solicitor-General take about those cowboys?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Gentleman reveals what I have always suspected. He believes that the prosecution system should be used for political purposes. That is a principle which I completely reject. There are proceedings pending with regard to one of the lorries of the firm to which he referred. For the usual and obvious reasons, I make no further comment on that case.

Mr. Maxton: How can the Solicitor-General claim that he represents the party of law and order when it is clear that during the whole of the miners' strike the lorry drivers of those companies operating in and out of Ravenscraig, on the roads in Lanarkshire—I witnessed this on several occasions—were clearly acting in the belief that they could do so outside the traffic law without expectation of prosecution? The Solicitor-General should come to the House and give us those figures. They should be available. It should not be impossible to obtain them. They would show that few of those drivers were prosecuted.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Once again, the hon. Gentleman shows that he wants to introduce a political element into prosecutions. He expects me to be able to identify those cases in which there is a political element. I cannot do that, and I would never seek to do that. I have made inquiries, as I said to his hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), and a number of prosecutions are pending. In those circumstances, it is best for me to leave the matter until they have been heard before the court. If he says, as he has in the Chamber, that he has witnessed something, I wish that he would go and see the procurator fiscal and provide his evidence of those incidents.

Mr. Maxton: I could not see the number plates. They were covered in mud.

Mr. Buchan: The Solicitor-General is prevaricating dangerously for someone—[Interruption.] We are not asking for political prosecutions. We are——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must ask a question.

Mr. Buchan: Is the Solicitor-General aware that we are not asking for political prosecutions? On the contrary, he says that he cannot identify lorries which have been stopped, sometimes charged, but not prosecuted. It is there that the political non-prosecution is taking place. We have already had promises that those deliveries will stop. We are now told that they will continue. Yuill and Dodds will deliver 8,000 tonnes a week, despite the way in which the contract was made. Will he tell his right hon. Friend that the chairman of British Steel told me that no such contract would be made, and yet it has been made? The Government are guilty of political involvement—[Interruption.]—in relation to their legal behaviour and their industrial behaviour during the strike.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have already answered a question about the independence of the procurators fiscal in Scotland. In essence, the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that one or more of the procurators fiscal in Scotland have exercised a political judgment rather than a judgment of integrity in taking prosecution decisions. That is simply not the case.

There is at present a civil case, involving Kilmarnock and Loudoun district council, before the sheriff court in Kilmarnock. If there are any suggestions of political involvement, they will be revealed by the outcome of that case rather than by any decisions taken by procurators fiscal anywhere in Scotland.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does it arise from the events of yesterday? If so, I am prepared to take it after the statement.

Mr. Madden: I am most grateful.

Royal Dockyards

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Heseltine): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the future arrangements for the royal dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth.

The royal dockyards employ some 20,000 people. Their turnover is £400 million a year. They repair all of our nuclear-powered submarines, including the Polaris force, and nearly 80 per cent. of our conventional warship fleet.

As the House is aware, there has over the years been a succession of studies and reports on the future of the dockyards. Those reports generally agreed that change was essential, but all previous attempts to introduce a changed structure have come to nothing.

The Government believe that it is essential to get full value for money from the defence budget. If we are to achieve that in the dockyards, three main conditions need to be met. First, local managers must have the freedom and authority to manage in a more competitive environment. Second, the dockyards, as suppliers of services to the fleet, must be separated clearly from their customer. Third, their financial and accounting arrangements must reflect normal commercial practice, so that the true price of the work can be properly judged.

I am today issuing an open government document, copies of which I have placed in the Library, and a consultative document to explain to those who work in the dockyards the likely consequences of change. I am not today announcing a decision on the way forward, but I am opening a period of consultation. I hope that there will be a wide, constructive and fruitful discussion over the next two or three months. My intention is to announce to the House a clear way forward before the summer recess.

The main options for change range from the creation of a trading fund to full-scale privatisation. Although it would be possible to achieve some improvements within the strategy of a trading fund within the public sector, that would not give the enterprise sufficient freedom from Civil Service constraints for it to operate efficiently in a competitive environment. The options which would provide that freedom are full privatisation or a system of commercial management under which each dockyard, while remaining in Government ownership, would be operated for a period of years by a company chosen by the Government following an open competitive process. Under either of those options the Government would insist that control remained in British hands.

It is the option of commercial management that seems to the Government to be the best way forward, since it secures continuing competition while maintaining control over the national strategic assets involved. It would require legislation. That option, like full privatisation, also offers the prospect of outside work for the dockyards from customers other than the Ministry of Defence. If implemented, we could therefore look forward to a tauter, more flourishing enterprise.

The House will recall the many successful transfers to the private sector from the public sector achieved by the Government. In all those cases the rights of employees have been protected. Similar protection would form part of a move to the private sector should the Government choose that option.

Whatever the new framework for the longer term, there is an inescapable need for adjustments to the work force in the short term in order to improve dockyard efficiency. Management will be discussing the way forward with the unions involved, starting today. The package of efficiency measures it will be looking for may involve job reductions at Devonport of about 15 per cent. and at Rosyth of about 5 per cent. Natural wastage and voluntary retirement can be expected to achieve most of the reductions sought by management, particularly at Rosyth. Compulsory redundancy will be used only in the last resort.

My Department, as would any good employer, will do all that it can to alleviate the effects of the new efficiency measures; particularly it will consider how new business and employment opportunities in these areas might be fostered, including work in support of the new dockyard organisation. I intend to ask my hon. Friend, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement, to take a particular interest in co-ordinating the efforts required in this positive approach.

These two dockyards have served the Royal Navy and the nation loyally for many generations. I wish to stress that under this Government their long-term future is assured. But in giving this assurance, and recognising the significance of the yards to their local economies, I must also expect them to be run to proper levels of efficiency. I believe that the House will accept that there is a broad agreement that change in the management of the dockyards is needed now.

I hope that all concerned will join constructively in the consultation process to assist the Government in the decisions that need to be taken. Once the difficult but short-period of adjustment has been completed there will be considerable opportunities for expansion and enterprise.

I will do all I can to bring about these new opportunities.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): In effect, the Secretary of State's proposal will privatise the work of the royal dockyards, because the consultation exercise is completely cosmetic and a farce. This is another piece of the ideological nonsense that we get from a Government who are more concerned with their own prejudices and dogmas than with objective analyses and rational judgment. We believe that the privatisation proposal, for that is what it is, will be bad for the Royal Navy, for its ships and for those who sail in them. The proposal will be bad for those loyal workers who have worked in the dockyards; 2,000 or more will lose their jobs from today onwards, even before privatisation. At the end of the day the proposal will also be bad for the taxpayer, who will pay more for running the dockyards.

Is the Secretary of State aware that the most hairbrained proposal of all is that contained in the report by Mr. Peter Levene? That is the proposal that the Secretary of State favours and that will be carried out—consultation or otherwise. Under that scheme the dockyards will be franchised for a period of four, five, six or seven years. The system of franchising may be suitable for a fast food burger bar, but it is totally unsuitable for the refitting and repair of the frigates and submarines of the Royal Navy.

The Secretary of State has mentioned the number of reports that have been published in the past on the dockyards. Is he aware that Sir John Mallabar's report, which contrasts sharply in expertise and substance with the flimsy six-page, amateurish report that he got from Mr. Peter Levene, came to the conclusion that the franchise option is "the way to get the worst of all worlds"?

Has the Secretary of State not taken any notice of the Mallabar report, the Speed report and other reports that have condemned the system he wants to operate?

Can the Secretary of State confirm that under the franchise arrangement there will have to be a cost-plus contract so that, because of the extra money that will have to be paid to private contractors for doing work which was not programmed and for doing operational repairs, it will cost more at the end of the day to operate the royal dockyards than it is costing at the moment?

These privatisation proposals will make things worse rather than better. They are not worth the upheaval that will be involved. That is why we shall oppose them by all legitimate means both inside and outside the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Miss Janet Fookes. Sorry, Mr. Heseltine.

Mr. Heseltine: I share your view, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that a reply is hardly needed, but perhaps I may trespass on the time of the House for a moment.

The response of the right hon. Gentleman is understandable, particularly because he patently has not understood the nature of the proposals that I am putting forward. If I answer his third question first, the difficulty he is in will be clear to all because the answer is, no, the contract will not be a cost-plus contract. It will be as a result of competitive tendering for the bulk of the work that will be carried out by whoever manages the operation. The fact is that there are international precedents for large organisations involved in defence being managed under this system—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"] In the United States of America. [HON. MEMBERS: "Tell us the details."] Oh, certainly. Let me give the House some details if it would help. In the United States of America, the naval industrial reserve ordnance plant in California is operated for the United States navy by General Dynamics, and about 8,000 people are employed. The Louisa army tank centre at Louisa, Ohio is operated for the United States army by General Dynamics, and about 3,000 people are involved. Therefore, I give the House just two examples. The proposal is based upon American experience. I see no reason why we should not gain from it here. I think that the House will realise that the right hon. Gentleman does not have the first idea of how this scheme works out. We are in the process of consulting to see which is the preferred solution. That is the purpose of today's initiative.

I come back to the right hon. Gentleman's first charge, that we were motivated by prejudice and dogma. I think that the House will want to judge the validity of such an assumption when it is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, upon being elected to this job, if ever he got it, to remove some 2,000 to 3,000 jobs in Rosyth as part of the process of getting rid of Britain's independent nuclear deterrent. If that is not an example of prejudice and bigotry, I do not know what is.

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): While I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's confirmation that there is a long-term future for the dockyard I can only view with dismay the short-term decision, which will involve the shedding of jobs. Will my right hon. Friend spell out clearly, and not with general Government waffle, precisely what is involved and what steps will be taken to alleviate the situation for those who find their job prospects reduced?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend who, I know, will take a considerable interest in the position of her constituents and ensure that the Government do all that they properly can to help with the short-term problems that we shall have to face in that area. Today the unions are having their first meeting with the local management, because it is absolutely critical that the negotiations should proceed at local level between unions and management. The broad outline of the efficiency gains that the management believes to be possible will be put to the unions, and a consultative process will take place. Over the course of perhaps two years we see the opportunities for efficiency gains, which could reduce the present job levels in the Devonport dockyard by some 15 per cent., but one's experience of such a process — [HON. MEMBERS: "How many?"] That would be something in the order of about 2,000. From experience of the momentum that has to be achieved in gaining that efficiency, I hope that a relatively small proportion of that number will be brought about as a result of compulsory redundancy. Our own experience would tell us that natural wastage and voluntary retirement will probably account for a significant majority of the efficiency gains that we have to achieve.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Is the Secretary of State aware that after all the fine tributes to the dockyards during the Falklands campaign, the sense of betrayal as a result of the proposals will be very deep indeed? Will the right hon. Gentleman show to the House that he will take the consultative procedure seriously by at least agreeing to extend it to six months? Two to three months to give a city such as Plymouth the opportunity to put forward alternative proposals is totally inadequate, particularly because the agency proposal and the franchising, which seems to be the Government's most favoured option, is one that many people believe to be complete nonsense, and will not give job security. With regard to the 2,000 people in Devonport who will lose their jobs in the short term, what does the right hon. Gentleman mean by the short term? Is it 12 or 18 months? They must be told exactly what the period is. How are the losses to be spread over the two years? How is the redundancy to be spread over this two-year period? Will it happen immediately or steadily? Can the Secretary of State assure us that the consultation procedure will be lengthened?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman did not hear what I said. I made it quite clear that we are talking about a two-year period. That is naturally the case if one is referring to natural wastage playing a significant part in the adjustments that have to be made. I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that he wants about lengthening the consultation period. He knows that I have had lengthy discussions with the unions in both Devonport and Rosyth. The original idea was leaked out of my Department about a year ago and has been the subject of widespread discussions ever since. As the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said, so was the Levene report. Therefore, the idea that I am saying something today that has not been considered already is carrying language to an extremity. People's attitudes have been very clearly prepared for my announcement. Of course the consultation period will be taken seriously. We have already begun the discussions, which I believe to be important, but there is no point in spinning it out and avoiding difficult decisions in the way that, in the context of the dockyards, we have done for far too long. We have genuinely paid a great tribute to the dockyards for the way in which they respond classically whenever a crisis faces this country, but in paying that tribute we did not mean to single them out from the very large numbers of people in the private sector who respond in exactly the same way. While one admires and places great reliance upon the dockyards, one cannot escape the harsh reality that absenteeism in the dockyards accounts, on average, for every person employed there, for four working weeks a year. That is about 40 per cent. above the national average.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): We get 16 weeks here.

Mr. Keith Speed (Ashford): Would my right hon. Friend agree that the first priority must be the standard of service to the Royal Navy, as Operation Corporate proved? Secondly, will my right hon. Friend agree that, as applied to a large industrial organisation, the Civil Service rules are the real enemy and that there are other ways of overcoming this problem, apart from franchising, as I believe my report showed? May I say, in parenthesis, that I am not sure that the present relationship between the Pentagon and General Dynamics is the most happy one.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend knows a great deal about this matter and has considered it very carefully. I have looked at my hon. Friend's report and have considered the matter again. We are considering the options on a wider basis. My hon. Friend has put his finger right on the heart of the matter. Within the constraints of the public sector great inhibitions are placed upon the individual and free management that we believe a proper enterprise demands. The trading fund goes only half-way towards the much more open and free environment of a proper commercial operation. We accept that a trading fund could result in certain benefits but it would achieve nothing like all the benefits that we should like to consider as options.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline): Does not the right hon. Gentleman concede that he has today announced over 3,000 redundancies? Having given the numbers employed in the yards, and their turnover, will he say what value the Government place on these vital public assets? The Secretary of State referred to the experience in the United States, but does he not concede that Secretary of the Navy Lehman is presiding over a 700 ship fleet, whereas the Secretary of State and his other Ministers are presiding over the demise of the British surface fleet? Because of Trident he is concentrating on a programme that completely undermines our defence budget and defence potential. Will not the Secretary of State concede that this is the result of the misguided, stupid defence posture of Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Heseltine: I am sure that the hon. Member will want to go and tell them that in Scotland to justify the threat of the loss of 2,000 to 3,000 jobs in Rosyth if the Labour party ever come to power again in this country.

Mr. Douglas: We will go to Rosyth together, then.

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Member will make his case and I shall make mine. The decision will have to be made with full consultation. I have been to Rosyth to discuss these matters. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement is in Rosyth today and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement is in Plymouth today to try to deal with the initial questions, which rightly concern those areas. We shall keep very closely in touch, but the people of Rosyth must clearly understand that I am offering to them a long-term, secure future. The Opposition are offering a devastating blow by the destruction of the major job opportunities in the area.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that probably the most important issue is to ensure that the Royal Navy remains the best-equipped in the world for its size? Is he satisfied that his proposals will achieve that? Does he agree that fairness to the taxpayer is also appropriate and that many of us are not convinced that the organisation of the dockyards in the past has provided that?

Mr. Heseltine: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. The document is supported by the Admiralty Board, which is as concerned as we are to achieve change because it realises that the defence budget ultimately bears the excess cost of managing the dockyards under the present regime and it wishes to achieve the best possible value for money. I believe that I can therefore give an assurance that the Royal Navy will be supportive, and has been supportive so far, of the Government's preferred solution in the open government document.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Can 8,000 loyal and dedicated workers at Rosyth be expected to entrust their future, the future of their dockyard and responsibility for the nation's defences, including our independent deterrent, to privatisation proposals which are dogmatic, unworkable and seek to subordinate the interests of national security to those of commercial gain? Are not these the disreputable plans of a discredited adviser who spent much of the year before this announcement hawking the royal dockyards around his friends in the private sector? Will the Secretary of State confirm that the United States dockyards are in the public sector and tell us how many jobs in the public service will be lost at Rosyth while he is providing for his private friends in the City?

Mr. Heseltine: I deeply deplore the scurrilous language used about Peter Levene, who has joined the Department as Chief of Defence Procurement. An extraordinary thing about this country is that although everyone knows that there is an urgent need to bring more industrial expertise into the management of public affairs the moment we do so the entire Labour party tries to diminish the endeavour. It is my responsibility to achieve value for money from the defence budget and I believe that Mr. Levene will play a major role in ensuring that. It is nothing short of hypocrisy for Labour Members to talk about job losses when they intend to cancel between 2,000 and 3,000 jobs at Rosyth if they ever return to Government.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the loss of 2,000 real jobs in the Plymouth and East Cornwall area is extremely distressing? Will he confirm that under any arrangements to introduce private management the existing work force will retain the present conditions of service? Secondly, will my right hon. Friend elaborate on the procedures that will apply to allow local firms to acquire increased dockyard procurement in the future?

Mr. Heseltine: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that he will wish to take a deep and continuing interest in our efforts in that area. I think that I can help him on both questions. First, there is now wide experience of the successful transfer of employees from the public to the private sector. Where this has occurred, the Government have broadly ensured that the conditions of service have been maintained. It is our intention to ensure that that is the case if we proceed in the way that the preferred solution suggests. As for our interest in creating opportunities for further employment, I have already been in touch with the leaders of the two largest authorities in the area—Devon and Cornwall county councils—and asked them to join my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State in a concerted effort to use whatever powers we have at the Ministry of Defence to counter the initial job reductions that the efficiency gains demand.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): There is a smell of horse dung about this statement. The Secretary of State is the greatest supporter of cowboys and similar forms of enterprise and he wants to apply the idea to the dockyards. The Secretary of State is also a great supporter of the ballot idea. Would it not be better and more democratic to put the matter to the vote and ask those involved in the dockyards to register their view of the Secretary of State's proposals? That is the democratic process for which the Government argued during the miners' strike. Why not put it to the test and see what the result is?

Mr. Heseltine: The whole House will be fascinated to see a sudden conversion to genuine democracy in the ranks of the unions. I assure the hon. Gentleman that any Government proposals will certainly be put to the vote. They will be put to the vote in this House, where democracy is of central importance.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he has no proposals to extend his suggestions beyond the royal dockyards to include the fleet maintenance base at Portsmouth, which has already made quite sufficient sacrifices in the cause of further economies?

Mr. Heseltine: I fully understand my hon. Friend's concern. I realise the importance of the fleet maintenance bases. They are not included in my proposals.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Are not the 20,000 workers to whom the Secretary of State referred loyal workers, many of whom have dedicated their whole working lives to these industries? The right hon. Gentleman spoke of two or three months for consultations. Is not that too short a time? Several trade unions are involved and people's livelihoods are at stake. Can the right hon. Gentleman assure us that, under the new regime, after privatisation, the protection rights and working conditions of the workers will be as good as those that they expect to enjoy today?

Mr. Heseltine: As I have said, whenever we have transferred employees from the public to the private sector we have done so on broadly comparable terms of employment. We would adopt the same approach in the context of any change in the royal dockyards. As I told the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), I do not accept that there is a need to lengthen the consultation period. The matter has been the subject of intense debate in the dockyards for many months.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his courage in tackling a problem of inefficiency and outrage that has been connived at by Governments of all parties for many years, whereby a skilled work force has been held under by Civil Service constraints and union stubbornness? The work force at Rosyth will now have a great opportunity to exercise its skill and efficiency and to obtain other work which, unhappily, is at present going abroad?

Mr. Heseltine: I am the first to agree that large numbers of people in the dockyards have shown great loyalty and devotion in the defence endeavour, but the same spirit has been shown by equivalent people in the private sector. I cannot ignore the fact that there are significant inefficiencies and overmanning in the dockyards, and I cannot accept that that should be a permanent charge to the defence budget. I believe that if the dockyards can adopt a commercial approach there are job opportunities there that will be of significant benefit to the local economies. I and my ministerial colleagues are determined to make every effort to adopt a positive attitude, as a good employer should, to the benefit of the local communities.

Mr. Skinner: Does not the Secretary of State have a downright cheek when he talks to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) about lack of patriotism? When the right hon. Gentleman was in the Army, he could not get his Army jacket off fast enough. He bought himself out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Dockyards.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am coming to that. Will the right hon. Gentleman give a guarantee to the millions of people who will want to hear an unequivocal statement from him today that when the proposals are implemented and the selling off takes place, no foreign influence or money will be involved in it? Many people would like to know the answer to that.

Mr. Heseltine: But the hon. Member will realise that anyone who listened to what I said heard me make it clear that it will remain in British control.

Mr. Skinner: Ah, but that is not the same.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My right hon. Friend will be aware that there are many people in the Rosyth dockyard who have been deeply anxious for a long time about the risk to their jobs of policies that envisage the dismantling of our independent nuclear force. The welcome that has been given to my right hon. Friend's proposals will be qualified because they are worried about change, but people are always worried about change. Will my right hon. Friend assure those workers that the Ministry of Defence has experience of purchasing services from the private sector on a vast scale? That is true of aircraft, on which the Ministry spends huge sums of money on sophisticated and secret equipment. The private sector does research on and tends to such equipment, so there is no risk to security and the service is of a high standard.

Mr. Heseltine: My hon. Friend is at the centre of the matter. The defence budget draws great support from the public and the private sector. The loyalty, dedication and skills in both are of the highest. As my hon. Friend rightly said, the central issue is not whether the dockyards have a future, because I have assured them that they have one under this Government. Rosyth cannot say the same under a Labour Government because a significant part of its capability would then be cancelled and destroyed.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Secretary of State agree that it is pure humbug for the Labour party to claim to be concerned about the future of Rosyth when its policies would virtually wipe out Rosyth's activities? Does he further agree that to dismiss the proposal of my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) that consultations be extended to six months because there have been many unofficial unauthenticated leaks from his Ministry is not good enough and makes his proposal for a two-month consultation period a mere sham?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman is repeating a question that I have already answered. I do not believe that it is a sham. The issues are well understood throughout all of the dockyard areas. The Rosyth dockyard people produced their alternative report before my proposals were published. Of course it does not agree with my proposals, but the idea that they need more time to think about the matter when they have already produced a report including their preferred solution is not realistic. The essence of the proposal that I have made today is that we should make up our minds and address something that has been neglected for far too long.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Does "remain in British control" mean that as much as 49 per cent. of the equity could be owned by overseas interests?

Mr. Heseltine: The hon. Gentleman knows that there are many ways in which to secure control of a company. I would not tell the House that I have worked out the precise mechanism. I can only say that there is a quite clear commitment that the control of the company will remain firmly in British hands.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): The Secretary of State has told us that there is still a considerable amount of work to be done—his last answer shows that. If the dockyard unions at Rosyth raise problems because of the deep studies that they have already made, will he be prepared, if necessary, to extend the consultation time beyond three months? How many jobs will be lost at Rosyth in addition to the 2,000 which will be lost at Plymouth? He has not yet made that clear today. Will he bear in mind that the American naval dockyard system operates under a trading account and that Secretary of State Weinberger has ceased any business with the General Dynamics Corporation because of excessive profiteering by that firm in other areas of defence procurement? We shall need to discuss this matter at greater length soon. Will he take the issue up with the Leader of the House to ensure an early and long debate?

Mr. Heseltine: The Opposition parties are never short of opportunities to raise matters in the House if they want to. My right hon. Friend the leader of the House has heard what the hon. Gentleman said and if, through the usual channels, the Opposition want to pursue this matter, I am sure that they will do so, as is usual. I can add nothing to the clear view that the consultation period should end before the House rises for the summer recess. The issues are understood clearly, especially in the dockyards. They have faced us for a long time. We have now entered a period of formal consultation, but the dialogue has been going on for many months. As for the number of job losses at Rosyth, I mentioned 5 per cent. in my statement. That probably represents about 500. I would not expect there to be any compulsory redundancies, as we should be able to achieve that figure through natural wastage and voluntary retirement, and that is before any additional opportunities materialise.

Adjournment Debates (Speeches)

4.6 pm

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My point of order concerns last night's Adjournment debate, which was initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) and the rules relating to that precious half hour of Adjournment time at the end of our proceedings.

It is ironic that the debate was about the denial of freedom of speech to Raymond Honeyford, who is a Bradford teacher. Because he is my constituent, my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley was kind enough to say that he would allow me to speak briefly. I wrote to him before the debate. Because our proceedings were constantly interrupted with spurious points of order from the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), aided and abetted by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), I was denied an opportunity to speak on behalf of my constituent and, more importantly, the House and my constituent were denied the opportunity of a ministerial reply to what my hon. Friend had said.

This is a most dangerous precedent. As the protector of Back Bench rights, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I ask you to confirm two things: first, that the Adjournment is personal to the hon. Member who raises it and that other hon. Members speak at his discretion; secondly, that the behaviour of the hon. Member for Bradford, West denied my constituent a ministerial response and was a flagrant and disgraceful abuse of the procedures of the House.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): On the same point?

Mr. Madden: Yes, Sir. I regret having to burden you with this point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, especially as you were not in the Chair when these unfortunate proceedings took place. The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) initiated an Adjournment debate last night about a head teacher who is not his constituent but, as you have heard, a constituent of the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg). The hon. Member for Shipley made an extremely provocative and partisan speech concerning parents, who are my constituents, whose children go to a school which is in my constituency.

I wrote to the hon. Member for Shipley and the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science who was to reply asking that I might speak to explain why a majority of parents with children at the school have lost confidence in the headmaster as a result of a string of insults and abuse that he has levelled at them in a series of newspaper articles. The hon. Member for Shipley claims the right of freedom of speech for those who agree with him but is most anxious to deny that right to those of us who disagree with him.

I feel especially resentful as, last year, when I initiated an Adjournment debate about the closure of a hospital in my constituency, which closure had consequences for the Shipley constituency, I readily allowed the hon. Member for Shipley to speak at some length although he never wrote to me or contacted me to seek my permission. I am afraid that, mistakenly, I expected him to extend the same courtesy to me last night.

You will agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this place relies heavily on good will. I am sure that many colleagues on both sides of the House agree that that good will will evaporate very quickly if many hon. Members follow the disgraceful example set last night by the hon. Member for Shipley and initiate debates on controversial issues which concern institutions not in their constituency and people who are not their constituents, and then deny the hon. Member directly concerned an opportunity to reply to the disgraceful allegations which are made.

I very much regret raising this matter, and I also regret that last night I felt compelled to protest. However, this matter is important for the House of Commons. It is important that advice is given so that the unfortunate incidents which occurred last night are not seen again. The responsibility for what took place lies squarely and firmly with the hon. Member for Shipley.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am prepared to call hon. Members on points of order, but we cannot have a debate on this matter.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will know how much Adjournment debates are valued by hon. Members who wish to draw attention to matters of concern, and also how difficult it often is to secure such a debate. The events which took place last night were very much as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg) described so well. Essentially, it was a debate about——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It might help the hon. Gentleman and the House if I explained that not only have I read the transcript, but I was present in the Chamber for the latter part of the proceedings. Therefore, there is no need for hon. Members to tell me what happened last night. They can take it for granted that I know something about it.

Mr. Waller: In response to what the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has just said, I should point out that my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Fox) received no intimation from the hon. Gentleman that he intended to intervene, even had such an intervention been relevant, as this is surely a matter for my hon. Friend. I also knew only 10 minutes before the debate began that he wished to intervene. Although these points are not directly relevant, the point is surely that an Adjournment debate is personal to the hon. Member who initiates it, and, save for the Minister who is to reply, no other hon. Member has the right to intervene without that hon. Member's permission. That right should be maintained on behalf of the House.

Mr. Marcus Fox (Shipley): Further to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). May I make it clear that I received no letter from him? The children of some of my constituents attend that school, but the debate was not concerned with the school but with Mr. Honeyford and education in Bradford generally.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you confirm that in your experience an hon. Member never raises a matter on the Adjournment about a school or any other institution in the constituency of another hon. Member and then deliberately tries to organise the debate so as to deny the constituency Member even the opportunity of saying two or three words? In those circumstances, it was not surprising that last night Opposition Members were totally appalled by such behaviour. If hon. Members wish to ensure the co-operation which is necessary if this House is to function, any hon. Member applying for an Adjournment debate on an institution in the constituency of another hon. Member should at least do that hon. Member the courtesy of allowing him a minute or two out of the short time available.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have had a good run on this matter, and a lot of work still lies ahead of us. At this stage, it might be sensible if I said something. I have already told the House that as well as being present for the latter part of the proceedings before the House adjourned last night, I have carefully read the transcript. All the matters that have been raised today were dealt with by the Deputy Speaker who was in the Chair yesterday evening. I see no reason whatever to dissent from any of his rulings. In the circumstances, he acted very properly, and it would be wrong if the House adopted the practice of appealing against matters which have already been dealt with and decisions which have already been made. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] All hon. Members who have raised this matter today have recognised that essentially we are discussing the courtesies and conventions of the House. I hope that all hon. Members will recognise and observe those long-standing courtesies and conventions, which in this case appear not to have been fully observed. These are not matters for the Chair. It is for hon. Members to recognise the courtesies and conventions of the House, and I hope that will be done in future. Bearing in mind the lessons that we have learned from these discussions, we should now proceed to the next business.

Domestic Content of Motor Vehicles

4.14 pm

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish domestic content requirements for motor vehicles sold or distributed in Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

The objective behind the Bill is to strengthen employment in the motor and component industries. A strong motor industry is absolutely necessary for any industrial nation. The motor industry is about not just the basic industries, important though they are, or about the steel, glass and rubber industries, but the high technology industries such as the electronics industry. It is about the fitting of mini-computers into motor vehicles, new materials, ceramics which can be used in motor engines and plastics which can be used in bodywork. Without a strong motor industry, we cannot enter the realms of high technology, and that is vital.

In the early 1970s, the motor industry, either directly or indirectly, employed 1·2 million people. That figure has now declined to 450,000—a shocking condemnation. In the 1970s, the motor industry accounted for 11 per cent. of industrial output and 17 per cent. of the export trade. Today it accounts for only 4 per cent. of industrial output and 7 per cent. of exports. Under this Government, we now import 1 million vehicles and export only 220,000. Nationally, the balance of payments for the sale of motor vehicles went into deficit in 1982, and it now stands at £2·3 billion. We ought to be trying to retrieve the situation.

Motor imports now total 57 per cent. The multinational manufacturers—Ford, General Motors and Vauxhall—are now responsible for 42 per cent. of all motor imports. Many people now driving cars believe that they have bought a British vehicle, but in reality 50 per cent. have been imported and contain hardly any British components. Indeed, 25 per cent. of such imports come from Spain. To get a British vehicle into Spain, one must jump a 37 per cent. tariff barrier; yet, when Spain exports to the Common Market, the tariff barrier is only 4 per cent.

We cannot continue in that fashion. Harold Musgrave, the chairman of Austin Rover, has said that anything less than 80 per cent. British content means that we shall not be supplying high technology components. He said that was the minimum required if we were to preserve the British motor industry. This industry is in decline. While that decline has not yet become terminal, it will do so unless something is done.

We should find out how we can overcome that problem. We could do what we did for Nissan. We appear to allow Nissan to come to this country not to benefit us, but to jump over the barriers that have been erected in Europe. I hope that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is taking a tough line in Japan, but I doubt it. Many people, including Ministers, said that there would be between 60 and 80 per cent. of local content in Nissan vehicles. That includes everything—the on-costs, the sales costs and cleaners' costs. However, when they talk about local content, they mean European, not British, content. That has not been sufficiently spelt out. We should not accept such deals.

My Bill seeks not to interfere with choice or imports, but to ensure British content and employment in the United Kingdom for our people. The measure is modest. If the imported vehicles sold total not more than 20,000 there should be a minimum of 50 per cent. British content; between 20,000 and 50,000, there should be 65 per cent. minimum content; between 50,000 and 100,000, there should be 75 per cent. British content; between 100,000 and 250,000, there should be 90 per cent. British content; and for more than 250,000, as it is for major manufacturers, there should be 95 per cent. British content.

If people argue that even 90 per cent. British content does not include high technology, the Bill provides for the inclusion of one or more of six high technology components, and, in some cases, of all six. They are engine fully dressed, body panels, wiring harness, braking system, drive shaft and steering suspension. A minimum British content of 50 per cent. should include at least two of those six components; of 65 per cent., three; of 75 per cent., four; of 90 per cent., five; and of 95 per cent., all six. In that way we can ensure that we stay in high technology and bring employment back to the United Kingdom. I hope that the Government are prepared to accept this modest measure.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): Does my hon. Friend share my surprise that not one of the eight Ministers——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot intervene when we discuss a motion under the ten-minute Bill.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I introduced a ten-minute Bill on the question of the conduct of grasping Landlords when Viscount Tonypandy was Speaker, and he allowed an interjection and a speech to be made by the hon. Member for Beverley (Sir P. Wall).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have neither recollection of nor responsibility for that. I am ruling now. Mr. Hoyle.

Mr. Hoyle: In the early 1970s I would have been able to say that I expected support from all quarters of the House.

Mr. Gould: No Ministers are present.

Mr. Hoyle: No Ministers are present. That shows the amount of notice that they take.

Mr. Gould: Although there are eight of them.

Mr. Hoyle: Not one of the eight Ministers is present. That shows what they think about the motor and components industry.

In the 1970s there would hardly have been a constituency without a motor plant or companies that manufactured components for the motor industry. Today components are still manufactured in many constituencies. I hope that Conservative Members who represent such constituencies and want to retain their seats will therefore support my Bill. Despite the Ministers' absence, I hope that the Government will adopt my Bill so that we can preserve the British motor industry, bring back employment, and continue in the realms of high technology.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Doug Hoyle, Mr. George Park, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mr. Ian Mikardo, Mr. David Winnick, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mr. Bryan Gould, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Robert Parry, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Ernie Ross, Mr. Robin Corbett and Mr. Derek Fatchett.

Domestic Content of Motor Vehicles

Mr. Doug Hoyle accordingly presented a Bill to establish domestic content requirements for motor vehicles sold or distributed in Great Britain and Northern Ireland: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 April and to be printed. [Bill 128.]

Orders of the Day

Interception of Communications Bill

As amended for the Committee considered

New Clause 1

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE

A Select Committee of the House of Commons shall be established to oversee the work of any person responsible for, or making use of, the interception of communications.—[Mr. Clive Soley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.25 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This is a particularly important new clause. We have touched on this issue in previous debates on the Bill but have received far from adequate answers about why the Government will not move in this direction. We want to know why hon. Members who vote against the new clause and especially why the Government do not have sufficient confidence in the House and the parliamentary system to allow the House to oversee the work of the security services.

The way in which the Bill has been introduced and justified by the Government suggests that they neither give sufficient importance to the views of the elected representatives of the people nor trust them sufficiently to allow them to oversee the work of the security forces. We have heard many arguments why the Government do not want to follow that road.

There are two primary reasons why the Labour party wants a Select Committee to oversee the work of the security forces. The first is the self-evident reason that the House represents the will of the people. Hon. Members are elected to protect the democratic rights of those people, and that is what the electorate expect of us. Parliament must give a high priority to protecting the democratic and civil rights of the people. One way of doing that is for a Select Committee to oversee the work of the security forces. That is an infinitely better approach than that which the Government have designed in the Bill.

Secondly, we have always believed that some interception of communications is necessary and that the security services are necessary. If those services are to be effective, how do we define their guidelines and draw up the law in such a way as to enable them to operate effectively and at the same time to ensure that their operations do not undermine the basic democratic and civil rights of our people? That is the crucial question.

We are faced with the dilemma under the Bill and the Government's past policy of trying to tie the law up either too tightly or loosely. If it is tied up too tightly, the security forces must operate outside the law.

When I first spoke on this subject in the House, I gave the example of the West German police capturing the Baader-Meinhof group by, on their admission, going outside the law. They were forced to do so because German law was drawn so tightly that it did not allow them to bug a table in a cafe that would have enabled them to know where the bombing was to take place. They chose to break the law and, in doing so, they captured the group. It was an especially important event. However, the Labour party believes that it is completely wrong and extremely dangerous to put the security services in that position.

The other side of the argument is that if we tie the law too loosely, which is what the House has tended to do, we have the worst of all worlds, because we say to the security services, "You can do what you like." That is a great danger. Although the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary will say, "We have oversight of such operations," the evidence of the recent past, including the gross embarrassment caused to the Prime Minister by security leaks in recent years is that there has been insufficient parliamentary supervision of the security services. That is not surprising, because the area is far too complex for extremely busy people to keep an eye on everything that is happening in the way they should.

Therefore, for the effective oversight of the work of the security forces, we need a Committee of the House, and I suggest a Select Committee. When appropriate, it can work in public, and when inappropriate, it can sit in private, in deciding whether the law must be changed in any way and in making recommendations to the House. That would get round the problems faced by the West Germans.

The creation of such a Select Committee would also help to ensure that the democratic and civil rights of the British people are fully protected. The public rightly look to Parliament to do that.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Can the hon. Gentleman explain how the amendment would be included in the Bill? He will know that all other Select Committees have been set up under Standing Orders. Why has he chosen this route? Some of the other amendments have some unpleasant characteristics which I shall address in a moment.

Mr. Soley: I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's description of those unpleasant characteristics. All that I can say is that this is not an amendment, but a new clause. It will require the Government to act, and they would then go through the normal process of setting up a Committee. We have chosen to do it in this way because no other way would be in order. It is a perfectly reasonable method. Alternatively, we could amend the procedures relating to Select Committees, but that would be inappropriate in the context of the Bill

Mr. Soley: Before the hon. Gentleman intervenes again, I suggest that he thinks carefully about the order of events. If the House passed a new clause calling for the creation of a Select Committee, the implications for the Government would be clear. They would be expected to act in accordance with the new clause.

Mr. Cash: Of course I realise that this is a new clause, not an amendment, and I apologise for the error. However, it would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman could name any other Act that has included such a provision.

Mr. Soley: It is incredible to suggest that we must always have a precedent to justify introducing a measure that we believe is eminently sensible and appropriate. The new clause is not out of order. If it were, it would have been ruled out of order by Mr. Speaker and would not have been chosen for debate. It has been chosen, and I suspect that the hon. Gentleman is trying to dress up a minor nitpicking point when dealing with an extremely important new clause.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will my hon. Friend reflect that if the House were to adopt the attitude to Standing Orders which the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) suggests, it would always have to go on precedent, and we would be without the Bill of Rights, universal suffrage and a great deal of other important legislation that is now on the statute book?

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend is right. At the end of the day, I have complete trust in you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and in Mr. Speaker—I understand that he is unwell today—in deciding whether such a new clause should be called. Since it has been called, that is the end of the matter, unless one wishes to indulge in nitpicking, as the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) has. I would much rather he addressed his thoughts to the central arguments that I have put, and I shall certainly expect the Minister to do the same. These matters are far too important to everyone in the country to be treated with the disdain, if not contempt, displayed by the hon. Member for Stafford.

In previous debates, when the idea of a Select Committee was mooted, Conservative Members fell back on the argument that there would be a danger of leaks. I said then that that was the weakest of all arguments. The present system leaks like a sieve. There is no evidence that it is leakproof; indeed, all the evidence, if we consider those who have betrayed the country, is that leaks do not come from within the House but from outside. In some circumstances, the leaks could come from the very people who were appointed. As we know, a great problem for the British security services has been leaks from within. The argument about leaks is a non-starter.

That argument is also a non-starter because it is another criticism of the House. Many other countries, including those whose system is based closely on Britain's—I cite Canada as a classic example—use the sort of system that I am describing. Are we really saying that the House of Commons — the originator of parliamentary democracy—is incapable of exercising such responsibility and judgment, but that the parliaments of western Europe and those of the English-speaking world are? We should be devaluing the House if we said that. Indeed, several Government actions suggest to me that, sometimes intentionally and sometimes unintentionally, the Government are devaluing and understating the role of the House.

When I previously mentioned the possibility of a Select Committee, the Home Secretary said that we had not yet given sufficient thought to the role of commissioner or the tribunal. The reason why we have not done so is that we believe that their role would be far too weak compared with what it should be. We have tried to decide whether we want a judicial system or a system based on the parliamentary model, and the Government have come up with a quasi-judicial system. If they had chosen a judicial system—the Bill calls for the appointment of people with suitable legal qualifications—they would be saying that the interception of communications should be decided by the courts. Therefore, the logic is that warrants should be issued only by the courts, which is precisely what happens in many other countries.

I should make it clear that I have reservations about that, but there is much logic in going for a fully judicial system in which a judge grants a warrant. There is also logic in the sort of parliamentary system for which I am calling. There is no logic in a half-baked, in-between scheme that uses neither Parliament nor the courts properly. We shall have the worst of all worlds with this neither-fish-nor-fowl approach from the Government.

That approach tends to make the House irrelevant. The trend in recent years, not only under this Government, has been to undermine the role of the House, and the House certainly does not have the power and authority that it used to have. We have to ask ourselves why that is so.

Frequently, we are seen outside the House as irrelevant. In politics one can be right or wrong, good or bad, Left or Right, but one cannot afford to be irrelevant, because irrelevant institutions fade away. The more we disperse power, whether it is to the European Commission or to committees such as the the one set up by the Bill, the more we reduce the power available to this place. It is all very well to do that knowingly, understanding the consequences, but when we do it in this way we have not even begun to think about the consequences.

One of the most important sectors of government—the sector where the Government allow themselves to intercept communications and interfere with the privacy of citizens of a democracy—is to be a sector on which Parliament will have very little say. The Government may say that the tribunal is required to make a report, that that report will be given annually to the Prime Minister, and that the Prime Minister is required to lay it before the House.

Clause 8 says:

"(7) The Prime Minister shall lay before each House of Parliament a copy of every annual report made by the Commissioner under subsection (6) above together with a statement as to whether any matter has been excluded from that copy in pursuance of subsection (8) below.

(8) If it appears to the Prime Minister, after consultation with the Commissioner, that the publication of any matter in an annual report would be prejudicial to national security, to the prevention or detection of serious crime or to the economic well-being of the United Kingdom, the Prime Minister may exclude that matter from the copy of the report as laid before each House of Parliament."

As we have said before, and as we shall say again today, that goes far too wide. It means that the annual report that will be laid before the House could be—not necessarily would be—extremely thin and could give little opportunity for informed debate.

However, let us assume that a full report, with virtually nothing excluded, is laid before the House. It is then available for us to read, and we may be able to arrange a debate. Let us assume that we persuade the Government of the day to allow one day of prime Government time for that debate. That is one day's debate on an extremely serious matter, compared to what could be done by a Select Committee over many weeks of sitting, bringing evidence before it, questioning people involved, looking at the matter in depth. Which system protects the democratic rights best? The answer is clear. It is the Select Committee system, which can report to the House, after which a full debate can take place. In other words, we would have the best rather than the worst of both worlds.

The quasi-judicial system has all the disadvantages of being complex, confusing and ultimately answering to people who are infinitely too busy to give to it the attention that they would want. Having seen the Prime Minister waltzing around the world recently, I was tempted to get Tim Rice and Andrew Lloyd Webber to write music for the trip along the lines of "Evita". There is a song called "Rainbow High" in that play that is appropriate to the Prime Minister's recent jaunt.

The point is that a Prime Minister is infinitely too busy, whether or not he or she is trying to pack in a journey such as the one the Prime Minister undertook, to give this matter the detailed attention it deserves. In particular, a Prime Minister would be too busy to give detailed attention to the protection of the democratic rights of the people ensuring that when we pass legislation that allows the interception of communications, it is done effectively enough to prevent some of the more horrendous crimes such as terrorist bombings, killings and some drug abuses.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): The hon. Gentleman will know that I am not unsympathetic to his line of reasoning. Does he agree that the important sector to which the new clause is addressed is national security and precisely those parts of the security service that would be excluded from the report required under clause 8? How does he propose that the Select Committee on this matter would be in any better position to get round what I see as the insuperable self-imposing and self-limiting barrier—another Chinese wall—whereby the sectors excluded from the report are the ones about which the House would wish to know?

Mr. Soley: The answer to the hon. Gentleman lies in the example of the Defence Committee. It has to deal with extremely sensitive information at times, and does so very well. It calls before it evidence from the experts with detailed knowledge of highly secret information. It cross-examines those experts and goes into details. It pays visits to some of the establishments and sees some of the equipment. It does not run into any problems. The security services present more difficulties because of the closed nature of their operations, but it does not necessarily follow that we could not have a Select Committee on them. It may be more difficult but it would not be fundamentally different.

We have the problem of being excessively secret in this country. The other nations, particularly the democracies, are more open. At an official level we still pretend that we do not have MI5, MI6 and so on. However, we have these operations, and it is time that we said so openly and publicly. Everybody knows about them and thinks that they are official and public, but there is still this nonsensical pretence. Unless we set up some structure for controlling them, we shall leave the powers solely with two members of the Executive who, even with the best will in the world, cannot exercise that control effectively. That is the key argument, and that is why the new clause is so important. It is of central importance to the Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): The subject of a Select Committee has been discussed before. There is one central point to be made. The new clause says:

"A Select Committee. . . shall be established to oversee the work of any person responsible for, or making use of, the interception of communications."

That takes a Select Committee smack into the centre of the operations of the police, security and intelligence services.

While I believe that matters of general policing policy should be matters not only for the House but for the police authorities, I am opposed to any political interference in the operation of the police service. I think that I shall carry at least one Front Bench Labour Member with me on that.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman is making the mistake that has been made by a number of hon. Members. To my mind, democracy is about setting policies and holding people accountable for how those policies are carried out. Those are the two key things, that is how we have practised democracy, and that is the normal process. We do that in all other sectors, and what we are suggesting here is no different.

Mr. Griffiths: The House will have to take account not of what the hon. Gentleman says is in his mind but of what is on the amendment paper. The new clause says:

"A Select Committee . . . shall oversee the work"—

not the policy or the accountability—

"of any person responsible for, or making use of, the interception of communications."

I can think of no clearer use of the English language. That means that a Select Committee will get involved in the work, the operations, the day-to-day conduct of the police, the security and, as I understand it, the intelligence-gathering services. I object to that, and I am sure that the House as a whole, on reflection, will object to it on the highest grounds of principle.

It is right that the House should set policies and have an oversight of the way in which policies are carried out, and it ought to expect Ministers to be responsible for the policies for which they are accountable to the House. But it is an entirely different matter for a Select Committee of the House to get involved in the work, the operations and the day-to-day performance of the police or security services.

Over the past year, we have seen the attempts of political elements in police authorities to intrude into police operations. I should probably cause unnecessary contention in the House if I went into any of the details where this problem arose during the miners' strike. However, there have unquestionably been attempts by political people in police authorities to tell the police that they should perform their duties in a certain way and that they should give immunity to some people and not to others, because they have taken a political view of police work and operations. That cannot be right.

If a Left-wing police authority intruded into police operations on behalf of that ideology, a Right-wing police authority in some other county could intrude in a different fashion. That is quite wrong. There is no room for party politics in policing, and there is no room for the police in politics. I make that clear. Therefore, I should be opposed to a Select Committee of the House getting involved in operations.

Another illustration could be taken from the recent operations of the GLC, where unquestionably political attempts have been made to interfere with the way in which the metropolitan police carry out their duties. I repeat that it is right that politicians should wish to have a general oversight of policing policies and that the views of politicians should be taken into account by the police at all times. But once we allow politics to intrude in the operation of the law, we start to compromise justice itself and to go down the road towards the east European state.

What distinguishes our police service and administration of justice from those in many other countries, notably in eastern Europe, is that in those countries the concept of justice and of policing arises from the notion of political control. They have political police and political justice. They take the view that all crimes are political or state crimes. The great distinction in our country is that the police are non-political and non-partisan and are removed from any suggestion that there shall be interference by politicians, of whatever complexion, in their day-to-day operations.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) advanced some persuasive arguments, but I think that he is wrong in principle. The language of his new clause is such that it would insert politics into policing and into the security services. He said very fairly—and it is to the honour of the Labour Front Bench—that, although a number of his colleagues in the country have suggested that this Bill for the first time introduces telephone tapping, that it is an obnoxious practice and that it should never be allowed, he and his right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) have never disguised the fact that from time to time it is necessary in the interests of the security of the state. But the Opposition are properly concerned about accountability. That is the issue here, and I understand that.

However, the new clause would mean that a Select Committee of the House would get involved in the actual work of telephone tapping, and that is an extraordinary proposition.

Mr. Norris: I wonder whether my hon. Friend would say why any oversight of interception by a Select Committee is political, but oversight by a Prime Minister or Home Secretary somehow is not?

Mr. Griffiths: I can give my hon. Friend a precise answer. It is a constitutional point. The Prime Minister and the Home Secretary are responsible to the House, but they are Ministers of the Crown and they carry out that duty in that sense. The Prime Minister owes his or her position to the process of election and to the confidence of the House, and, of course, that is a political matter. But in exercising the duties of a Prime Minister under the law and the constitution, the Prime Minister is the Queen's first Minister. That is his or her constitutional responsibility. The reality is that there can never be a non-political Prime Minister or Home Secretary.

The answer to my hon. Friend is that a Select Committee of the House is not appointed by the monarch; it is a product of the House. Her Majesty's Ministers operate as the servants of the monarch, though responsible to the House, rather than, as a Select Committee operates, as part of the procedures of Parliament. That is an important distinction.

Mr. Eric. S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Now answer the question.

Mr. Griffiths: I have answered it. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) may not think it a satisfactory answer, and it may be that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) does not think that it is satisfactory, but I see a real distinction here. It is the ministerial conduct of the executive function of government that we are discussing, not the parliamentary oversight, which is a different matter.

I cannot believe it to be right that a Select Committee of the House should be in a position to demand, as the clause implies, that a police officer or member of the security service should be answerable in detail to a Select Committee for his work. Does it mean that the Select Committee would send for him?

Mr. Soley: Yes.

Mr. Griffiths: That is very interesting. The Select Committee would be able to determine within the rank structure of the security services—whether MI5, MI6 or the special branch—that a superintendent, an inspector or a sergeant should be brought before it and cross-examined. Is that what the hon. Member for Hammersmith proposes?

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman is getting himself into an incredible mess. The Select Committees do that already. They ask people to appear before them to give evidence. Not to attend is a very serious matter.

Mr. Griffiths: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman has served on a Select Committee, as I have. It has been the misfortune of many of us to do so. I have served on one for about 18 months, and it has been my frequent experience, occasionally to my intense exasperation, that when a Committee has sought to subpoena or to demand the presence of a civil servant, the Minister in question has refused. Quite often the Minister has been right to refuse. We in the House operate on the basis that Ministers are accountable to the House but that civil servants are accountable to Ministers. The hon. Member for Hammersmith is not correct when he says that at present Select Committees subpoena or command the presence of civil servants. They may do that only if the Minister in question is agreeable to it.

Mr. Soley indicated dissent.

Mr. Griffiths: The House will have to make up its own mind about it.

I am glad to have elicited from the hon. Member for Hammersmith exactly what the Opposition's policy is. He regards it as entirely proper that a Select Committee should be able to reach right into the special branch, the police, the security services, intelligence gathering and anti-terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland, for example, demand their presence, and cross-examine them here with all the terrifying risks that that involves and all the great risks to individual practitioners — operational police officers and security officers — being exposed to questions which I do not believe they can possibly answer, in the public interest. It is extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman should have gone so far in stating his intentions.

5 pm

This measure would result in an improper intrusion of the legislative function of the House into the Government's executive responsibilities. Worse, it would cause political matters to intrude into the operations of the police and the security services. If the hon. Member for Hammersmith had put on the amendment paper what he meant but did not say—that a Select Committee should have a general duty to oversee policies and Ministers should be required to report to it—hon. Members would have had more sympathy with his ideas. I would not have supported him even in that statement, but Conservative Members would have shown more sympathy. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East takes that view. I should be interested to hear whether my hon. Friend goes as far as the Opposition have gone in demanding that a Select Committee should have the ability to cross-examine the police and members of the security services about their operations.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to explain my feelings precisely. Presumably any Select Committee is required to take account of policy, to compare policy with practice, and, when elucidating the difference between policy and practice, to cross-examine any witness that it chooses. Does not that principle apply straightforwardly?

Mr. Griffiths: I am afraid that it does not. I should be surprised if my hon. Friend can cite chapter and verse of occasions when Select Committees have been able to call before them civil servants, police officers, or anyone else, against the wishes of the Minister. I do not think that they have been able to do so. What matters is the issue of ministerial accountability, not the ability of Ministers to bullyrag, for political reasons, those who have difficult operational tasks.

I can see that I have hardly carried the whole of the Opposition with me, but I believe that this new clause is misconceived. It would be contrary to the proper practices of the House. This measure would nibble away at the proper constitutional relationship between the Executive and the legislature. Above all, the new clause would inject politics into the police and security services, and politics should not be there.

Mr. Heffer: I am speaking from this position because I understand that because a new microphone has been installed it will be easier for the House and the country to hear me. The fact that the leader of the Liberal party is not in his place allows me to speak from here.

I support new clause 1. It is right that we should ask for a Select Committee

"to oversee the work of any person responsible for, of making use of, the interception of communications."

Unlike the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths), who did not declare his interest — he is spokesman for the Police Federation——

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I should make it clear that the Police Federation has formed no view on the Bill. I have had no communication with the federation. I speak for myself alone.

Mr. Heffer: Fair enough. I want to declare an interest. I believe that, as a Left-wing Socialist, my telephone has probably been bugged for the past 14 years. I do not know what good that has done those who have listened to my telephone conversations. They must have listened to some interesting conversations between my wife and her mother-in-law, her brother and many other people. As I have never said anything privately that I would not say publicly, there is nothing for me to be terribly worried about. I know that this bugging occurs, because many years ago when I was a shop steward in the shipyards in Liverpool, I discovered that the local police had a dossier on me. Good luck to them.

We need a Select Committee to oversee the work of these people. What else is it but work? These people are intervening in the conversations of ordinary citizens. If the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds believes that the law is above society, he does not live in the real world. Law is determined by the House of Commons and the House of Lords collectively at a given moment. If the given moment means that we have a Conservative, Right-wing, reactionary Government of the type that we have now, laws of that kind will be determined by that Government. If we have a Labour Government, I hope that they will repeal some of those laws. It is ridiculous to suggest that the law is above society.

The other day I delivered a lecture in Trowbridge, entitled the Thomas Helliker Lecture. It was about a 19-year-old man who was hanged in 1803 because he dared to be a member of a trade union. He was accused of burning down a woollen mill which was owned by a certain gentleman. He was not involved, but he knew who had burnt the mill. He refused to give the names of those people, and consequently was hanged. Anyone who tells me that the law is above society, that the law does not reflect the ideas of the people who run society and control the Government and the system is not living in the world in which I live. Those of us in the Labour movement who know about these matters understand that the law is used constantly against those who oppose the existing system of society and want to change it by normal democratic means.

I have been sent a copy of the Leveller Supplement—it is a magazine of the Left — headed "MI5 funded, Monochrome". It is a monthly newspaper, and I received issue No. 4 for 1 April 1985. I had never received that paper before. I do not know who runs it or anything about it, but it contains much interesting information that should be examined.

One article states:

"a senior Intelligence Officer talks to our Man from Monochrome, Paul Demetrion."

The article continues:

"John Wilson (not his real name) is a Senior Intelligence Officer at F Branch. F Branch specialises in 'counter subversion'. Its various sections deal with the Communist Party, Trades Unions, Irish Terrorism, etc. . . . Wilson has worked for MI5 for 20 years and for F Branch for the past ten. In an exclusive interview for Monochrome, he discusses his work for the first time."

This is what convinces me that my telephone has been bugged for some years. Speaking of Left-wing targets, Wilson stated:

"Most individuals from the leadership of Far Left organisations are considered to be a threat to the State. Some people have files on them dating back over thirty years."

The article states:

"Like whom? 'Ted Grant . . . partly because of his activities in the Labour Party (Ted Grant sits on the Editorial Board of Militant)'".

It goes on to say:

"During the early 1980s, prominent Labour left-wingers had their home phones tapped. Once this had bizarre results. 'A broken transcript of a conversation between Chris Mullin (a member of Tony Benn's 'kitchen cabinet' and Tribune journalist) and a friend was passed to the office. There had been faults on the telephone, so the playback was interrupted, but Mullin had clearly been discussing defence policy options. We all imagined that it was part of a new Bennite defence initiative. It was hurriedly analysed by colleagues working on the peace movement. It was only later discovered that Mullin had been talking about various scenarios for his novel (A Very British Coup).'"

That is all in the document. I do not know whether it is true, but someone must answer. It was issued on 1 April. Has any action been taken against that paper since 1 April?

Have the Government said that it is all lies? Who is this man John Wilson? What is the material? There is a great deal of other material. Wilson says:

"F Branch sometimes finds it necessary to infiltrate an organisation using spies and paid informers. A sub-branch FX, is the specialist Branch. Wilson estimates there are 'hundreds' of these, co-ordinated by various MI5 desk officers. Sometimes they are planted, but usually they are recruited from within. He claims MI5 has infiltrated all the major trade unions; the Labour Party; the Communist Party; the NCCL; Greenpeace; groups on the revolutionary left and right. CND again is a major target."

Do we not need a Select Committee to oversee the work of those individuals? Perhaps the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds does not understand that we did not always have a House of Commons with genuine rights. We had a House of Commons which was allowed by the whim or agreement of the monarchy. It had to state that it had its own rights, which it would use in its own way, and the monarch was put in his place.

In passing, I want to make this clear. During the past few days some of the papers have been acting disgracefully with regard to Princess Michael. I do not know her. I shall never meet her. I do not want to meet her. I do not know what her politics are. I am sure that they are not mine. I am sure that they are completely opposed to everything in which I believe, but no one can be responsible for his or her parents. I make that clear. My father, luckily, was not a murderer. He happened to be a regimental sergeant major.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): That is worse.

Mr. Heffer: It may be worse in the eyes of some people. I did not become a regimental sergeant major. I had no intention of doing so. Some of the papers, including that so-called Labour paper, the Daily Mirror, have been acting disgracefully. If there has been a cover up, concentrate on the cover up, not on the princess, because she is of no importance. That does not advance our political arguments one iota. What is far more important——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I hope that the hon. Member will return to the new clause.

Mr. Heffer: I wanted to say that, because I believe that it is important that someone on the Left of the Labour party should make it clear that we are not against people because their parents might have been Nazis or, in this country, Mosleyites or anything else. We are opposed to what those people stood for, not where their children stand. We must make that clear. I am sorry for anyone who joins the Tory party, but I cannot help it. The children of some Labour people have joined the Tory party, and that is regrettable. We cannot blame people, even if their parents were in the SS.

The future of our country is far more important. We have democracy because the people decided that we should have a democratic Parliament, elected by the people. It took a long time. From the 1642 revolution we had a genuine democratic Parliament in which every man had the vote. It was not until after 1918 that women had the vote. It took a long time to fight for those democratic rights.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) made clear, the House represents the will of the country. If it is the will of the country, we should have a Select Committee to oversee what is done in the name of the Government, elected by the people, in relation to the citizens of this country, irrespective of their political views. I do not mind whether people are on the Right or the Left. It is vital that a Select Committee should oversee any interceptions by people acting for the security forces.

We all know that the security forces have a job to do. They must investigate people who want to carry out terrorist activities. No one denies that. They must investigate drug pushers. No one denies that. I welcome every effort that is made towards stopping that filthy business. No one denies that all that is important, but, for God's sake, I heard the Prime Minister talking about the enemy within. Was she talking about trade unionists? Are we the enemy within because we have a different point of view? No one should have his words intercepted because he might have a political point of view different from that of the Administration.

I have said clearly in the House and elsewhere that I do not agree with what happens in eastern European countries. I do not agree with the police system that operates in those countries. One of the reasons why we must have a Select Committee overseeing our security forces is that I do not want to see us move into the type of society where we have a security body separate from the Administration — that can happen — and, in the end, running the Administration. That is why we must have genuine control of interceptions. I accept the arguments put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith, and I give my unqualified support to the new clause.

Mr. Norris: The discussions on the Bill take place against the background of public disquiet. The extent to which that public disquiet is informed should be a matter for debate. One cannot argue but that such disquiet exists. The focus of that disquiet is in no small measure the growing assumption—the dawning of the realisation—that if the country has a choice of whether the security services operate within or without the ambit of Parliament, we have for too long allowed the principle to develop, possibly by default, that the security services largely operate outside parliamentary accountability. That accountability is vested formally in members of the Government — the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister.

The new clause seeks to alter that relationship and accountability in two ways. First, it seeks straightforwardly and unequivocally to bring all the security services' operations inside the ambit of Parliament. Secondly, it predicates the view that a Select Committee is more appropriate, ultimately, than a Minister to be accountable for the affairs of the security services.

On that latter point, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) has suggested that a Minister of the Crown is somehow apolitical, while a Select Committee is by definition political because it is selected by this House. I hope that I do not misrepresent my hon. Friend's observations. My experience as a member of a Select Committee, which believes that it is trying to do an important job, is that we work best when we work on a completely apolitical or non-political basis. Indeed, the majority of our deliberations are carried out entirely in that vein.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: For the avoidance of any doubt between my hon. Friend and myself, let me say that what

[Mr. Eldon Griffiths]

I argued was that when a Minister of the Crown is acting in his Executive function as a Minister of the Crown he is not, or ought not to be, acting as a party politician. He is carrying out the Queen's government. Of course, he is at the same time a politician. Many Ministers have to act in an appellate fashion. Every Secretary of State determines matters in an appellate capacity. In that sense, he has no politics.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I take his observations seriously. I refer him to a point made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) in moving the motion. He said that there were options available to us to control the operation of the security services. One of these is the Executive overview option, which is the one that we currently have. The other is some sort of quasi-judicial option, into which we are being led. I shall argue later and on Third Reading that that is better than nothing, but there is also the judicial option. My view—my hon. Friend may not share it—is that the forum of the Select Committee and the way in which it works is a more appropriate way of monitoring the operations of the security services than the system of Executive accountability.

I have always accepted it as the prerequisite of any Select Committee that it works on the basis, as I said earlier, of looking at Government policy and not only making recommedations as to how that policy should be changed, but, more importantly, comparing the policy theory with the practice—the actuality.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton, (Mr. Heffer) quoted a number of observations. He will forgive me for saying that there are other literary organs from which similar observations have emanated in the past few months. In considering them we have to bear in mind the assurances, given to the House by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, that all interceptions have been carried out in accordance with very closely defined criteria which he has spelt out. Surely the essence of the hon. Gentleman's concern, which I share, is that there is a considerable gulf between the very precise circumstances in which interception is to be authorised, and spelt out by the Home Secretary in his assurances—the House would naturally accept that he gave them in good faith—and the stories which constantly arise and which have on occasion a disquieting degree of accuracy about them.

In order to allay public disquiet, there would be considerable merit in having some much more publicly accountable forum in which the activities of the security services generally could be scrutinised. The hon. Member for Hammersmith will recall that I pursued a similar line of argument in Committee. I hope that I am not offending against the conventions of the House by raising a matter which has already been discussed. On that occasion I said that there were qualifications which of necessity would have to be made to the structure of the Select Committee before it would be a suitable body to handle security matters.

One of the most important principles in intelligence operations—anyone who has observed the operations of the security services in the second world war will know it—is the "need to know" principle. That should not be lightly discarded. It follows from that that there is a great danger in allowing information to be disseminated to large numbers of people who do not have a direct interest in or responsibility for that information. The inadvertent disclosure of it could be potentially embarrassing to the security services, and no one on either side of the House would want that to happen.

Therefore, it follows that the Select Committee should be composed of a smaller number of right hon. Members—I use that term advisedly—than is usually the case. Select Committees usually vary in size between nine and 13 members. I suggest that in this instance there should be not more than five right hon. Members. On the "need to know" principle, the smaller the number of right hon. Members involved in the Select Committee, the better.

The members of the Select Committee would need to be people of considerable experience of this House and of government generally. The issues with which they would be dealing would not only be important in themselves and need to be interpreted responsibly and in a proper fashion, but would need to be interpreted by right hon. Members of this House with the necessary experience to know what to look for, who had been through the mill of a Department of State, and had perhaps held the highest offices in the land. They should be people who understand from the inside how the system works.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's points. Even the sort of Select Committee for which he is arguing would be an improvement on the present position, in which there is no parliamentary scrutiny whatever, but I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman realises sufficiently that Select Committees are always reluctant, even if they are composed of supporters of the Government of the day, to be regarded as a mouthpiece of the Administration.

The hon. Gentleman has made a number of arguments, some valid, and others not. Is there not a danger that such a small Select Committee, composed of people with a long experience, all of them Privy Councillors, and perhaps some of them ex-Ministers, would in time come to be regarded as a body likely to give approval to the Government or the Establishment of the day? Therefore, to some extent it would defeat the very purpose of having the kind of parliamentary scrutiny which the hon. Gentleman clearly recognises as important.

Mr. Norris: I accept that the possibility suggested by the hon. Gentleman might arise, but in reality I do not think that it would be likely. Right hon. Members on each side of the House eventually retire from day-to-day activity in this House, but that does not mean that their fundamental allegiances are likely to change. Having said that, I can immediately think of examples on each side of the House which run counter to my argument. The important principle is that such a Select Committee should not be composed only of Government supporters. It should be just as much an all-party Select Committee as any other Select Committee. I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept my argument that it should be a smaller body than is usual, for the operationally sensible and straightforward reasons that I have outlined. Secondly, it should be composed of Privy Councillors, because it is an essential prerequisite of such a Committee, not only that it should hear evidence, but that it should know what to look for and how to interpret what is sees. It is not simply a matter of hard work and application, such as is involved in producing a report of the Social Services Committee or the European Legislation Committee. The members of the Committee will need to have been on the course before, so to speak, so as to be able to look properly at the reports which will be presented to them and be able to make something of them. With those qualifications, I think that the option in the new clause, although it falls short in some respects of the option that I proposed in Committee, should commend itself to the House.

5.30 pm

In conclusion, I ask myself one fundamental question: would the country be better off, and would public disquiet be more or less allayed, by the existence of some form of parliamantary overview of the security services? Although I accept that there are potentially a great many difficulties in the way of the establishment of such a Select Committee, and although I admit that its functions would be less than total and less than perfect, none the less I believe that, on balance, the answer to my question is that the more parliamentary overview there is of the security services, the better off the country will be.

Mr. McWilliam: I declare my interest as a Member sponsored by the union which represents the workers in telecommunications.

It has been an interesting debate. I would rather that the proposal before the House was to set up a Select Committee to oversee the security services, but that is not the case. We are dealing with a very limited proposal in new clause 1, which relates only to the interception of communications. I hope that when they are deciding how to vote my hon. Friends and hon. Members on the Government Benches will bear in mind the limitations of the proposed new clause.

I accept fully that there are differences of opinion within the House on whether the security services should come under parliamentary scrutiny. What I do not accept is that there is any difference within the House on the need for the House to safeguard the rights of the individual. That is what we are here for. That is why we have our privileges and why we guard them jealously. That is the reason behind the new clause.

It goes without saying that to intercept someone's communications is to interfere with his fundamental liberties and with his rights as a citizen. That will not be done under the Bill unless there are strong grounds for supposing that a person is engaging in serious crime, espionage or some other heinous act against the state. The definition of serious crime is a crime for which on conviction a person could reasonably expect to be sentenced to three years imprisonment on first conviction. The Bill is to cover serious offences.

The snag is that within the country there is a great belief that even the safeguards contained in the Bill will not stop unofficial tapping by the security services, the police special branch, Customs and Excise and other organisations. The Bill is fundamentally flawed in that respect.

I do not doubt Ministers when they say that it is their intention that the Bill will stop unofficial tapping. The Bill of itself will not prevent abuse. Until aggrieved individuals can be sure that their communications will not be intercepted without a warrant, they will not be satisfied. That cannot be established under the Bill, because the Bill deals only with whether a warrant has been properly issued. It does not at any stage deal with whether interception has taken place.

Such a provision is absent from the Bill. I tried to amend it in that way in Committee, but failed. Conservative Members probably voted as they did because they did not understand the position. Perhaps I did not make it sufficiently clear, but it will not be within the terms of reference of the tribunal or the commissioner to establish whether an interception has been made.

If we are to interfere with the fundamental rights and liberties of citizens, the House itself would be a far greater safeguard of those rights and liberties than the Executive, whatever their political complexion, have proved to be over the years. One has only to look through history books to find out how Executives have used their power. The temptations must be enormous.

People engaged in lawful activities in their daily lives, whether at work or anywhere else, should not have their communications intercepted. The House will no doubt pass this measure, which will interfere with fundamental rights and liberties, but it must retain within itself the oversight of the way in which the restriction of rights and liberties is exercised.

As the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) said, the Bill will not interfere with the day-to-day operations of the police. As a former deputy chairman of Edinburgh city police commission, I have enough experience to know about police operational requirements and capabilities. The Bill will not interfere either with the day-to-day running of MI5, MI6, F branch, Customs and Excise or anyone else who happens to fancy earwigging on someone. It is to ensure that if an interception is made, it is made for sound reasons, that the reasons are clearly stated, that the warrant is given under the hand of the appropriate Secretary of State within the restrictions contained in the Bill and that the interception is in place only for the period of time authorised by the warrant. That is what the job of the Select Committee would entail, and nothing more. Therefore, I commend the new clause to hon. Members on all sides of the House.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): If the Select Committee proposed by the new clause took evidence from people who might themselves be susceptible to acts of terrorism, surely it could meet in private, as many Select Committees do.

Mr. McWilliam: Of course it could. The Select Committee on Defence does it all the time and sidelines many reports.

My hon. Friend has reminded me of another point—that the House has control over the members of a Select Committee in a way that the House and other legal bodies would not have control over the tribunal, the commissioner or anyone else. If any member of the Select Committee leaked information, it would be a breach of the privileges of the House and that Member could be brought to the Bar of the House, as has happened, and justice could be meted out immediately by the House. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) may scoff. If he finds that the Government are so lax about the privileges of the House as to allow breaches to take place——

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): With respect to the hon. Member, it is not a question of the Government being lax. It is about the House being lax. I can tell the hon. Member now that there is no prospect of the House punishing such a person in the way that he suggests.

Mr. McWilliam: I suspect that there would be such a prospect if what was leaked was against the interests of national security. On the other hand, if what was leaked was merely embarrassing to the Government, it would mean that the Executive had done wrong, and that would be all the more reason for having a Select Committee.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The trouble with the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) is that he has not been in the House long enough to remember that the hon. Member for West Lothian was treated in just the way that the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) suggested.

Mr. McWilliam: It was the hon. Member for the constituency that was then called West Lothian that I had in mind when I said that.

I remind the House that it is our duty to defend the rights and liberties of the citizens of this country. If we merely leave the Bill as it is, we are being negligent in that duty. However, if we introduce the Select Committee, it means that the House is saying unequivocally, "We accept that we are depriving people of liberties and privileges, and we take responsibility for that, but we expect that the people who do it will be answerable to us."

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): This has been an interesting debate. It is obviously right that the House should have had the opportunity to consider whether a Select Committee might have a role in these matters. However, I have a sneaking sympathy for my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). I am not sure whether one could find an Act of Parliament in which there was a reference to a Select Committee which would play a specific role. I have just had a look at the Parliamentary Commissioner Act 1967, and I did not find a reference to one. However, that is by the way. The point is that it is obviously right that we should consider whether there is a role for a Select Committee in these matters.

I am not sure what is meant by "oversee" in the new clause. Is it simply reviewing work, or is it calling a person to account? Is it calling a person to account before or after he acts? I do not know. What is meant by "any person responsible for"? There is little doubt that it covers the Secretary of State, but does it cover the telephone engineer? If is does, have we not been considering for quite a while what protection we should put in the Bill for those who intercept because they have been told to do so as a result of a warrant issued by the Secretary of State? Will the telephone engineer be called to account by a Select Committee for what he properly did in response to a warrant? I should have thought that he could be, according to the wording of the new clause.

Those are not drafting points. A Select Committee sounds very fine. On the face of it, parliamentary accountability is an easy cause always to espouse, but something more precise than that is required. When one tries to be more precise, one sees the difficulties, some of which were identified by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths). I shall refer to them in a moment. However, I should first say a quick word about how the security service — much of the debate has focused on it—is controlled now.

The starting point with the security service is the directive first issued in 1952, and endorsed by all subsequent Governments. The principle underpinning the directive is quite clear. The Director General is responsible personally and directly to the Home Secretary for the proper implementation of all the objectives in the directive. He is appointed by the Government and has to retain the confidence of the Government. He seeks direction and guidance from the Home Secretary on the way in which the security service sets about things, but — this is all-important — Ministers do not involve themselves in detailed information obtained by the security service in individual cases, save, of course, where an application is made for an interception warrant.

Ministers do not involve themselves politically. They do not make political decisions, any more than does the Director General, who is enjoined by the directive itself to see that the security service is kept absolutely free from any political bias or influence. Nothing is done that might lend colour to any suggestion that it is concerned with the interests of any particular section of the community or any other matter than the defence of the realm as a whole.

5.45 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The Minister has just made the amazing statement that neither the Director General nor the Home Secretary is acting in a political way when he signs a warrant. It is pretty well acknowledged that Mr. Cox of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament had a warrant signed for his phone to be tapped. Was that, or was that not, a political decision?

Mr. Waddington: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can have been listening carefully to what I said. I know that I was going rather quickly. I must tell him that he must not expect, as a result of such a question, to find that any Minister is drawn into giving a reply that might be taken either as a denial of an allegation of interception or an admission. If he has listened to our debates, he will know that time and again hon. Members have referred to how wise has been the tradition of Ministers never to be drawn into either admissions or denials, so I shall not be drawn now.

All I was saying was that there is a clear directive, laid down in 1952, which enjoins the Director General to see that the security service is kept absolutely free from any political bias or influence. If the Director General is carrying out his duties properly, that is precisely what he does. The Director General is accountable to the Home Secretary. The Home Secretary, of course, does not involve himself in detailed information obtained by the security service in individual cases, save, of course, where an application is made for an interception warrant. Ministers do not therefore involve themselves politically. They do not make political decisions, any more than the Director General himself does so. I cannot be clearer than that.

Mr. Cohen: If the Minister is saying that the Director General makes his decisions on a non-political basis, and that the Secretary of State signs warrants on a non-political basis, what is the role of the Secretary of State? Why is he needed?

Mr. Waddington: It depends on what the hon. Gentleman means by "political". We are making a political decision when we write into an Act of Parliament what should be the powers of the Secretary of State. However, if the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the Secretary of State makes some party political judgment as to whether there should be interception, all I can say is that he is entirely wrong. The Secretary of State exercises powers which have been approved by Parliament. He sticks to those powers. He does not go outside those powers. What we are now doing in this exercise is to spell out absolutely clearly in an Act of Parliament what those powers are.

What I said about the difficulties of the new clause was touched upon by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds. The Select Committee is required to oversee the work of those who receive the product of interception. That is one of the things that the new clause is saying. That includes the police and Customs and Excise. For the first time a Select Committee — my hon. Friend was obviously right about this—would have oversight of the work of the police, but, quite illogically, only when their work involved in part a product of interception. That would be ridiculous. It would be the first time that a Select Committee would be able to call before it a member of the police force and cross-examine that police officer about the way in which he had carried out his investigations into a particular case. That would be a departure——

Mr. Golding: Is the Minister aware that the Select Committee on Employment called the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and three police constables to account for their policing of industrial disputes and to give their opinions of the legislation? Far from the matter being about general policy, there was a detailed examination of policing of the steel and coal disputes.

Mr. Waddington: The clearest distinction has always been drawn between matters of policy and detailed examinations of the way in which detailed operations have been carried out. If hon. Members will look at the new clause, they will see that it says that a Select Committee would be able to "oversee the work of any person"

using the product of interception. That means that the Select Committee would be able, for instance, to have before it a police officer who had carried out a detailed inquiry. Just because part of that inquiry had involved interception in that particular case, a detailed inquiry would be made by the Select Committee into that particular police operation.

As I said earlier, that may be right or it may be wrong. I think that it is wrong. It would certainly be novel. It would examine the judgment of those who were directing inquiries. How could it be the job of a Select Committee to interfere in police operational matters, and how could it oversee the product of interception without looking into the consequences of the inquiry in which interception had played one small part? As for the security services, how could it be right for a Select Committee to have oversight of operational matters? It would undermine ministerial responsibility. It would also undermine the proper responsibilities of senior management and the Director General. I emphasise that the Government do not challenge the need for independent scrutiny of authorised interception. That is provided for in the Bill. However, it would be a different matter if a Select Committee were to carry out inquiries into operational matters at perhaps the same time as the Director General was quite rightly carrying out such an examination.

Mr. MacLennan: At an earlier stage of the proceedings on the Bill the Minister attached weight to the importance of parliamentary accountability and drew attention to the provisions of clause 8, under which the Commissioner is to place an annual report before Parliament. Despite the drafting defects of the new clause, does the Minister not believe that there would be some merit in a Select Committee considering the Commissioner's report so that in turn it would report and give some reality to parliamentary accountability?

Mr. Waddington: I do not think that I should be drawn on that point. The hon. Gentleman is asking for my opinion about a new clause which would be entirely different from this new clause and which would be directed towards an entirely different purpose. Therefore, I believe that the House will appreciate it if I stick to this new clause. The Government are opposed to it on a number of grounds. In terms of security, there is no need to add yet another parliamentary dimension to the existing arrangements for control and accountability. The idea of a Select Committee overseeing operational and day-to-day matters is fundamentally objectionable. Oversight could not mean anything else. This kind of oversight is not the task of a Select Committee. Such an arrangement would run counter to the provisions contained in the Bill for independent oversight and scrutiny and would weaken, not enhance, the proper responsibilities of those concerned. Therefore, I ask the House to reject the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 2

WARRANTS FOR INTERCEPTION

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 19 leave out paragraph (a) and insert—

'(a) for the defence of the realm or to prevent subversion, terrorism or espionage;'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 7, in clause 10, page 9, line 19, at end insert—

'"subversion" means an attempt to overthrow Parliament by unlawful means;'.

Mr. Corbett: The amendments concern more than mere definitions, which they may appear at first sight to be. They concern an area that is vital to every citizen—our freedom within the law, as individuals and collectively, to challenge and try to change Government policy. That is important not just with the present Government, who have shown such scant regard for freedom in relation, for example, to GCHQ at Cheltenham or their attempt to deny the vote to millions of citizens in the metropolitan counties and the greater London area. When the Labour party forms a Government, Conservative Members will no doubt wish to challenge our policies. The road of freedom does not have just a left-hand side or a right-hand side. There are two sides to that important road.

The first criterion on which the Bill allows the Home Secretary to issue a warrant to snoop and spy is "in the interests of national security".

That must be one of the most overworked and abused phrases in the world, as it can be held to cover anything that anyone wishes it to cover. Who actually defines national security? I would argue that possession of American nuclear weapons by this country is the gravest threat to our national security and that the sale of weapons to the middle east and South America also threatens our national security because it threatens peace and stability in those areas, but I suspect that the Minister and his supporters take a different view.

We believe that the words

are too wide and too vague. They are wide enough and vague enough to run the risk of misuse in any big brother, or indeed big sister, state. This is not a case in which we all know what we mean but find it difficult to agree an exact form of words. The Opposition believe that the definition in the Bill is drawn deliberately wide to give the Home Secretary maximum discretion. We do not believe that our freedom can or should be left in the hands, and resting on the judgment, of one individual. Our amendment therefore seeks to put more flesh on the concept of national security.

The definition in amendment No. 1 seeks to be more specific. It refers to "subversion, terrorism or espionage", which is what national security is generally assumed to be about—something separate from serious crime, although equally serious, and standing on those three legs. That being so, amendment No. 7 seeks to define what is meant by subversion. In the past few months, the Government have provided a wide variety of choice in terms of what constitutes subversion, but in our view none of those definitions are acceptable.

The recently published terms of reference for the three wise men state simply that a subversive group is subversive because it is "acknowledged as such by the Minister".

That is menacing in its starkness. It suggests that the Minister can say to an individual or group, "You are subversive because I say so." The opening paragraphs of the document make it clear that a person suspected or accused of being subversive does not even have to be a card-carrying member of an organisation held to be subversive. The document refers simply to suspected sympathies. That is further watered down by the words

"is susceptible to pressure from such organisations or groups"—— that is, those judged to be subversive.

That clearly and frighteningly opens the door to the advent of the thought police.

However, the position is even worse. Under the test of susceptibility to pressure, scarcely a Member of this House is not susceptible to pressure at some time or another. Pressure does not always walk up to hon. Members waving flags and identifying itself. We all at times run the risk of being taken in. That three-part test is rather dangerous.

The Home Office gave us a Christmas present in the form of the guidelines for the special branch. There we find that subversive activities are "those which threaten the safety or well being of the State, and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means".

That definition is far too wide. It is open to a wide variety of interpretations, not just by the Home Secretary but by any officer serving in the special branch of the 43 police forces. Day by day, such officers are called upon to make judgments against that guideline definition of subversion.

Amendment No. 7 makes it clear that we prefer that there should be in the test a mention of the lawfulness and unlawfulness of the action being taken or proposed to be taken. The Home Office definition uses such phrases as "safety or well being of the State".

We could probably stay here until Christmas trying to agree among ourselves what that phrase means.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman talks about the Home Office definition but he is quoting from the definition propounded by a Labour Minister, Lord Harris of Greenwich, in 1975.

Mr. Corbett: He was a Home Office Minister.

Mr. Waddington: I ask the hon. Gentleman not to talk about the Home Office definition as though we had propounded that definition in the last month or so. It was propounded by a Labour Government.

Mr. Corbett: The present proprietors of the Home Office have accepted that definition. The Opposition do not accept that Lord Harris's definition was meant to be given the solemnity and importance that is now claimed for it. It was given on the back of an answer to a random question in another place. That is why we do not attach to it the weight that the Minister seems to, and seems to think that we should.

Mr. Waddington: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to mislead the House. It must be within his knowledge that the Labour Government when in office followed that definition in exercising the powers to intercept.

Mr. Corbett: I accept that absolutely. As the Minister will have divined during the course of these debates, the Labour party sometimes tries to learn from experience when in government and from the mistakes that parties can make when in government. I tell the Minister once again that when we return to government we will change that definition.

Mr. Winnick: The Minister protests too much. When Lord Harris gave that definition, he did so as a Home Office Minister. It was a Home Office definition, albeit under the preceding Government. At no time, to the best of my knowledge, was that definition changed or debated in this House. It was accepted. There has been no parliamentary debate of the question whether there should be a different definition, or of the earlier one given by Lord Denning.

6.15 pm

Mr. Corbett: My hon. Friend is quite right, to the best of my knowledge.

We have said time and time again in the debates on the Bill and elsewhere that we do not like that definition and that we shall change it as soon as we have the chance. The definition is far too wide. It uses blanket phrases such as "the safety . . . of the State" and
"intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy".
It qualifies that phrase with the words
"by political, industrial or violent means".

As has already been said, many of us became active in Labour party politics precisely in order to use lawful political means in order to try to turn out the present Government by means of the ballot box and replace them. There is nothing wrong in that ambition, which was shared by hon. Members on the Conservative Benches when in opposition.

Mr. Cash: I may have missed it, but I cannot find the word "subversion" in the text of the Bill. It is in the amendment, but is it in the Bill?

Mr. Corbett: One of the purposes of the amendment is to define subversion within the Bill as an alternative to using blanket phrases such as "the interests of national security".

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman should refrain from attacking the Government for not including a definition that he would like to include in the Bill himself.

Mr. Corbett: I cannot satisfy the hon. Gentleman on that point. One of our complaints about the Bill is that the definitions are inadequate. In our view, there is no proper definition of subversion. I have quoted from documents. I will not weary the House by doing so again.

I have tried to place the amendments in the context of the proper concern of all of us to defend the rights of every individual citizen collectively and lawfully to challenge and try to change the policies of Governments of any colour. We believe that our alternative definition of subversion not only helps to make that clear but also underlines, restates and reaffirms the fact that that freedom is most important.

Mr. Waddington rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Waddington.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Waddington: I shall be happy to sit down again.

Mr. Winnick: If the Minister stands up, the debate is closed, I suppose.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot call an hon. Member who does not stand up.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Watford): The hon. Gentleman should wake up.

Mr. Winnick: The Government Whip seems to be even more vocal than usual, even though he never makes a speech.

The essence of much of the disquiet which exists about security matters is the question how subversion is interpreted by the security services. As the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) said an hour or so ago, there is a good deal of disquiet, even if it is more openly expressed on this side of the House than on the Government side. In my view, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) was absolutely right to say that the present definition of subversion must give rise to concern. Speaking in another place in February 1975, Lord Harris interpreted subversion as activities "which threaten the safety or well-being of the State, and which are intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 26 February 1975; Vol. 357, c. 947.]

That gives the security service a great deal of discretion, and far more than it should have. That is why, when I raised this matter on the Adjournment on the day that the House went into the Easter recess, I said that the definition of subversion was far too wide. It is all very well for the Minister to say that Lord Harris gave the definition when a Labour Minister, but he is no longer a member of the Labour party. I do not think that there is a great deal of regret about that. Moreover, as far as I am aware, the definition of subversion has never been debated in the House.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman missed the significance of what the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) said in reply to my intervention. He confessed that that definition had been expressed by a Labour Minister and that the Labour Government had operated their powers to intercept on the basis of that definition. That is the important thing to bear in mind.

Mr. Winnick: It is remarkable how Ministers pray the Labour Government in aid when they support Labour's activities. It is otherwise denunciation. I do not complain. The Minister is using whatever arguments he can find to advance his argument. Nevertheless, Lord Harris's definition of subversion was never debated, I believe, in the House. The matter affects citizens and civil rights and we should all be anxious about how such rights can be eroded or undermined. It must be right for the House to debate what the definition should be.

Mr. Cash: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like a debate on what subversion means, but it is the Opposition amendment which includes that word. It is impossible for us to deal with a debate in which the Opposition are attacking the Government for including in the Bill a word that does not appear in it.

Mr. Winnick: It might not appear in the Bill—I concede that point—but Ministers have stated, and the Home Secretary made it clear when he gave evidence in public session to the Home Affairs Select Committee, that the special branch works on the definition of subversion given by Lord Harris in February 1975. It is therefore reasonable to assume that when the special branch and the security services decide on these matters they will use that definition, which is the subject of a great deal of controversy.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman, when he is discussing definitions, tell us what espionage means as that word is in the amendment and is not defined?

Mr. Winnick: We are debating amendment No. 1 at the moment. Lord Denning gave a definition of subversion in the 1960s. Yesterday I prayed Lord Denning in aid on another matter and I am about to do so again now. He must think that he has a fan on the Labour Benches. With respect to his lordship, Lord Denning is not renowned for his pro-Labour movement sympathies. I imagine that even Conservative Members take him to be quite a safe person. Nevertheless, he gave a far clearer definition that Lord Harris. He defined a subversive as one who "would overthrow or contemplate the overthrow of Government by unlawful means".

That is very much in line with the amendment.

I should like the House to be reasonably satisfied that those who carry out these delicate and sensitive duties do not at the same time erode the rights of which my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) spoke. Such rights have been slowly built up over centuries. Is not the safeguarding of the rights of citizens one of our main responsibilities? Some time ago, I raised the case of Mrs. Haigh, who was interviewed and lied to by the special branch regarding letters that she had written about cruise missiles. Some people might ask, "What does one person matter?" Surely one person's civil liberties are as important as those of many.

Other matters which cause concern have come to light as well. The security services do not have the complete confidence of everyone. I accept that we must have a security service. When asked a few weeks ago whether I favoured a security service, I gave the obvious answer. I know of no country without one. We know how dictatorships operate, but democracies require a security service too. However, such a service would be in a stronger position if it had the confidence of the whole House and the public, and I am not satisfied that the security service understands or appreciates sufficiently the strong feelings about the right of dissent and the right to hold minority opinions.

About three months ago, the hon. Member for Stroud (Sir A. Kershaw), Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Select Committee, told the Home Secretary at Question Time that if these people—he did not qualify who they were—were not investigated, he wanted his money back. What was the reaction of Tory Members? They roared with laughter and approval. Included among them, I am afraid, was the Home Secretary. Some of the people under investigation are acting perfectly legally. They just happen to disagree with the Government on major issues, such as defence. Should they be subject to surveillance and investigation, simply because they disagree with the Government? The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) nods his head in agreement with that proposition. The difference between him and me is that I do believe in parliamentary democracy and people's rights that do not exist in eastern Europe or Latin America. I believe that people have a right to disagree and to express those opinions freely without being subject to investigation and surveillance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Walton has mentioned a section of the security service. On 4 April, I mentioned the F branch of MI5. F2 investigates trade unions and F7 investigates various other political groups. Apparently there is a special group of the F branch which investigates teachers, Members of Parliament, lawyers and journalists. Those allegations have been made——

Mr. Elden Griffiths: Allegations?

Mr. Winnick: Of course they are allegations. Am I supposed to go to MI5 or write the Director General a letter asking him to confirm them? Such things though cannot be dismissed out of hand.

If it is true that such a branch and such sub-branches exist, should we not be worried? Should we simply dismiss the allegations and say that, even if they are true, those sections of MI5 are justified? One of the functions of the House, I hope, is to safeguard civil liberties. We must be worried if there are civil servants in the security service with files on a very large number of people and groups. It is interesting that there has been no allegation that investigations are made into the Conservative party, the City or the stock exchange. If there were, would not Conservative Members be worried? Of course they would. They would be probing the issue and causing a fuss.

Mr. Cash: I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Bill provides for investigations into questions arising from economi., well-being, and the pointed remark which he has just made goes rather wider than the content of the Bill.

Mr. Winnick: That is a matter for the Chair. I do not think that we need a substitute Deputy Speaker in the form of the hon. Gentleman who has graced us by his presence.

I do not expect for a moment that the Minister will accept the amendment, because he does not believe in any form of parliamentary scrutiny of the security services. However, even though these amendments may be lost, I hope that they contain the sort of changes which the next Labour Government will be able to carry out. Given a tighter definition of subversion, one hopes that it will not be possible in future for Conservative Members, such as the Minister, to bait us on what the Labour party did when in office.

6.30 pm

Much has been said about those who want to undermine parliamentary democracy. Yet in the last few days it has been discovered—it is not an allegation but a confirmed fact—that someone working at the Department of Trade and Industry has a known Nazi past, has been involved in the most extreme Right-wing organisations, went to prison for Nazi activity and apparently even now is considering the formation of a new organisation based on race hate and fascism.

Despite all the talk about the need for a security service, which I accept, it is surprising that someone with such a background and involvement in extremist Right-wing politics, and who is a declared hater of blacks and Jews, should be a civil servant working in the Department of Trade and Industry. I wonder about the basis on which that gentleman was investigated, or do we take it that so long as someone has a Nazi background and has been to prison for Nazi activity, it is perfectly acceptable, whereas if someone is the general secretary of CND, files can be opened and such a person can be the subject of much gossip by special branch officers through interviewing a former editor of the CND journal?

Two laws seem to operate—one for those who carry out perfectly lawful responsibilities, and another for people on the extreme Right, such as the person I mentioned, who, according to the Department only yesterday, would continue in his job. There must be a much wider look at the security service. At the end of the day, steps should be taken to strengthen the rights of ordinary people, thereby allowing the security service to operate under a much tighter definition of subversion.

Mr. Mackenzie: I do not doubt that the intention behind the amendment is worthy, in that it seeks to strengthen the defence of the individual from unacceptable intrusions into privacy by the exercise of the Secretary of State's discretion. But from the way in which the amendment seeks to achieve its ends and the effect of its language, it is clear that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) is under a misconception.

The hon. Gentleman made an error in believing that the most effective way of protecting the citizen from an abuse of discretion is by seeking to narrow that discretion. As I said on Second Reading, senior Ministers who have the duty to authorise interception of communications must have a very wide—in many cases, almost unlimited—discretion, and the real protection of the individual from the abuse of power which such discretion makes possible is the ex post facto examination of the exercise of the discretion, provided in the Bill by the continuing role of the commissioner, and the right of access to a tribunal for a remedy.

The attempt to narrow the ambit of the Secretary of State's discretion in respect of clause 2(2)(a) should not be supported. Whether or not the amendment succeeds in narrowing the discretion is far from resolved by the speech of the hon. Member for Erdington. I do not believe it achieves the purpose which it seeks, nor do I believe that the definition in amendment No. 1—is narrower than that contained in the phrase "national security" which is in the Bill. Nothing that the hon. Gentleman has said has persuaded me that the Labour party would succeed in reducing the circumstances in which Secretaries of State might exercise their discretion if Parliament were to make the mistake of accepting the definition in amendment No. 1, which I consider to be verbose and unnecessary.

"for the defence of the realm or to prevent subversion, terrorism or espionage"—

The hon. Gentleman's apparent justification for the amendment was some dissatisfaction with the definition of subversion given by Lord Harris of Greenwich, a former Labour Minister, and acted upon by the Labour Government during their term of office.

The hon. Gentleman made an extraordinary point when he said that he and his colleagues had been elected to use political, industrial and other means to overthrow the Government.

Mr. Corbett: I did not say that.

Mr. Mackenzie: When the hon. Gentleman reads Hansard tomorrow, he will see that he said something like it.

Mr. Corbett: The point I was trying to make was that, by political means through the ballot box, we should try to throw out the Government.

Mr. Mackenzie: That reinforces my point. The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood Lord Harris's definition, which refers not to Government but to parliamentary democracy. It is wholly misconceived to seek to redefine subversion when that conceals the circumstances set out by Lord Harris, which do not need to be altered, activities intended to overthrow parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means are patently unlawful.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman does not do justice to himself, because the definition is in two parts and it is not even a question of either-or. The definition as a whole includes "activities . . . which threaten the safety or well being of the State", and which are also

"intended to undermine or overthrow Parliamentary democracy".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 26 February 1979; Vol. 397, c. 947.]

Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that there is no need for even a moment's hesitation and that no one but an idiot would conclude that trying to replace the Government through the ballot box came within Lord Harris's definition?

Mr. Mackenzie: I agree entirely with the Minister. I was merely focusing on the part of Lord Harris's definition which the hon. Member for Erdington addressed—his reference to the overthrow of parliamentary democracy.

The amendment dresses up a proposal which is somewhat misleading. On the face of it, the proposal seeks to narrow the Minister's discretion, but it does not achieve that. On the face of it, the proposal provides a remedy for the aggrieved citizen, but it does not achieve that. For those reasons, the House should reject the amendment.

Mr. Waddington: The question which the House is addressing is whether we can find a more appropriate phrase than "national security" when defining the Secretary of State's powers to issue warrants under clause 2.

First, the phrase "national security" is no stranger to us. It has appeared in many statutes over the years. It appeared in the Employment Protection Act 1975, in the Race Relations Act 1976, and in about 50 further Acts sprinkled through the statute books. No Government have found it necessary or appropriate to define the term, which Parliament has accepted as it is, when passing those Acts. By their nature, decisions about questions of national security must be for Ministers, who must form a judgment in the light of all the information available to them about what does or does not raise issues of national security. Uniquely, under the Bill there is an independent check on those decisions by the tribunal or the commissioner, who will be able to see all the facts.

Therefore, Parliament has less to complain about on this occasion than on previous occasions when the Labour Government were perfectly happy to put before Parliament Bills in which the phrase "national security" was used with no suggestion that any protection should be afforded to citizens lest the Labour Government should misconstrue the meaning of that expression.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: Given the fact that the Government are providing these new safeguards, is it not curious that the previous Administration, which operated Lord Harris's definition, at no time felt constrained to bring to the House legislation to deal with the problem about which Opposition Members now complain?

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend is right. We had this nonsense from the Opposition last year on the Data Protection Act 1984. Every sort of fiddling, piddling, ridiculous criticism was made of the Bill, but no explanation given why the Labour Government never introduced one when they were in power. Yet they now try to pose as the guardians of liberty. As they did nothing when they were in office, we can be excused for growing slightly irritated by their cant.

Secondly, the use of the phrase is appropriate because it properly reflects the way in which interception has been authorised by successive Governments of the Left and Right. It emphasises the important point that the Bill provides for no extension of existing practices. That is why I was glad to hear the reply of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) a few moments ago.

Thirdly, the use of the phrase "national security" is especially appropriate in the context of the Bill because article 8 of the convention on human rights refers to matters being done in the interests of national security. What could be more natural than for us to import into the Bill a phrase from the convention, when part of this exercise is to ensure that we conform to our obligations under the convention?

Fourthly, when I consider the Maxwell Fyfe directive, I can see why the formulation in the amendment was reached. However, it is obvious from all that the hon. Gentleman has said that there is a complete misconception by the Opposition. There is obviously more to preserving the nation's security than safeguarding against subversion, terrorism and espionage. I am taking not merely the narrow point that the amendment deals only with prevention and not with the detection of those who may have engaged in such activities — although it is extremely odd that detection should be omitted—but the point that the defence of the realm, which is one of the phrases that appears in the amendment, together with these words is of uncertain meaning. If, in this context, it means no more than defence against armed attack, the phrase is certainly not wide enough to cover all that it is necessary to do and that has previously been done.

I refer hon. Members to paragraph 10 of the White Paper published in February 1985. It states that interception is authorised

"in accordance with the Government's requirements for intelligence in support of its defence and foreign policies where . . . that . . ." is necessary in the interests of national security."

Interception may be necessary to protect our national security at international level to provide secret intelligence in the foreign and defence areas. Undoubtedly, the acquisition of such intelligence may sometimes be essential in the interests of national security. Without it, the Government's ability to safeguard the country's vital interests would be undermined in a way which I do not believe Opposition Members can intend. No previous Government have contemplated the sort of changes proposed in the amendment, and great harm would be done to our national interests if the amendment were carried.

I now turn to the question of subversion. First, I shall put into perspective the use of the power to intercept on this ground. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) was right continually to remind the House that at present the word "subversion" does not appear in the Bill. It is for the Secretary of State to decide whether a warrant is necessary in the interests of national security. The starting point is satisfaction in the mind of the Minister that interception is necessary. His view can be considered by the commissioner. If the commissioner gets it wrong, his view may be rejected by the tribunal, if a complaint is made to it by someone who is affected. Therefore, although Lord Harris's definition is a statement of cases within one limb of the national security test, it is not part of the Bill, and no definition of subversion is needed for the Bill to work effectively.

I shall now deal with the meaning of subversion, because the Opposition seek to incorporate a definition of it which not only does not correspond with Lord Harris's definition—we have gone over that so often that hon. Members must be tired of hearing that that is the case—but which is different from and far more limited than the one that they sought to incorporate in Committee. I remind the House that they then defined subversion as "having in contemplation the overthrow of the Government."

Now they say that that is wrong and that subversion exists only when there is an attempt. Even more strangely, they say that it should not be an attempt to overthrow a Government, only to overthrow a Parliament.

Can one imagine anything more ridiculous? So tight is the definition which they are now trying to persuade Parliament to accept that it is hard to see how anything could be subversion under this definition except the gunpowder plot. It is sheer nonsense, and we have better things to do in the House than to debate sheer nonsense. There can be no doubt that those changes would make far more difficult the task——

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Surely the gunpowder plot was an attempt to blow up the House of Lords. I thought that was the policy of the Opposition.

Mr. Waddington: That may be so, but it is absurd that they should put down an amendment on Report which is entirely contrary to what they said in Committee.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the last time there was an attempt to put down such an amendment was during the interregnum, when Cromwell was in charge of things?

Mr. Waddington: I shall not indulge in a dissertation on the history of the Commonwealth. I intend to draw my remarks to a close, which will no doubt give much satisfaction to the House. I am sure that hon. Members will not hesitate a moment before rejecting the most absurd amendment that has been tabled during the proceedings on this Bill.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Tim Sainsbury and
Mr. Donald Thompson.

Question accordingly negatived.

Sir Philip Goodhart: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 23 at end insert

'or unless the persons whose transmissions by post or whose communications by a public telecommunications system are the subject of a warrant are officials of any Government department or of Her Majesty's Armed Forces or of any police force, who are authorised to receive and read information that for the time being is classified as secret.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 29 at end insert—

'(5) No warrant shall be needed to intercept the communications of any public servant who is entitled to read Government documents classified "secret".'.

Sir Philip Goodhart: In the debate on the previous amendments, my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) pointed out that the word "subversion" does not have any part in the Bill, although all the speeches from the Labour Benches, without exception, have touched on the subject of subversion, in one way or another.

The amendments which I and my hon Friend the member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) have tabled are not concerned with trying to draw up guidelines on tapping the telephones of business men or of trade union leaders who may be conspiring with agents of foreign countries to do damage to the country. We are not concerned with trying to draw up guidelines to exclude or include members of organisations which may be seeking to dismantle the defences of the country.

The amendments reflect the concern of my hon. Friend and myself that we should do nothing in the Bill that makes it more difficult to track down spies and traitors who have high position in the public service. We are anxious that we should not inadvertently make it more difficult to unmask what the headline writers in the popular press would call "traitors in high places". No one has to seek employment in that part of the public service which entitles him to work with secret material. Those who choose to undertake this work, whether it be in the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign Office, GCHQ or the Underwater Research Establishment at Portland, are generally required to undergo some form of security vetting.

Despite that, within the past few years, vetted employees from all these establishments have been convicted of espionage. Therefore, it seems probable that our vetting procedures need some improvement and change from time to time. I do not see why the routine random tapping of personal communication should not be part of the continuous vetting system.

Mr. Golding: Would this category include all members of the Privy Council?

Sir Philip Goodhart: I see no reason why anybody working with secret material should be excluded.

I am concerned that the Bill will inadvertently make it more difficult to introduce such random taps, so my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds and I have put down these amendments. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) in everything that he has said. I recognise that he is suffering from a temporary disability, which I am sure will disappear quickly, and that the brevity of his speech reflected that. He had a great deal more to say and no doubt he would have said it if he had been able to do so.

My hon. Friend and I seek to tackle the problem of traitors and spies at very high levels within the Government. Our view is that we need to do a better job of discovering those spies and traitors who exist, or have existed, in high places, and also of preventing their activities being used to damage the highest interests of the state.

I start by defining the problem. The external threat from the Soviet bloc intelligence services remains undiminished. The internal threat has become more varied and grown more serious. The fall in Communist party membership

"has been accompanied by the proliferation of new subversive groups of the extreme Left and the extreme Right (mainly the former) whose aim is to overthrow democratic parliamentary government in this country by violent or other unconstitutional means, not shrinking, in the case of the most extreme groups, from terrorism to achieve their aims. They might well seek to make public information that is injurious to the interests of this country, not at the behest or for the benefit of any foreign power, but simply to harm this country itself, whether by causing a rift between it and its allies or otherwise, and by these means to weaken its defences against the overthrow of democratic government here by force."

Those are the words of the Security Commission as quoted to the House in the White Paper laid by the Prime Minister in 1981-82. To summarise what it says, both the external threat and the internal threat are serious and growing.

Nor is that the only definition of the threat to which the amendments are addressed. Only 18 months ago we had information in a further report of the Security Commission dealing with the damage caused by the spy and traitor, Geoffrey Prime. We read in paragraph 5.22 of the 1983 report of the Security Commission:

"In the course of Prime's employment both in the RAF and in GCHQ . . . he had access to information of the very highest secrecy. An account of the information which we believe Prime passed to the Russians and our assessment of the damage he caused are set out in Appendix D."

Quite rightly, appendix D was never published, but we get some inkling of what it contains from paragraph 1.6 of the same report of the Security Commission:

"The disclosures following Prime's trial naturally occasioned the gravest public disquiet that a traitor involved in the most secret intelligence work should have for so long escaped discovery. Moreover the extent of the injury to the public interest was greatly magnified by the fact that United States secrets had been no less gravely compromised than our own."

There can be no doubt that the problem which my hon. Friend and I are addressing in these amendments is very real. Nor are these the only examples where people in high positions have behaved as spies and traitors.

There was the extraordinary case of Commander Trestrail, though I ought not perhaps to apply the words "spy" or "traitor" to him. A police officer appointed to safeguard in the first instance the Duke of Edinburgh and subsquently the Queen, Trestrail was in no sense a traitor or a spy. But he was a personality who could, because of his sexual proclivities, have been capable of being blackmailed, as has happened in other cases.

According to the report of the Security Commission, at the time that Trestrail was originally engaged to safeguard Her Majesty, he had not been positively vetted. That is most peculiar when one remembers that all members of the special branch who are engaged in protecting foreign

[Mr. Eldon Griffiths]

Heads of State or Heads of Government when they are in Britain are positively vetted. Trestrail at the material time was not, though I should add that since then the Metropolitan police have imposed positive vetting on all members of the royalty protection squad.

7.15 pm

I mention a number of other individuals of whom I have had some passing personal experience. During the 1950s, when I worked in the United States, I came into contact from time to time with senior members of the British diplomatic service working in the British embassy. I am not sure whether I ever met Burgess and Maclean together, but from time to time I had contact with both. Neither of those two was ever imagined by me or any of their colleagues to be traitors or spies, but we now know that they were.

Subsequently, it was widely argued in the United States that there was a third man—a third traitor and spy.

Mr. Golding: What are we to make of this hon. Member who claims the acquaintanceship of those two spies and then puts up a smokescreen about a third man?

Mr. Griffiths: It was bruited about in the United States, especially in the intelligence community, that there was a third man. At the time that was denied by the Foreign Office, the Ministry of Defence and members of the security service. Subsequently we discovered that Kim Philby, whom I also met, was a spy and a traitor. If it helps the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) with his interventions, I may say that a former British ambassador, whom I know well, shocked me the other day by asking me whether I remembered when we had last met. I replied that I did not. He said, "It was when I gave you lunch in Beirut with Kim Philby." I had forgotten the incident.

My point is that Burgess, Maclean and Philby were all spies in high places and that they did irreparable damage to our country. They were members of the foreign service, but there were others in the defence services. I think of Vassall and of Blake, and since then we have had the shocking case of Geoffrey Prime.

I make one specific point about the Prime case to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, who I am glad to see in his place. The allegations about spying in the security services, notably in the book by Mr. Chapman Pincher, were examined very carefully by the Security Commission. My right hon. and learned Friend will recall that in May 1982 the Diplock Security Commission reported to the Prime Minister and that the Prime Minister, who has been more open about the procedures of the Security Commission than any other British Prime Minister, told the House in her White Paper of May 1982:

"The procedures as they have been applied . . . have worked well."

She added that the present system of security was well conceived and operated effectively. Unfortunately, as we discovered some nine months later, that conclusion was not accurate. It was then discovered that, despite the investigations that the Security Commission itself had conducted, Geoffrey Prime was still at work, undetected.

It is right to remind the House that, as the White Paper of that day made clear, there had been an investigation by the Security Commission which lasted nine months and involved 32 meetings and interviews with 36 witnesses, among whom, I must suppose, since the Security Commission was conducting the investigation, were the heads of all our counter-espionage services. At the end of that investigation, the Security Commission gave the Prime Minister its considered assessment of the efficacy of the vetting arrangements set up after Radcliffe and applied throughout Geoffrey Prime's career. That assessment said all was well. But that assessment turned out to be wrong. It did not uncover Geoffrey Prime, but it should have done so.

If the security services had had better instrumentalities, would they have been able to do the job that they failed to do? The Security Commission concluded that at the time there were no available resources whereby Prime's treachery could have been detected—save only perhaps the polygraph. I understand that experiments as to the efficacy of the polygraph are continuing and, no doubt at some stage, the Home Secretary or the Prime Minister will give us the conclusions. However, I believe that, if the security services had had available to them the powers proposed in the amendment, there would in fact have been a much greater chance that they would have apprehended Prime during his period at GCHQ. No one can be certain that that would have happened but the chances would have been far better if it had been axiomatic that no person handling intelligence material at the level that was available to Prime should be immune from having his telephone tapped.

The central point of the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham and myself is that too many of the acts of treason and espionage that have come to light have been conducted by people at the very highest levels.

Mr. Corbett: From public schools.

Mr. Griffiths: I accept that. Too many of them have been from public schools. Too many have come from the Oxbridge background. But that is in no way an indictment of public schools or Oxbridge. What matters is that too many of these acts of espionage and subversion have come from those occupying positions in which they have access to information that is classified for the time being as secret.

Those who join the police service put aside most of their personal civil liberties, and rightly so. From the moment of engagement, a police officer may join no trade union, engage in no politics, affiliate to no political or trade union organisation. He must live where he is told and be available 24 hours a day. Certain officers too, are covered by the Official Secrets Act 1911, and that is entirely correct. It is a precondition of the policeman's employment that he should accept the restrictions imposed on his civil liberties that are necessary for him to do his job properly.

We are now asking in these amendments that another category of public servant at the highest level should accept as a condition of employment that some of the civil liberties that are available to the generality of people must be forgone. It is a proper and reasonable condition of service that those at the most senior levels in the Ministry of Defence, in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, perhaps in GCHQ, and certainly in the Atomic Energy Authority, and any of the agencies that are to be engaged in space, especially where they collaborate with the Americans in the strategic defence initiative, should be asked, as a condition of taking on their post, to put aside the civil liberties that the rest of us enjoy—the right not to have our communications intercepted when suspicion justifies interception.

Mr. Golding: Do the hon. Members for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Griffiths) and for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) include Privy Councillors? Do they include the Home Secretary in this category?

Mr. Griffiths: As drafted, my amendment does not. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham, I have no inherent objection to that, but I should like to hear the arguments for such an inclusion.

The House is naturally concerned with striking the subtle and difficult balance between civil liberties and the proper preservation of the security of the democratic state. That balance will constantly concern us. It is the nature of political dialogue that one side of the House will tend to lean a little more one way and the other side a little more the other way. But not all civil liberties are the civil liberties of individuals. The civil liberty of the community must also be protected against subversion, aggression, terrorism, drugs and war. In the 21 years that I have been a Member, rarely has a Home Secretary had to pilot through the House the welter of legislation introduced by the present Home Secretary, and I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on it. In virtually all that legislation—the Data Protection Act 1984, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and the Prosecution of Offences Bill—we have been concerned at every point with the balance between the liberty of the individual and the proper protection of the rights and liberties of the community.

If the amendment is accepted and those who handle secret information no longer have absolute rights, the security services will be better able to ensure that the freedoms of the community — not to be terrorised, subverted, subjected to violence or the importation of drugs on a large scale and not to see the enemies of democracy triumph — are equally protected. The amendment is worth pursuing on that ground.

Mr. Golding: The hon. Gentleman persists in saying "the amendment". Is he aware that there are two amendments on the amendment paper in his name? Is he aware that we are debating both? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that amendment No. 3 refers to public servants who are entitled to read Government documents? Does that not relate to the Home Secretary? Is it not odd that we should discuss giving people the right to tap the Home Secretary's telephone without the Home Secretary's knowledge?

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman is quite properly a stickler for precision, and I do not complain about that. My name appears at the top of the amendment that is confined to officials. It would exclude from the protection of the clause those persons who are

"officials of any Government department or of Her Majesty's Armed Forces or of any police force".

The name of my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham appears at the top of the amendment dealing with "the communications of any public servant".

I acknowledge that there is a slight difference. I am speaking to my amendment, but, in its wisdom, the Chair has judged that we should debate both amendments together.

7.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I regard the speech of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmudnds (Mr. Griffiths) as odious. He was moving a repulsive amendment. It is intolerable for him, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding), to weasel out of his responsibilities for amendment No. 3. Only two hon. Members have signed it. One is the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart) and the other is himself. The hon. Gentleman cannot pretend that, because the two amendments are linked, and he is speaking to the one on which his name comes top, he is dissociated from the other amendment, which, as I shall seek to point out, bears the interpretation to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention.

I described the speech of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds as odious because it was deliberate sensation-mongering. He decided to drag Mr. Trestrail's name through the mud. Mr. Trestrail has suffered all that he should be required to suffer after the episode in which he was involved. It was a regrettable and unhappy episode. It is monstrous of the hon. Gentleman to drag that man's name through the mud when he is in no way involved with the subject matter of the two amendments, however the hon. Gentleman defines them. It is a disgraceful abuse of parliamentary privilege to pillory an individual who has suffered a great deal.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: I made it crystal clear that Commander Trestrail was in no way involved in espionage or treachery. My point—it bears repeating as the right hon. Gentleman was signing his letters at the time and apparently did not listen—was that if there had been telephone interception of Commander Trestrail's conversations, his peculiar proclivities would undoubtedly have been picked up.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman is therefore seeking to have people's communications intercepted on a basis far wider than has been proposed by almost anyone. The hon. Gentleman is proposing that someone should have his telephone or letters stopped not because he has committed or is likely to commit a crime but because he is a potential security risk on the basis of a social bias against some sexual activities. I regard that as utterly abominable. On that basis, almost anyone vulnerable in that way can have his telephone tapped or letters intercepted.

I made that point because it will not do in the House for us to seek sensational headlines by dragging along the names of all those spies about whom people like to write newspaper articles. It was disgraceful of the hon. Gentleman to do that. When we speak in the House, we should take account of the feelings of those whose names we mention. If there is no overriding public reason to do so, we should exhibit some fastidiousness. The hon. Gentleman's fastidiousness has now gone below zero.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Mr. Prime. That strikes me as nuts. It is bananas. Mr. Prime, or any serious spy, will not speak on the telephone. A non-serious spy will speak on the telephone to be intercepted in the way that the hon. Gentleman wants, but serious spies have other ways in which to communicate with one another.

All of us who have served in Government and who have travelled abroad on Government service have had our security briefings. That is why——

Mr. Griffiths: The right hon. Gentleman has made personal animadversions. May I quote the words of the Security Commission dealing with the interception of communications? The commission said:

"The criminal and the wrongdoer should not be allowed to use services"— that refers to telephone services—

"provided by the State for wrongful purposes quite unimpeded; and the police . . . and the Security Service ought not to be deprived of an effective weapon in their efforts to preserve and maintain order for the benefit of the community."

It is the Security Commission and not I that is saying that telephone interception could be effective in the case of traitors, including Prime. The right hon. Gentleman should do his homework before he makes such allegations.

Mr. Kaufman: The Security Commission says that they should not have the use of those media of communication. The hon. Gentleman should have tabled an amendment providing that all spies should have their telephones cut off.

The amendment is not just extraordinary objectionable; it is stupid. It is stupid when it comes from two hon. Members who have served in Government. If the hon. Gentlemen were new Back Benchers I could understand them—I should not sympathise; I should still deplore them — tabling such an amendment. Both hon. Gentlemen — in particular the hon. Member for Beckenham, who has served in the Northern Ireland Office — are aware, as I am, how enormously wide a circulation documents marked "secret" have. Junior civil servants see documents marked "secret" the whole time. Civil servants of higher executive officer level see documents marked "secret".

A document is not secret because it is marked "secret". A document is classified as "secret" because it is marked "secret". Anyone who has served in Government—I did for five years and my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme did—knows that the most trivial documents are marked "secret", for reasons that I have never been able to understand.

The Home Secretary clearly told us that there are four classifications of documents. I think that there is probably a fifth, but not for the likes of me as I then was. The four categories are restricted, secret, top secret and commercially confidential.

My experience in Government was that a restricted document was one which, if one dropped it in the street and it was picked up by a reporter from the Daily Mail, he would throw away as being too boring. If someone dropped a document marked "secret" in the street and it was picked up by a reporter from The Sunday Times, it might be examined with some interest to see whether it would make a paragraph in an inside story.

Most Government documents are over-classified. That being so, the amendment would make it possible for the security services — without applying to the Home Secretary because no warrant needs to be issued—to intercept the communications of someone who has regular access to documents marked "secret". It would make it possible for most civil servants to have their telephones tapped without the Home Secretary knowing anything about it.

The Home Secretary and I have our differences, and we shall continue to have them, but I take seriously what he said. I know that he has said conscientiously that every time he is asked to sign a warrant for an interception of communication he deals with it with enormous care. He does not deal with it, as we know, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) said in Committee, as a Minister in the Home Office. It is not a Home Office responsibility. It is not a responsibility that the Home Secretary can hand on to his hon. Friend the Minister of State or anyone else. It is his personal responsibility as Home Secretary. It is a private and important responsibility. It is a responsibility—whatever we may think of the outcome of any Home Secretary's decision—exercised with great restraint.

To insert in the Bill an amendment which would take away the Home Secretary's right to decide about warrants and allow the security services to tap a telephone or intercept letters on the basis merely of someone having access to secret documents could mean that tens of thousands of taps would take place without the Home Secretary knowing and using his judgment about them. That would immensely widen the scope for interception. It would also remove any ministerial responsibility from most telephone tapping. It would be a police state development with the most serious consequences. I am convinced that it would be as intolerable to this Government as it would be intolerable to a Government formed by the Opposition.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds was completely wrong and my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme was absolutely right on the question whether Ministers could have their telephones tapped. Amendment No. 3 is poorly drafted as well as repulsive in content. It refers to "any public servant". Ministers are certainly public servants. They may not be civil servants but they are public servants. If they are not public servants, what on earth are they? If the amendment were to become part of an Act of Parliament, it would be open to MI5 to decide that any right hon. or hon. Member on the Conservative Front Bench could have his telephone tapped and his letters intercepted.

There is another danger of a contrary kind. That is the temptation for those who are responsible for classifying documents to classify them as secret in order to allow communications to be intercepted. The hon. Members who have put their names to this horrible amendment know very well that it is not Ministers who decide the classification. As a Minister of State, I was responsible for areas of great confidentiality, even though a good deal of the material was over-classified. The documents arrived on my desk classified.

This is another area in which Ministers, if they wished —to give them credit, I do not think they would—could classify documents as secret as a way round the other criteria in the Bill for allowing communications to be intercepted. It would also be possible for other public servants, other civil servants or senior civil servants to have documents classified as secret in order to have the communications of colleagues intercepted. Hon. Members may say that that is fantasy. I hope it is, but it is what the Act of Parliament would say if the amendments were made.

There is among some hon. Members a kind of spy mania or security mania. Of course we all want to deal with enemies of the state; of course we want to prevent important state secrets being spied upon by people and then communicated to external enemies of our society; of course we all want that, and it is essential to have an apparatus that brings it about. The Opposition have never said or implied otherwise at any stage during the passage of the Bill. But to widen on an enormous scale, in massively outwardly radiating concentric circles, the number of people whose civil liberties are to be interfered with, because they might conceivably have access to documents which are over-classified in any case, is pushing things too far.

As the Home Secretary said on Second Reading, and as he said previously when he made his statement on the White Paper, the power with which the Bill deals is an unattractive power. Governments say that they do not want it. It is a power that they should not want. It is a power that, if used at all, should be used to the minimum extent necessary consonant with the security of the state and the detection of serious crime—which the Government, we are glad to say, have been able to re-define as the Bill has proceeded.

Let us remember what the Bill is about. It is not about having some kind of McCarthyite phobia, although the two hon. Members whose names appear on the amendments seem to believe that it is. On Second Reading, the Home Secretary said that it was the first statutory restriction on the interception of communications, and that is what it should be. We have serious differences across the Floor of the House as to whether the restriction is tight enough, but the amendments are not about the restriction of interception of communications. They are about widening the interception of communications to an extent which would cause delight if it were available in Moscow or any of the Eastern bloc countries, in South Africa, Chile, or any totalitarian country of any kind. We are utterly opposed to providing this Government with totalitarian powers, and we very much trust that the Government will tell the House that they do not want such powers.

Mr. Waddington: I shall not follow the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman),who, from time to time, rather exaggerates. I do not believe for one moment that my hon. Friends can be accused of being odious or of deliberate sensation-mongering. We all know that the right hon. Member is a past master in overworked abuse and snide and silly remarks. He uttered a few last week. Those who live in glass houses should not cast stones.

Clearly, the Government cannot accept the amendments. I appreciate my hon. Friends' concern about the menace of treachery. It behoves us all to recognise the dangers and to encourage continual vigilance, but the Bill is surely right not to single out any category of people as being either especially liable to interception or as being especially protected from it. Surely the object of the exercise must be to establish clearly in the statute the grounds on which interception can be authorised. If the criteria set by the Bill are right, and if the arrangements for operating the system are correct, no one should need special protection or be specially liable to have interception directed against him. Surely the question here is whether we have the criteria right. We believe that we have.

My hon. Friends are rightly concerned about treachery, and they see the amendments as a means of deterring it. The powers in the Bill allow all proper steps to be taken. Espionage, of course, is a crime and is therefore covered by clause 2(2). Treachery must be covered by national security in clause 2(2)(a). The Bill does not provide for speculative interception for the purpose of deterring treachery, and two questions obviously arise. First, is it right that interception should be used in that speculative way? Secondly, if it is, is it likely in any event that it would have any practical effect?

With regard to the second question, a large number of Crown servants have access to secret material. Would it be a sensible use of resources to have their communications dipped into occasionally as a matter of routine? Obviously it could be only occasionally, because there are so many of them. The right hon. Gentleman is at least right on this. Any person seriously bent on treachery would know that because of his position he was in that category of persons liable to have their communications dipped into from time to time. If he were up to no good, he would not use the public system. Therefore, the effect of the amendments might be to make such a person even more difficult to catch, and would have exactly the opposite effect to that which presumably my hon. Friends are after.

There are two other relevant points. It is at least doubtful whether, under the European convention, speculative interception of a certain class of people would be deemed by the European Court to be "necessary in a democratic society."

I refer there to the article concerned. Secondly, we are all agreed that interception is distasteful. Therefore, we have set out to make it subject to special controls and safeguards.

That is what the legislation is about. The effect of the amendments would be to remove all safeguards from this type of interception—there would be no warrants from the Secretary of State and no tribunal. To do that would be to defeat the whole purpose of the Bill. We could not possibly go down that road. As a Government, we are proud of the fact that we are introducing a measure which, while giving adequate powers to the Secretary of State in regard to telephone tapping, at the same time provides new safeguards for citizens.

I respect the reasons why the amendments have been tabled. I share the view of my hon. Friends on the need to take adequate steps to safeguard national security, but I think I have made it abundantly plain that the amendments run entirely counter to the central theme of the legislation.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: It was never the intention of my hon. Friend or myself to press the amendments to a Division. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) totally misconceived the purpose of our amendments. He was characteristically assassinatory in his ugly and repulsive remarks, which I reject. In view of what my hon. and learned Friend has said, and in view of the fact that I am sure that the Home Secretary has apprehended the point made by my hon. Friend and myself that we are looking for the utmost diligence by the Government to ensure that we do not have more such cases, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman cannot do that, because he did not move the amendment.

Sir Philip Goodhart indicated assent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see that the hon. Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), who moved the amendment, wishes to withdraw it. Is it the pleasure of the House that the amendment be withdrawn?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

The Tribunal

Mr. Golding: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 5, line 27, leave out

'sent to or by him'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 10, in page 6, line 31, at end insert

'or

'(iii) an applicant specifies or describes to the Tribunal a person or address specified or described in the warrant;'.

No. 11, in page 6, line 36, at end insert

'or if an applicant specifies or describes to the Tribunal an address used as mentioned in paragraph (a)(ii) above which is specified or described in the certificate.'.

I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House if we discuss at the same time Government amendment No. 8.

Mr. Golding: It is with some trepidation, and before he goes, that I thank the Home Secretary for placing amendment No. 8 on the Amendment Paper. The last time I was accused by the Home Secretary, wrongly as the record shows, of adding to what he had said. Sadly, my blameless life has been littered with such unjust accusations. I seem to upset equally the Militant newspaper, Tribune, the New Statesman and now the Home Secretary when I adopt a reasonable, moderate, middle of the road approach.

However, I want to thank the Home Secretary once again, whether or not I upset him. Perhaps he has left the Chamber to avoid being upset by my thanks. I thank him because the employees of British Telecom and the Post Office have wished for many years to be able to report unauthorised tapping without risk of prosecution under the Official Secrets Act. Following a little gentle persuasion, the Home Secretary has removed that threat.

To avoid adding to what the Home Secretary has said, I shall try to summarise the position. The Minister can indicate whether I have it right. As I understand it, if an employee of the Post Office or British Telecom believes that the law has been broken — this Bill will make unauthorised tapping an offence — he or she may complain to the police. A person who makes a complaint to the police about a breach of the law will not be liable to prosecution under the Official Secrets Act. I want to get this clear so that we know the precise position when we come to the tribunal.

Under the Bill, I understand that information can be given to the commissioner because it is called for or volunteered, and the person who gives it need not fear prosecution under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. It is expected that the commissioner will express his requirement for information and documents in general terms. As the Home Secretary said:

> "Anyone in possession of information which he thinks is relevant to the commissioner, even if he has not been asked for it, would be authorised to disclose it, and therefore not be guilty of an offence under section 2. If there were any doubt, the person need only tell the commissioner that he is in possession of relevant information or documents and the commissioner will ensure that his requirement is framed, or reframed, in terms which cover those circumstances. It is inconceivable that that would not be done."

Under the amendment that the Government have tabled, Post Office and BT employees required to give information to the tribunal could do so without fear of prosecution. As I understand it, that is the position. I do not think that I have added to what the Home Secretary said. If I have, I will readily give way to the Minister of State. That represents an important improvement for employees of British Telecom and the Post Office whom I represent as a union official.

Although I do not wish to detract from that, important questions remain. One relates to the security clearance of BT and Post Office staff. It is rumoured that the Government aim to introduce vetting even into the privatised BT. That is a matter of great concern to the National Communications Union, the new name for the enlarged Post Office Engineering Union.

Perhaps the Minister of State will answer my questions. Are the rumours about the extension of vetting true? How wide will the vetting be? In what circumstances will it take place? Following a point made earlier, will those who have been educated at public school and Cambridge be refused the right to climb the telegraph poles of BT, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) used to do? The union is concerned about civil liberties, and I express that concern today.

I am sceptical about the reliability and effectiveness of our security officers. I remember being lectured by a young man in 1964, when I was a Government Whip, on how to spot a Communist. Some of us had been putting the black spot on members of the Communist party long before that security officer had gone to school. He was ill-informed.

The sight of the Social Democratic party Member reminds me of my interrogation on going into the Department of Employment. What a farce it was. The security snoop asked me if I had ever belonged to a progressive organisation. I was able to tell him that there were thousands of people who would willingly testify to the fact that I had never had a progressive thought in my head. He persisted. He asked, "What about the 'troops out' movement?" I told him that the only person I knew who supported the "troops out" movement was Jim Wellbeloved and that the Prime Minister had just put him into the Ministry of Defence, at which the security officer sloped off. I presumed that he had gone to screen my right hon. Friend who was then Prime Minister. I have not been impressed so far by the screenings that I have had from the security forces.

Our union is opposed to the vetting of British Telecom staff because of the implications for civil liberties. The theme of civil liberties brings me to tribunals. I find it difficult to understand why they have been given such a narrow remit, and I do not know whether they will work. The Home Secretary described the work of the tribunals in these terms:

> "It must decide whether official interception has taken place — a relatively simple matter — and whether it should have taken place in the sense of the Secretary of State acting reasonably in applying the criteria when he issues the warrant." —[Official Report, 3 April 1985; Vol. 76, c. 1297-8.]

It would make sense for the tribunals to receive complaints about any interception, passing them to the police if they found them to be illegal and dealing with them themselves if they were authorised.

What is to happen if a complainant is being tapped illegally? Is his only recourse to the police? If the answer to that question is yes, that is undesirable. It would be far better for the tribunal to be able to receive a complaint of any interception and then for officers of the tribunal, having made internal inquiries, to have the power either to proceed with the examination themselves or to refer the matter to the police or the commissioner. I do not see why it is not possible to take complaints about illegal interception to the tribunal. I am not arguing that the tribunals should deal with them, but it is unreasonable that somebody somewhere, who fears that he is being intercepted, has to decide whether the tap is illegal or authorised.

This is the purpose of the amendments in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam). It should be possible for people other than the person whose phone calls or post are being intercepted to refer matters to a tribunal. I think in particular of employees of BT and the Post Office. For example, a tap might be placed on the phone of the convener of a big factory or, worse still, a tap might be placed on the phone of the political officer of the National Communications Union engineering group—to wit, the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme. What should the BT engineer assume? Let us say that the BT engineer, in either Newcastle-under-Lyme or Hanwell, comes across the tap on my phone. What should he do? How should he behave? Is he to conduct his own inquiries among his colleagues as to whether the tap is authorised or unauthorised?

When the engineer comes across the interception in the normal course of his duties, he immediately starts to ask questions of himself. To determine whether the tap is authorised or unauthorised — there are different procedures now for the two cases that I have mentioned —should the engineer go round his colleagues asking, "Has anybody seen a warrant? Who signed that warrant? When was that warrant produced? By whom was it produced?" Should he do that? It hardly seems desirable. In any case, I do not want engineers going round asking, "Is it official that Golding is tapped?", because that will bring only one response.

How will that person make a judgment? Our secret police may just want to know about wage claims and strike plans from the convener. If they tapped my phone, all that they would find out about would be racing tips—losing racing tips — and good fishing venues. It would be reasonable for the BT engineer to ask, "Is that why the phone is being tapped? Are those security officers hoping to find out who will win the National or the Derby? Is that reasonable?" On the other hand, he may decide that the security service and the Home Secretary have real fears that these pillars of the establishment are subversives. How is the BT engineer to know, on coming across the interception? One thing I know is that unless our members are absolutely certain that a tap is illegal, they will not go to the police. Even if they think that it is illegal, they will be reluctant because BT and Post Office employees do not want to be involved with the special branch in any shape or form.

I say that knowing that in Staffordshire the special branch has always treated me very well. Perhaps that is because they have been informed incorrectly by the Young Socialists that I am an agent of the CIA. Certainly it has not been the experience of all my colleagues that they have had such good relations with the special branch as I have had. Many of my colleagues in the union would not wish to report to the police what they only suspected were illegal acts. They are much more likely to go to the commissioner, and far more likely still to be prepared to go to a local tribunal, particularly if they can be reassured in an off-the-record initial discussion of the confidentiality involved.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I am following my hon. Friend's line of argument closely. He knows that my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) and I used to be employed by British Telecom, and we are familiar with many of the things that used to go on in security. I am interested to listen to my hon. Friend describe the series of options that he feels might be available to our colleagues in the industry. My initial reaction to what he has said is that I should have thought that at least there should some proper guidance to members of BT on the right course of action that they should take. If I were still working in BT and in my duties as a telecommunications engineer I had come across a tap of someone's phone, my instinctive reaction would be to report it to my first line supervisor. Is that what my hon. Friend is suggesting we should do, or should there be clearer lines of communication on how we should go about investigating whether that tap is illegal?

Mr. Golding: Perhaps I can explain to my hon. Friend that when he was more happily engaged — perhaps "engaged" is the wrong word—on his honeymoon, I was being reassured by the Home Secretary that our members could go to the commissioner. I shall refer to the point about the first line supervisor later. My advice to our members at the moment would be, "Do not go to the first line supervisor. If you have doubts, go immediately to the commissioner and, if the Government permit it, to the tribunal."

Incidentally, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will have noticed the caution of my hon. Friend. He said that he was employed by BT. Yes, he was. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon actually worked for the Post Office. Confidentiality is important.

My hon. Friend said that the Government should give an assurance that no internal disciplinary action will be taken against staff by management. In Committee, the Home Secretary was silent on this point. I hope that the Minister of State will not be silent upon it tonight. There is no point in the Home Secretary saying to British Telecom and Post Office employees, "In no way will you be subject to the Official Secrets Act if you give information to the commissioner or the tribunal," if there is any risk that, after providing such information, they can be made subject to internal disciplinary action. The Government must face that fact. There ought to be an absolutely explicit understanding that if employees respond in the way that the Home Secretary said they should, their action will not be the subject of internal disciplinary action by the management of BT and the Post Office.

The Government ought to respond to that point. Otherwise, what advice can be given to our members when they ask whether they should co-operate with the commissioner or the tribunal? Of course we should be able to say to them that in no way will they suffer as a result of action taken under the Official Secrets Act or disciplinary action taken by management. However, if there is any risk that they will suffer from providing such information, we must advise them to be cautious. The Minister must recognise that this is a very important point.

The members of the National Communications Union are more likely to go to a local tribunal, and they should be allowed to do so directly. It is madness for the procedure to depend upon the victim suspecting that his mail is being intercepted or that his phone is being tapped, because the temptation will be for those who find the taps to tip off the victim. That does not make sense and it is undesirable, particularly if there are good reasons for the interception. What applies to communications with the commissioner should also apply to communications with the tribunal. There ought not to be the temptation to leak information to a journalist, to friends of the suspect, or to the suspect himself. It ought to be possible for the BT engineer or the Post Office employee to go direct to the tribunal.

That, of course, will widen the area for complaints. However, complaints are more likely to be soundly based if they are made by those inside rather than outside the business. As the Minister knows, one can quickly find out whether tapping is taking place. In any case, there is bound to be the problem of ill-founded complaints from very unstable people, but it is a price that has to be paid.

I hope that the Government will take these practical, not party, points very seriously. I have put the facts to the Minister as they have been put to me by honest people who are very worried about this matter. I do not expect an immediate response from the Government. I am grateful to the Home Secretary for tabling an amendment which will provide protection for our members before a tribunal. It adds to the protection that they already enjoy when giving evidence to the police and to the commissioner. The Government have gone a very long way towards allaying the fears and disquiet of BT and Post Office employees, but I ask them to go just a little further, because it would result in the tribunal system working more efficiently. It would allow BT engineers to go directly to the tribunal and give evidence, thus avoiding the nonsensical situation in which only the person whose post is being intercepted or whose telephone is being tapped has the right to complain.

8.15 pm

Mr. Waddington: I was asked by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) to answer a specific question about the vetting of BT staff. The Official Secrets Act applies as a matter of law to the Post Office and to British Telecom as a result of the Post Office Act 1969 and the Telecommunications Act 1984. I am advised that there have long been arrangements to make sure that state secrets in the hands of such organisations are not prejudiced—for example, defence telecommunications. However, the hon. Gentleman will understand that it is not for me to comment on present and future arrangements. I should emphasise that this is not new territory. BT may have been altered as a result of the 1984 Act, and we may now be putting into statutory form powers which have been exercised by successive Governments for a very long time, but the problem to which the hon. Gentleman referred does not arise from the introduction of the Bill. Far from it.

We are considering whether third parties should be able to complain to the tribunal about what they consider to be improperly authorised tapping. The tribunal is being set up to offer a means of redress. Essentially, it fulfils a role which in other circumstances would be carried out by the courts. Those who believe that they have been injured can complain to the tribunal, and if they have been injured they can obtain compensation. Generally speaking, however, a person cannot go to court and complain about what happened to somebody else without that "somebody else" being involved or consulted. We are setting up a tribunal to act in a quasi-judicial fashion and to grant a remedy to somebody who says, "I have been injured because I have been the victim of tapping which was wrongly authorised."

We must keep in the forefront of our minds what the tribunal is there for. I appreciate that other amendments have urged the Government to widen the powers of the tribunal, but the scheme in the Bill is clear. The tribunal exists to hear complaints by people who think that they may have been injured. It is not there to see that the whole interception system is working properly. That is the role of the commissioner. The tribunal is not there to prevent unlawful tapping. It is there to hear complaints by people who believe that they have been the victims of improperly authorised tapping. As article 13 of the convention states, the tribunal exists to provide "an effective remedy" for someone who has been the victim of improperly authorised tapping. Its purpose is not to carry out a general review of the Secretary of State's exercise of his functions. That is a matter for the commissioner.

The House will note, however, that the category of people who can complain to the tribunal is very wide. It includes not just those named in a warrant, but entirely innocent people whose communications have been unavoidably intercepted because they live or work at an address specified in a warrant. The hon. Gentleman will not need to be reminded that that arises from the definition of a relevant warrant or certificate under clause 7(9). therefore, although it may appear at first sight that only those who think that they have been named in a warrant may complain to the tribunal, the number of people entitled to complain is actually much greater.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme raised the important issue of BT staff who are worried about interceptions which they know to have taken place and believe to have been improperly authorised. I have no doubt that in such circumstances the people concerned would in the first instance take their worries to their senior officer. I have not had the privilege of working in the telecommunications industry, and the hon. Gentleman may say that that would not be the case, but, looking in from the outside, I should have thought that that would be the obvious first course. I would expect the person to tell his superior officer that something fishy was going on and that tapping was taking place when it should not be taking place. I am sure that the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott) was right when he said that his inclination would be to report to his first line superior in those circumstances.

Be that as it may, if for some reason, the person involved felt that that was not the right course but remained worried and wanted to do something about the situation, he could go to the commission. The hon.

Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme accurately described what should happen, exactly as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary explained it. If the person goes to the commissioner, but is worried that he is not protected by clause 8 unless he is required by the commissioner to provide the information, his course is plain. He simply asks the commissioner to require him to provide the information because he is nervous about his legal position if the commissioner does not do so. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary said a few days ago, it is hard to believe that the commissioner, having been alerted to the fact that something might be going wrong with the system, would not do as he was asked by the member of BT staff who had come to see him.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I took part in the debate on this issue in Committee and suggested amendments on these lines. I do not understand why the Government rely on the assertion that the commissioner will no doubt require people to produce the information if he is asked to do so. Why cannot we provide a statutory defence enabling people to proffer the information in the first place?

Mr. Waddington: If my argument is correct, there is no need to do so. The circumstances described by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme would arise extremely rarely, and there is an easy way round the problem which the hon. Gentleman suggests might exist but which in my humble belief would very rarely exist. Frankly, I cannot believe that anyone so determined to take information to the commissioner and to ensure that something was done to right a wrong would be troubled for one moment about the remote possibility of being prosecuted under the Official Secrets Act for giving that information. It seems a nonsensical proposition, but we are saying that if there is any reality at all in such a fanciful suggestion the problem can be met.

I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman satisfaction on the other important point that he raised. He asked about the position of BT staff who are afraid to go to the commissioner in case they are then subjected to internal disciplinary proceedings. Again, looking in from outside, it seems to me inconceivable that that should happen. It would be a most extraordinary management who thought it right to take disciplinary proceedings against a member of staff who was so conscious of his duties to the public as to go to the commissioner and whose public spirit had been proved by the commissioner requiring him to provide the information. It seems fanciful to suggest that in those circumstances the person might be subjected to disciplinary action. Of course, the hon. Gentleman would not have raised the matter if he did not regard it as important, but now that it has been raised everyone can read about it in Hansard. Nevertheless, it cannot be for the Home Office to give directions to BT as to its disciplinary code, any more than any Home Secretary would have dreamt of doing so before the 1984 Act.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: That is precisely the point that I made in Committee. I agree that it is unlikely that the management would take disciplinary action. What concerns the House is that unless there is a general policy declaration by BT, employees may fear that they would be in breach of their contract of employment and may therefore be reluctant to go to the commissioner. That being so, all that the Government can do is to provide them with a statutory defence. That is what I was aiming at in Committee.

8.30 pm

Mr. Waddington: With respect, that has nothing to do with the point raised a short time ago, which was that there should be a statutory defence to protect a person against prosecution under the Official Secrets Act if he went to the commissioner. My hon. Friend is now talking about purely internal disciplinary proceedings, not criminal proceedings. What we are discussing is whether, after the passage of the Bill, BT should alter its disciplinary code to make it plain to its servants that they would not be disciplined internally if, in a public-spirited fashion, they went to the commissioner.

The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme has done us a public service by raising the matter today. Everyone can now read about it. However, I doubt whether the matter could possibly be the responsibility of the Home Office. If the hon. Gentleman would like me to ensure that the matter is brought specifically to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, I shall gladly take pen and paper and write to my right hon. Friend.

It is all-important that one should not exaggerate the likelihood of BT staff wishing to intervene. It is right that these matters should be raised, but, on examination, the point is somewhat unrealistic. The task of BT staff is to execute a warrant. However, quite rightly, no member of staff will be told any of the reasons for the issue of the warrant. That being so, how could he reach an informed judgment on whether the tapping was right or wrong? The most that he can have is an instinctive suspicion that something must be wrong. He cannot have an informed suspicion. If the system works as it always has, the member of staff will not have the faintest idea whether or not the Home Secretary has authorised the interception correctly.

I would not like the hon. Gentleman to think that I do not take seriously what he has said. His contribution has been extremely valuable, and I am grateful to him for what he said about Government amendment No. 8, which I should now like to move.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister need not formally move the amendment at this stage, but it is in order to discuss it with this group of amemdments.

Mr. Waddington: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Amendment No. 8, is designed to bring the duty to disclose to the tribunal into line with the duty to disclose to the commissioner in clause 8(3). This is being done deliberately to meet the point made by the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme in Committee. We have written to the hon. Gentleman and are indebted to him for having raised the matter. I hope that the House will accept Government amendment No. 8, which is a useful addition to the Bill, but I cannot commend the Opposition amendments to the House.

Mr. McWilliam: First, I must again declare my interest. Secondly, I thank the Minister for meeting the points raised and for discussing amendment No. 8, which is valuable and helpful and will help to set at rest the minds of the staff of BT, Mercury, and any other public telephone systems.

[Mr. McWilliam]

Some of the Minister's comments on the Opposition amendments cause a problem. He says that there is no change in connection with vetting. I am not sure that that is so. I speak as someone who has worked for BT in defence and other installations. It was unusual in the past for formal vetting to take place. When Bob Mitchell was the chairman of the Fife branch of the Post Office Engineering Union, he was very upset when he was told that he could not go into Rosyth naval dockyard. However, as he was an avowed member of the Communist party at the time, that seemed reasonably fair and nobody became worked up about the matter. In general, vetting was no more stringent, and went no higher, than that.

The Minister also seems unaware how much information a qualified telephone engineer can pick up about an installation by looking at it. A qualified radio engineer can tell roughly what the function of an aerial is by looking at the size of it and noting whether or not it is steerable. That will tell him what frequency it operates on, and therefore roughly what it is used for. There is no point in vetting when such matters are plain to see. Many telecommunications engineers are qualified radio engineers.

Mr. Waddington: I have made no attempt to comment on the present or future arrangements for vetting. I said that the problem existed in the past and continues to exist. There will continue to be a need for vetting because the new BT will carry communications of the same type as the old. I do not have the faintest idea about what goes on in the case of vetting. My point was that the problem is no different from the problem which existed when the 1984 Act was passed.

Mr. McWilliam: With respect, the problem is different. In the past, we were all established civil servants and subject to the Civil Service code of discipline. Today, BT engineers and other engineers are employees of a private company whose duty is to make profit for its shareholders. The investigation that preceded the issue of the certificates that made one an established civil servant no longer takes place. Circumstances have changed, and that change gives rise to some of the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding).

The Minister says that the tribunal offers a means of redress. That is fine. The problem is that the provisions in the Bill apply only to an individual or an address. A telephone is useless if there is no one on the other end of the line, and an interception picks up both ends of the line. It might be that the person who was under surveillance had no idea what was happening but that, because of actions taken on the basis of a telephone call, the person at the other end of the line became suspicious. He might suspect that it was not his line, but someone else's, that was being intercepted.

Years ago, an hon. Member with whom I used to share an office said to me, "John, I think my phone is tapped." I took the phone apart and spread the bits over his desk. There was nothing untoward there. I asked him why he thought that it was tapped. He said that every time he called the Palestine Liberation Organisation the security services found out about it. I was not at all surprised to learn that the PLO was tapped. The hon. Member, of course, was not.

That is an illustration of one of the problems raised by the Bill. Amendment No. 5 is designed to help someone making a call to a tapped telephone, who suspects then an interception may have taken place and who knows that the person concerned is not engaged in espionage or in any subversive or criminal activity. Such a person should have the right to go to the tribunal and report his belief that an illegal interception has taken place.

The Minister is right to say that a BT engineer will rarely come across a tap. The mainframe of a major telephone exchange is as long as the Chamber and roughly the width of two Benches. Nowadays, there are up to 40,000 numbers on such a frame, and the chances of a BT engineer seeing a tap on one of them is small, but such things happen.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East) rose——

Mr. Waddington: That was not quite my point. I said that if an engineer came across a tap he would not have the faintest idea whether it had been properly authorised.

Mr. McWilliam: I shall answer the Minister after giving way to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

Mr. Bruinvels: What does the engineer do when he finds that a telephone has been tapped?

Mr. McWilliam: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for asking that question, because the regulations will have to change as a result of the Bill. When an engineer discovers a tap, he knows which number is being tapped because all telephone lines must be terminated on a number. Knowing the number, he can go to a card index and discover who is registered as having been allocated that number. That information will probably mean nothing to the engineer except in cases such as that which my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme mentioned. A BT engineer in the Newcastle-under-Lyme telephone exchange might see a tap, notice that the number is registered with my hon. Friend and knowing that my hon. Friend is not a member of the Communist party, a Fascist or damaging the economic interests of the country. By his own admission, my hon. Friend might be damaging the economic interests of a few bookmakers——

Mr. Golding: And my economic interests.

Mr. McWilliam: Indeed. The engineer might think that it is not reasonable for my hon. Friend to have his telephone tapped and therefore make a complaint to the tribunal. It is self-evident that any such complaint would be upheld. My hon. Friend might know nothing about the interception but he will have the satisfaction of knowing that the lads will check it out.

The Minister talked of warrants as though the chap who makes the interception is armed with a warrant signed by the Secretary of State in his grubby little hand. That is not the case. He is instructed to put an interception on a given number to a terminal on a terminal block. He does not know whether it is authorised. Present legislation provides that if a colleague in BT comes across an interception and is worried about it, he telephones someone who is designated as the security officer, who is usually employed by the traffic division of BT and has various duties, one of which is to ensure that warrants are all right.

As I said on Second Reading, interceptions are still put on correctly but without a warrant. There is a loophole which allows that. I hope that the Bill will stop that, but there is a problem — how is the engineer to know whether the warrant has been issued, especially if he is putting an interception on somebody he knows is probably all right? The security services might know something adverse about that person. In such circumstances, the tribunal will investigate and find that the paper work is OK and nothing will happen. The person making the report will not be told whether the tap was authorised. It will remain secret. Nevertheless, the BT engineer would be happier for knowing that he has done his duty and that the matter has been checked.

We do not want taps put on without warrants and we want to ensure that any interception is made with a warrant. We also want to ensure that the aggrieved party is not considered to be just the person who has had the interception put on. There are two possible aggrieved parties. It is obvious that we cannot cater for an innocent person telephoning somebody who is not innocent and who has an interception. We should be prepared to go along with that if the person who made the call had redress. There is no redress under the Bill as drafted.

8.45 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, if somebody is suspected of a vast VAT fraud, of drug offences or of being a security risk and his telephone is tapped, anybody who telephones him and who most likely has no knowledge of any tap should be protected? There is a limit. The Bill introduces a remedy which we have not had hitherto. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that we should protect anyone who telephones someone under surveillance? That would not work.

Mr. McWilliam: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman if I am not being clear. I am talking about the grievance of the person making a telephone call to another whose telephone has been tapped illegally. I am not talking about a telephone call to someone who has been tapped legally, and said that we are prepared to go along with that.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Can the hon. Gentleman clarify what he means by "legal" in this context? Does he mean a tap that is not in accordance with the warrant or for which there is no warrant at all?

Mr. McWilliam: I mean one that is not legal when the Bill becomes an Act.

Mr. Hogg: It can be several things. It can be an unlawful tap for which there has never been a warrant, it can be a warrant which should not have been issued or it can be a warrant the time of which has expired. There is a variety of combinations. I should like to know what the hon. Gentleman means.

Mr. McWilliam: I mean the combinations that the hon. Gentleman has just described. I apologise for using loose language, but I am a telephone engineer not a barrister. I am trying to do my best. I have difficulty sometimes and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his help and advice. I do not want what I am saying to be misunderstood; and the hon. Gentleman has made clear what I meant to say.

The Opposition's proposals are all square with complaints to the Press Council. In that context, a complainant does not have to be the aggrieved party. The Minister prayed in aid article 13 of the European convention, saying that the Bill was designed to protect the victim of unauthorised tapping. Even on a legally tapped line, somebody on one end of a line will be the victim of just that. We accept that but do not accept that that person has no right to make a complaint. If the amendments are carried, such a complaint could be dealt with by the tribunal.

If the amendments are not carried, we shall have to rely on the person who believes the interception to have taken place illegally informing the person who is being intercepted. That will cause a problem which the Minister does not want to occur, because it will raise suspicions among people who are lawfully intercepted.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have a great deal of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Is not the mischief remedied because, under clause 1, which contains the substantive offence of tapping when there is no warrant, a person who has become aware of that fact, although the communication was neither can, none the less, raise the matter with the police or the DPP? However, clause 7 is related exclusively to applications to the tribunal.
"sent to or by him",

Mr. McWilliam: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. Unfortunately, a suspicion is that most unauthorised tapping is carried out by the police and not by the security services. Therefore, it is not much of a remedy to complain to the police about an unauthorised tapping if it has been carried out by the special branch. That problem should exercise our minds.

The tribunal has been set up as the independent body. We accept that. The amendment merely seeks to make certain that all possible evidence and complaints are properly investigated by that independent body. It will probably prove that the slander which I have just perpetrated on the police is quite untrue. I hope that is so, but we want that perk to be available to individuals; otherwise they could be aggrieved. If the amendment is carried, they will at least have some means of seeking redress if it is justified.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I wish to make a few comments on amendments Nos. 5 and 8. What the Minister has done in amendment No. 8 to schedule 1 is useful, in that he has met a point made by the Opposition as well as by myself in Committee. However, I do not think that it goes quite far enough.

What happens to a BT employee who believes that some improper act has taken place and wishes to make a complaint to the tribunal? Amendment No. 8 protects the BT employee if he is required to deliver up the documents or information, but it does not protect him if he wishes to volunteer the information. It is perfectly true that no sensible management would discipline an employee who referred information to the tribunal in good faith. But there is another point with which the Minister has not come to grips. Unless that fact is well known and generally accepted, the risk is that employees will never be ready to make a complaint in the first instance. We therefore require statutory protection to meet that difficulty.

I am very fond of notes from the Whips, and because I like to oblige the House on occasion, I shall bring my remarks to an end.

Mr. Golding: It is a wise Member who responds as quickly as that to a Government Whip. When in opposition, one does not have to respond quite as quickly.

[Mr. Golding]

Dozens of Conservative Members are pouring into the Chamber. They have come either to hear my speech or to vote. I shall not disappoint them on either count—we shall vote. However, before doing so, I should be delighted if the Minister were to write to his colleague in the Department of Trade and Industry and say that, as this is a serious problem, could he not have a chat to the management of BT and to the management of the Post Office and arrive at a sensible understanding that employees acting responsibly will not be subject to disciplinary procedures.

I do not wish to exaggerate the size of the problem in BT. I merely wish to make absolutely sure that, in the unlikely event of finding something wrong, the employees will have confidence that there is a proper procedure for perusing their concerns.

We shall vote on the amendment because I do not think that the Minister yet understands the deficiencies in the Bill. BT and Post Office staff can go to the commissioner. The commissioner can report and tell the Prime Minister that not all in the world is right, but he has no specific powers. That is the difference between the commissioner and the tribunal.

The tribunal has a direct power. It will investigate whether there is a warrant and whether it is in order. If it determines that there has been an infringement, it can "give notice to the applicant stating that conclusion,"

and

"make a report of their findings to the Prime Minister; and"— this is the important distinction from the commissioner—

"if they think fit, make an order under subsection (5)".

It can

"quash the relevant warrant or the relevant certificate",

and

"direct the destruction of copies of the intercepted material or, as the case may be, so much of it as is certified by the relevant certificate".

It could be that irrelevant information could be ordered to be destroyed. The powers of the tribunal are very different from the powers of the commissioner. It ought to be possible for an employee to lay the same sort of information before the tribunal as he is permitted to lay before the commissioner. In one case the tribunal can act to stop the offence taking place, whereas the commissioner can draw general conclusions and report to the Prime Minister. The Bill does not deal with what the Prime Minister should do.

I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will join me in voting for the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

THE TRIBUNAL

Amendment made: No. 8, in page 11, line 39, after 'Crown', insert

'or engaged in the business of the Post Office or in the running of a public telecommunication system'.—[Mr. Brittan.]

9.10 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Leon Brittan): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This Bill fulfils the commitment that my right hon. Friend the Lord President gave in another place just over a year ago, that the Government would bring forward legislation on interception in the present Session. As we come to the end of our consideration of the Bill, it is worth looking again for a moment at what it is and is not designed to achieve. These broad objectives have understandably, perhaps almost inevitably, been rather lost sight of during the course of detailed examination of the individual provisions.

The Bill is comprehensive in its application to the interception of communications. It demonstrates the wisdom of the view that previous attempts to incorporate provisions in legislation dealing with other matters were bound to be unsatisfactory. Interception is a definable matter capable of being dealt with in one measure, and capable of being dealt with now. The enactment of this Bill would ensure that the authorisation of interception will be on a basis expressly approved by Parliament. I believe that that is a fundamentally important change and one that will be widely welcomed.

Throughout the preparation and passage of this Bill, the Government have been guided by one particularly important principle—that they are not seeking and not taking wider powers for authorised interception than have been practised by Governments of both parties over a long period. That is not perhaps a claim that I would often expect to be able to make for legislation as a Minister, but with interception it is of crucial importance. The Government want only to place on a statutory basis those things which they and their predecessors have judged essential to the interests of fighting crime and preserving the country's vital interests. The Bill does this, and no more than this.

These first two objectives involve the breaking of no new ground. The third does, and it is just the opposite. The Bill introduces significant additional safeguards. I urge the House not to underestimate either their importance or their novelty. In a number of respects the most fundamental is the provision in the Bill least discussed during recent weeks—the creation of the new offence of unlawful interception. I believe that I can claim that there has been universal acceptance of the offence provision and what it sets to achieve. Such criticism as has been voiced was at the margins and the Government have sought to respond positively to it.

Clause 1 is, however, more than just the creation of another criminal offence. It is essential that it is seen, as it features in the Bill, alongside the arrangements for authorised interception. The point about the offence—I welcome this opportunity of publicly stressing and underlining this—is that it means that anybody who oversteps the mark, whoever he may be, whoever he works for, or whatever his purpose or motive, runs the risk of severe penalties. It is essential that those in official positions should be seen here, as in other spheres of life, to be subject to the same constraints as everybody else.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. and learned Friend is now accepting that, because of the compensation provisions in clause 2, compensation should be payable where the interception has been made improperly, and the tribunal has power to direct that. Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider giving an aggrieved person the right to claim compensation where an offence has been committed under clause 1?

Mr. Brittan: Wholly different considerations arise there. Clause 1 covers unauthorised interception, which may be by anybody, not necessarily by anybody who is in any sense an agent of the state. Therefore, compensation for criminal offences cannot be treated in quite the same way as compensation for an interception that has been officially carried out by an agency of the state under the power given by a Secretary of State, but held by the tribunal wrongly to have been so given.

The other safeguards in the Bill have been discussed more thoroughly. Again, I can claim that they have not at heart been challenged. They mean that for the first time the individual can cause the decision of the Secretary of State to be reviewed and, if appropriate, overturned. That is no mean thing. Those who hitherto have had the responsibility of signing warrants have not been subject to that check and the power of review in that way. The personal decision of a Minister can in this way be reviewed by an independent body at the prompting of a private person, without legal representation or lengthy or expensive proceedings, simply in response to a brief application that he may make.

In the same way, the whole system of authorised interception, including all the administrative arrangements which necessarily underpin it, are subject to the continuing review of the commissioner. He will be a person of proven independence, stature and capacity, with free access wherever he wishes to go in pursuit of his duties. The importance of that should not be underestimated either. Continuing inspection of that kind will ensure that everybody concerned observes the highest standards, and, through the powers conferred upon him, nothing can be hidden from the commissioner.

During proceedings in the House, the Government have agreed to a number of significant changes to the Bill. Reading some of the comments on them, I cannot help feeling that in politics it is not possible to get anything right. If a Minister does not agree to changes, he is being obstinate; if he agrees to changes, he is "forced to make concessions." However, the important thing is to get it right rather than to worry about any comments that may be made, and I had no qualms about readily agreeing to amendments suggested from a number of quarters, including the official Opposition. I hope that the amendments that have been made are accepted as being helpful. Without exception they are designed to clarify the Bill and to underscore the objectives to which I have just referred—that new powers are not being sought and that the protection offered by the legislation is real and should be seen by people at large to be real.

The Bill is designed to ensure that people can have confidence in the operation and supervision of the system of authorised interception, and the Government have approached the proceedings throughout with an open mind on any practicable changes which might enhance that confidence. We shall continue to adopt that approach during the forthcoming stages of the Bill's passage elsewhere.

It is not my wish to detain the House longer. The Bill has been well examined. It will be examined further in another place. Discussion of the Bill — as distinct perhaps from the discussion of certain other extraneous matters on which attention was focused last month—has been measured and has recognised the need for carefully framed 'egislation. I trust and believe that that spirit will continue in the coming weeks. It is in that expectation that I commend the Bill's Third Reading to the House.

9.18 pm

Mr. Kaufman: The Bill's passage has been marked by a number of changes. I am grateful to the Home Secretary for acknowledging the part that the Opposition played in the discussions that brought about a number of concessions. Some of the changes are of particular importance. The Government have announced that they intend to legislate on the Law Commission's recommendation that there should be a civil remedy for the use or disclosure of information obtained by improper means, including bugging devices. The Home Secretary has issued guidance to the police on the new offence of unauthorised interception of communications.

We are gratified that the Government have moved—although they said previously that it was not their intention to do so—on the removal of the ability of a live-in landlord to consent to the interception of the communications of his tenants. The Government have tightened the definition of the "serious crime" criterion for interception, along the lines of the definition in the 1980 White Paper. We asked for that change during Second Reading. There is a tighter definition of the circumstances in which a civil servant may urgently authorise or modify a warrant. This will be done only on the express authority of the Home Secretary. Although this will not be done precisely in the way that we requested, it is, nevertheless, a considerable improvement.

The most important single change between Second Reading and Third Reading is in the currency of warrants. This will be as stated in the White Paper, and not as set out in the Bill. The period of first issue of warrants has been reduced from six months to two months.

The amendment on judicial review has acceptably clarified what was not clear on Second Reading, although the Home Secretary assured the House that it was. The Government amendment makes it clear that the tribunal will be able to look at the merits of the decisions by the Secretary of State to authorise warrants for interception.

In response to the shrewd and persistent applications by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding), the Government have made a concession in relation to the protection of disclosures by Post Office and telecommunications employees and others to the commissioner and to the tribunal.

Those are all important and worthwhile changes, and the Opposition are glad to have played their part in bringing them about. There is no doubt that they improve the Bill, but it still requires a great deal of further improvement.

We still have major misgivings about some parts of the legislation, including the Government's failure, or refusal, to import into the Bill the administrative safeguards of the 1981 White Paper. We have to depend upon the tribunal or the commissioner to ensure that Ministers comply with those safeguards. The tribunal or the commissioner can be guided only by the criteria set out in the legislation and not by any other criteria—even though the Home Secretary has put them forward as criteria which govern him.

There is a risk that the Bill will accidentally destroy the safeguards set out in the 1980 White Paper. They have not been incorporated into the Bill. These include the matters about which we have misgivings and in respect of which we have sought, without result, to improve the Bill. They are both in clause 2(2). The first is the criterion of national security, which we insist is far too wide, and the second is the criterion of economic well-being, which, if there is any place for it in the legislation, is again too wide and imprecise.

In addition, the Government have given the citizens inadequate protection against unauthorised interception by excluding it from the remit of the tribunal and the commissioner. For unauthorised interception, the citizen depends completely on the ability of the police to investigate and the Director of Public Prosecutions' willingness to prosecute. We do not regard that as satisfactory.

There are other matters about which we know more because of admissions made by Ministers during the Bill's passage. One is that the individual will not be able to seek an injunction against unauthorised tapping. The Minister of State made that clear. Secondly, the Minister of State said that the tribunal is necessary because the rules of natural justice cannot be applied to complaints about interception.

One reason why the Government have resisted what we sought—a right of appeal from the tribunal—is that the criterion of natural justice is excluded. The tribunal is not obliged to report evidence of unauthorised interception to the police, although the Government assume that it will follow its duty as a citizen.

The tribunal's other major shortcoming is that it does not seem, from the debates and an examination of the Bill, that it will be of any use to the citizen who wants a remedy against interception, because the Government have insisted over an over again that it is not there to deal with unauthorised interception. For that, the citizen has to go to the police. Authorised interception is matched against the Secretary of State's issuing of a warrant. That depends upon, and is governed by, criteria which, as we have said, are far too wide.

The Home Secretary alluded in a somewhat discursive fashion to the circumstances which existed when the Bill was introduced and which led to two delays in its being given a Second Reading. I am referring to the climate in which the Bill was introduced, and which, on a fairly placid evening on Third Reading, the House might tend to forget but should not be allowed to do so. Anxiety and misgivings were felt by a wide spectrum of opinion, from the Conservative through to the Left-wing press, about the Cathy Massiter allegations in the television programme which was first banned from Channel 4 by the IBA and then permitted to be shown. A wide spectrum of opinion was worried about interceptions which were not authorised by the Home Secretary, as well as about allegations of the way in which the Home Secretary might have authorised interceptions, and also about the way in which, for example, the Secretary of State for Defence might have misused the fruits of interception. That climate may be a little less heated now, but it still exists, as do the misgivings.

The misgivings must have been heightened by the surreptitious publication, immediately before Easter, of the terms of reference of the three advisers, which accompanied a written answer in this House. That was information which the House was able to know about and to raise only because of information supplied, not to this House, but to journalists, by the Prime Minister's press secretary, the notorious Mr. Ingham, an ex-Labour candidate for Leeds city council. Fortunately, the electors of that ward showed good sense at the time.

Mr. Brittan: Is the right hon. Gentleman unaware of the fact that a written answer was given, and that therefore the reference to the Prime Minister's press secretary is wholly inappropriate?

Mr. Kaufman: No reference to the Prime Minister's press secretary is wholly inappropriate.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows very well that there was a planted question, with an answer which did not provide the terms of reference. It was only the fact that a number of journalists at No. 10 Downing street applied for and were given the information, and were then good enough to let Members of Parliament see it, that enabled us to see it in time. [Interruption.] There is no point in the Minister of State getting into a great fuss about it. These are the facts, and are known to be facts. That is one of the reasons why a great deal of the comment could not be made until after Easter. But what emerges—this is extraordinarily important—is that——

Mr. Brittan: May I interrupt the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Kaufman: I shall readily give way to the Home Secretary, but I wish first to complete this passage. In the Bill we have been dealing with the question of subversion. Earlier this evening, when we were seeking to redefine subversion, we emphasised that it was a subjective definition based upon the hazy Lord Harris definition of 10 years ago. That criterion, which can govern the decision of the Home Secretary to issue a warrant, is now affected by paragraph 1 of the terms of reference of the three advisers, where the words are:

"a subversive group, acknowledged as such by the Minister".

That means that it is the Minister who can define a subversive group to suit his own personal criteria.

The whole paranoia about subversion which has arisen under this Government in recent months is now being imported into definitions which will govern criteria which will permit the interception of communications under this legislation.

Mr. Brittan: Leaving aside the fact that the change announced in the written answer to which I have referred is on the lines of what was recommended by the Security Commission—a fact which the right hon. Gentleman conveniently ignores—I want to deal in this intervention with the specific misstatement by the right hon. Gentleman. He gave a picture of a bare written answer and the information about the terms of reference having to be winkled out of the Prime Minister's press secretary by assidious journalists. However, the Prime Minister's answer said:

"In the light of the Security Commission's report following its review of security procedures and practices in the public service . . . the terms of reference of the three advisers and the statements of procedure have been revised. I am arranging to have copies placed in the Library of the House."—[Official Report, 3 April 1985; Vol. 76, c. 621.]

[Mr. Britan]

That does not sound like the clandestine operation that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We seem now to be straying somewhat from the contents of the Bill, and it is the contents of the Bill that are in order on Third Reading.

Mr. Kaufman: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If you will permit me, before moving on I shall respond very briefly to what the Home Secretary said. To give a written answer with a reference to something that can be obtained in the Library, but which is not available to hon. Members who read the answer, is not the same as making the information plainly and clearly available simultaneously with the answer to the House of Commons.

We all know what happened. The answer was put out by the Prime Minister just before she left for her weird tour. She hoped that it would be submerged by the Easter press, because, of course, there are no newspapers on Good Friday — something well known to the Prime Minister through her press secretary. The Home Secretary's answer will not do. We know that he is a craven apologist for the Prime Minister, but that answer does not go far enough.

The Home Secretary has said that it will be all right, because the Security Commission has proposed something. The Security Commission does not sit at the top of Mount Sinai. We do not have to accept what it says as being like the Ten Commandments. The Prime Minister can decide for herself, if she wishes to do so.

The terms of reference, which are so germane to the Bill which the House will be asked to pass within a few minutes, are far wider than anything that has existed previously. The terms of reference have widened the definition of a public servant. They include a list, which did not exist before, of people who are liable to be sacked as security risks. The list covers people in the public service, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, including British Nuclear Fuels plc and United Kingdom employees of URENCO Ltd., the Civil Aviation Authority, British Telecom——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I must ask him to set a good example to the House by returning the Bill.

Mr. Kaufman: I am talking about criteria which will govern the definition of subversion and decide whether a warrant can be issued under clause 2(2)(a). That is being widened by the document which the Government did not exactly publish but which was made available to the Opposition through the assistance of certain journalists of good will.

The Bill goes far too wide. In addition, parliamentary accountability will consist simply of a report to the House following the report by the commissioner. Proper accountability through the House—that is accountability of the commissioner appointed by the House to a Select Committee of the House—does not exist.

There are two areas of very wide concern. One relates to the criteria which make the Bill a telephone tappers' charter, as I said on Second Reading. The other is the total failure of the Government to take the opportunity of this legislation at long last to bring the security services under some form of parliamentary accountability when the fear has been throughout that elements in the security services are operating in a way not known to the Home Secretary.

The Home Secretary may well have made a quickie investigation, but that does not begin to meet the misgivings of many people outside the House as well as many Members inside the House. Although we have secured some improvements in the Bill during its passage, it is for those reasons that we regard the Bill as so unsatisfactory that we shall vote against it tonight.

9.39 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I rise in the Third Reading debate to make a few short comments on the Bill—

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): They may well be short.

Mr. Hogg: I heard what the hon. Gentleman said. They may be short, but the example of his right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is not encouraging. He appears to be anxious to lose the Opposition's prayer, perhaps because the prayer is largely without merit so he does not want it to be discussed. However, that is by the way.

The Bill is a very important and useful step forward, in that it enshrines in statute practices which had previously not been statutory. It sets out in statutory form the circumstances in which a warrant may be issued. It defines the practice in statutory form, and, for the first time, it provides an effective review system. All those things represent a great step forward, and I am sorry that the Opposition are so churlish as to say that they will vote against the Bill.

Having said that, I believe that there are at least four respects in which the Bill can be improved. The first is the point that I made to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. I do not see why, where a person has had his phone or mail intercepted unlawfully, and thus there is an offence under clause 1, he should not have the right to claim compensation. I hope that the Home Secretary will consider that matter with a view to making possible changes in another place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he is now talking about what he would like to see in the Bill. What he must now discuss is the contents of the Bill itself.

Mr. Hogg: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The second specific point is the definition in clause 2, which sets out in statutory form the circumstances in which a warrant may be issued. The Home Secretary has sought to define the circumstances that justify it — national security and so on. It is a pity that he has not felt able to include a slightly more precise statutory definition of the circumstances in which the warrant may be issued. I should like to have seen that done.

The third point relates to the power of the tribunal. I share with the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Golding) a certain amount of disappointment about that. When a person believes that there has been an interception, he has a right to go to the tribunal to make a complaint. The tribunal's powers are limited by clause 7. In particular, the tribunal does not have the power to say that there has been an offence under clause 1. I regret that omission. I hope that the matter will be looked at again in another place.

My final point relates to clause 9. It is the point about which I feel the greatest concern. Clause 9 provides that under no circumstances may evidence be adduced in a court or tribunal which shows that an offence under clause 1 has been committed or, indeed, shows that there has been an offence under clause 2. As a general proposition, I bitterly oppose any legislation which prevents people from adducing relevant evidence in court. That seems to be objectionable in principle. It is an extension of the law and has never been the case before. Until the Bill becomes an Act, people can adduce evidence to show that warrants have been issued. They are able to show that tapping has taken place. However, for the first time, under clause 9 that will no longer be possible. I am against that in principle.

I am prepared to accept that there may be a case for saying that the presumptions are against the adducing of such evidence, but I believe that there should be a residual power in either the court or the tribunal to cause such evidence to be admitted in exceptional circumstances. I deeply regret that the Minister of State, when I raised this matter in amendments two weeks ago, could not meet me on any point that I put to him. I very much hope that when the Bill goes to another place clause 9 is scrutinised with the greatest of care. I should be pleased if amendments came back to this place which would alter the nature of clause 9.

However, this is an important step forward. I do not want to derogate from it. The Bill can be improved. Notwithstanding that, it is a very welcome development.

9.44 pm

Mr. Maclennan: I shall follow the example of the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) and speak extremely briefly. He passionately expressed his opposition to clause 9—opposition which, as he knows, I wholly share. I consider that to be a sufficient reason in itself for voting against the Third Reading of the Bill. I and my hon. Friends in the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party will vote against it for that and for other reasons.

It was surprising that when the Home Secretary introduced the debate he did not refer once to the real provenance of the Bill—the finding of the European Court of Human Rights that the British system of telephone tapping is outside the law, that we are therefore in breach of the European convention on human rights and that because our system is based upon administrative rules, not upon the law of the land, something has to be done about it.

There is no certainty that the passing of the Bill will necessarily bring us wholly within the four corners of the convention. It has to be admitted that the necessary requirements were not spelt out in the Malone case, which led to the adverse ruling against this country. However, in the Klass case against the Federal Republic of Germany, control over the exercise of Executive discretion was considered in some detail. Although I acknowledge that the Bill marks a step forward, it does not go nearly so far as the legislation in the Federal Republic and is most notably defective in the provision that it makes for paliamentary scrutiny of what is happening.

I accept that the Bill contains a provision for an annual report to be made to Parliament. However, I do not believe that it amounts to real and effective control. I opposed the concept of a single commissioner of high judicial office and proposed instead that this review function ought to be conducted by senior Privy Councillors, some of whom have experience of exercising discretion and who have a tie with Parliament. I believe that that would have been a better procedure. I hope that another place will consider that point. For those reasons, my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will vote against the Bill.

Mr. Eldon Griffiths: What has come out of our debates is general agreement that interception is necessary in the interests of freedom and security. It is a step forward that all parties have said that clearly. The Bill legitimates the interception of communications. Therefore, I very much welcome it. It provides, for the first time, a legislative sanction. The House is determining how this practice should henceforth be applied. Previously, it has been a matter of prerogative and practice. Now, it is a matter of statute. I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary on that achievement.

My right hon. and learned Friend has also introduced two novel and important safeguards: first, the commissioner; and, secondly, the ability of the citizen to have the Home Secretary's decision overturned and compensation provided. That is an extension of civil liberty.

My last point is that during our discussions nothing has seemed to me to be more peculiar than the attitude adopted by the Opposition Front Bench. If the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), who spoke for the Opposition, felt so strongly about the iniquities of telephone tapping without the proper safeguards, the review procedures of a Select Committee and the thousand and one additional amendments to which he referred this evening, why on earth, when he was in government, did he do nothing about it? That is the essential difference between the Opposition and this Government. When the opportunity presented itself, this Government provided an extension of civil liberties and parliamentary sanction for the Bill. The Opposition have done nothing but complain, even though they did nothing about it when in office. Now they have the humbug to complain when the Government are putting this Bill on the statute book.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): I shall address myself briefly to the content of the Bill. How will it affect, for instance, my constituent Carol Brickley, who, according to this month's Monochrome, as a prominent activist of the City Anti-Apartheid group had her telephone tapped and transcripts passed to the South African embassy? This is allegedly based on information from an MI5 officer on the lines of the Cathy Massiter revelations.

First, did the Home Secretary authorise that tap and, if so, did he know that the information was to be passed to a foreign embassy? If not, will he inquire into the matter? Finally, does my constituent have redress under the Bill by applying to the commissioner or the tribunal—and if not, why not?

9.50 pm

Mr. Norris: It would be churlish for anyone on either side of the House not to welcome the Bill, for at least three good reasons.

First, much to the surprise of Members on both sides, an offence of unlawful interception is being created for the first time. It is extraordinary how many members of the public are amazed and appalled that no such offence now exists and that this important statutory safeguard for the public is being provided for the first time.

Secondly, having introduced a ten-minute Bill towards the end of last Session, on the Law Commission's recommendations on breach of confidence, I was especially pleased at the introduction of a civil remedy as a vital adjunct to the criminal provisions in the Bill.

Thirdly, and especially significant in the light of the "20/20 Vision" film, which coloured earlier proceedings on the Bill to a large extent, anyone who claims to have been unlawfully subject to interception in that way will now be entitled to have a commissioner investigate the case and a tribunal decide that the tapping was completely unlawful. That is a very significant advance.

For those three individually significant and collectively extremely important reasons, it would be churlish indeed not to welcome the Bill.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Norris: Despite my hon. Friend's alacrity in springing to his feet, I must detain the House a little longer, as I have two major reservations about the Bill.

First, clause 1 still clings to an unnecessarily restrictive definition of interception. After all our deliberations on the Bill, we are left with the ludicrous situation in which telephone tapping and interception of mail are covered, but surveillance by any other means is not covered. Far be it from me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to stray into matters not covered by the Bill. One is obliged to point out, however, that the Bill covers precious little and to suggest that it is a safeguard against the whole process of unlawful surreptitious surveillance is inaccurate so long as the Bill assumes that such surveillance is carried out only through telephone tapping or the interception of mail.

Secondly, the procedure outlined in clause 2, whereby warrants for interception will be issued by the Home Secretary, is still deeply unsatisfactory because it continues the fundamental error of failing to distinguish between the judiciary and the Executive. Other European Governments have found no difficulty in making that distinction—not, as is sometimes asserted, because their judicial systems are different, because their judges have a different role or because their courts undertake different functions. There are precedents in this country for search warrants, for instance, to be issued on a judicial basis. The real answer, I suspect, is that where there is a will to achieve such a system a way can be found, but it is clear that there was no such will in the content of the Bill.

While we are considering the limitations of the power of the tribunal and the commissioner, I must point out to my hon. Friends — I address my hon. Friends in particular because this is not a party political issue and the freedoms being protected in the Bill are far too important to be considered on a party political basis—that clauses 7 and 8 set out the procedure by which the tribunal and the commissioner will work.

Hon. Members may be interested to recall that when Lord Bridge was asked to review the way in which authoritisatons had been issued in the past, after various recent allegations in the press, he was able to complete the onerous task in a weekend. That shows how restrictive are the terms for the tribunal and the commissioner. They can only ensure that the warrant has been properly applied for and that the criterial established under the legislation are met. They are not concerned with the broader principles of natural justice. Such considerations are beyond the scope of this limited Bill.

There are many important new safeguards in the Bill which we should all welcome. I shall have no difficulty at all in supporting the Government in the Lobby tonight. There is much in the Bill to welcome. However, the measure will not go far enough to dispel the public disquiet and concern aroused not only by the "20/20 Vision" film but by many other incidents over the years. The Bill will do something, but a great deal remains to be done, and I must add to the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) the hope that in another place the Bill will be given the teeth that will enable it genuinely to dispel the public disquiet that has arisen.

Mr. Cohen: According to a report that I have read, the secret services have a word identification machine which was used during the miners' strike. Unfortunately, someone decided to put on a word picket when the miners' phones were being tapped. The result was an unexpected mass picket on the machine, and it became overloaded. That is one example of abuse.

Many other abuses have been mentioned in the House during debates on the Bill and at other times. The Minister never comments on them. The answer is always that the matter is, of its nature, secret. That is a great excuse for a cover-up of incompetence, negligence or even political corruption on the part of the Minister, politicians or administrators.

There have been far too many abuses. We have heard about the tapping of the phones of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and of trade unionists. The definition of subversion is too wide. It enables tapping, and other unsavoury activities that abuse civil liberties, to take place.

The Bill gives no definition of the national interest. The Minister says that the concept of national interest can be used in a variety of contexts. On Second Reading, he said that the concept was not unnecessarily imprecise. What is necessary about imprecision in a matter as important as the invasion of privacy and civil liberties? The judge in the Ponting case raised a serious issue when he equated the national interest with whatever the Government of the day wanted to do. That was dangerously wrong, as the jury thought.

The Home Secretary has said that even lawful activity can be regarded as subversive and against the national interest and that perfectly lawful tactics could be used to subvert our democratic system of government. That must be wrong. The definitions are so wide that the security service or Ministers can get away with virtually anything.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) hit the right note in Committee when he said that there is only one legitimate criterion for listening to or intercepting a person's telephone call——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Interception of Communications Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.

Mr. Cohen —that a crime is being, is about to be or is thought likely to be about to be committed. Once we depart from what people do and include what they think, which is what subversion is all about, we are getting away from a basic principle on which British justice is supposed to be founded.

With warrants, the signature of one is an excuse for tapping perhaps hundreds or even thousands of telephones. With the extension to computer data, it is possible to get perhaps 50,000 personal records as well. The Minister said today that warrants are signed by a non-political Director General or a non-political Secretary of State. Was the signing of Mr. Cox's warrant non-political? Mr. Cox, the vice-chairman of CND, had his telephone tapped. If the Secretary of State is non-political, what is he doing duplicating the Director General's job? In those circumstances, he is effectively no more than a rubber stamp.

The extension of tapping to computer data, which the Bill allows, will permit a trawl of personal data. My amendment, which would have required the destruction of excess material, was not selected. In Committee, the Minister said that intercepted material will be limited to the minimum necessary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not discuss amendments that were not selected.

Mr. Cohen: I am not, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Bill provides for a massive extension of tapping to computer data. It should be explicit and ensure that excess material is destroyed rather than set up in files on people, which is the big brother technique.

The tribunal's powers are severely limited and many people will be denied the opportunity to right wrongs that have been done to them. There will be no proper parliamentary accountability. The idea of there being a Select Committee as an overseer has been rejected by the House. A secret budget of more than £1 billion a year has been reported, and the principle of no taxation without representation has been negated.

The abuses will go on. Policy will be changed and widened without proper debate, perhaps without the knowledge of the House, and the Bill will do nothing to stop that.

10.3 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens: I shall not detain the House. This Third Reading is of immense importance to the country. There can be no user of a telephone who has not at some time felt, by the hum on the line, a crackle, a voltage drop or an apologetic interruption, that his line is being intercepted. How many of us say on the telephone, "We must not say too much. The telephone is not the best medium on which to discuss such things."

When constituents ask us what safeguards there are, we reply that the Home Secretary or a senior Cabinet Minister must sign a warrant. That warrant must be authorised by a chief constable or a deputy chief constable. A constituent may ask, "What if the Home Secretary is on the twelfth green? How can he sign if there is a suspected VAT or drugs offence, or vast frauds or security implications? How can we be sure that the Home Secretary or his alternative can be reached swiftly?" People are suspicious about the procedures that are followed, but when they are told that at present it is not a criminal offence to intercept someone's telephone calls, there is complete disbelief.

We are now on the Third Reading of a Bill which gives hope. I am appalled to think that the Opposition will vote against a measure which provides safeguards such as the tribunal and the commissioner. How can they vote against a Bill which they never had the guts to introduce when in government? It is quite disgusting. I have been saddened by the contributions of Labour Members. When they were in office, they did nothing at all. Yet for propaganda and political gain, they snipe at the Conservative Front Bench and at Conservative Back Benchers.

I shall watch with interest when they oppose the Bill, and I shall refer to that fact at the next general election. I shall also be interested to see how the minority parties vote. I shall note what Lobby they go into. Every sensible thinking person wants legislation to make the unlawful interception of someone's telephone an offence. The privacy of the individual still stands for something in this country, and the Conservative Government have provided the legislation.

10.7 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) speaks for the country, as I do, when we refer to the dangers for those whose communications are intercepted without lawful authority. I am glad that we have finally reached the Third Reading of the Bill. I sincerely believe that the Home Secretary will now follow the proper procedures as laid down by the House. As we already know, if decisions are not arrived at properly, they will be overturned.

Unlawful interception is a serious crime, but the nation's security must be properly protected. The procedures which have been discussed at length in Committee will be strictly adhered to, and I am confident that authorisation will be granted properly and in the interests of the state.

It should be remembered that the Bill was the result of a commitment by my noble Friend Viscount Whitelaw. It was the Malone case which pointed to the necessity for such a measure. That case was of great interest to the country and to the Government. Even before the European Court gave its judgment, it was of particular concern to me, because Mr. Malone lives near me.

It is lawful to intercept in order to prevent crime. That view must be supported. The Bill will ensure that United Kingdom law is in line with articles in the European Convention on Human Rights. We need such a legal framework. Many people have been crying out for it for years, but nothing came from the Labour Government. A Conservative Government have restored the balance, and I am confident that this framework, which I believe the public will come to accept and respect, is reasonable.

We need the legislation to ensure that interception can be used where necessary to protect society. However, interception must be lawfully carried out, I am sure that it will not be used all the time. I also believe that the public will finally grow accustomed to it. There are no new powers in the Bill. Indeed, in some cases it will restrict powers. Many previous Home Secretaries have authorised the carrying out of interception. Any unauthorised interception will now be a criminal offence. That is to be welcomed, and I would have thought that the Opposition would welcome it rather than vote it out.

No warrants will be issued without authority. I have been worried about warrants being issued, but I am happy that they will be issued for the purposes of the Bill—that is, in the interests of national security, to detect serious crimes and for the economic well-being of the United Kingdom. Warrants will be issued in the same way as at present—that is, by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. Some newspapers were worried about intercepting material, but it was needed for authority. The intercepted material needed to be examined. The tribunal will have the proper redress to examine what is happening. That is right, and the revelations are all right. I shall support the Bill.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Television Licence Fee

10.23 pm

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) (Amendment) Regulations 1985 (S.I., 1985 No. 490), dated 25th March 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 27th March, be annulled.

I regret that it is necessary to have this debate in the shadow of what is probably the greatest threat there has ever been to public service broadcasting, the BBC and television standards. The threat is represented by the inquiry announced by the Home Secretary of 27 March, to be conducted by Professor Peacock, into an assessment of the effects of the introduction of advertising or sponsorship on the BBC.

This is the wrong inquiry and it is being chaired by the wrong man. It is the wrong inquiry because it is clearly based on the assumption that advertising on the BBC would be appropriate and acceptable, when it clearly would not be. It is also based on the assumption that the introduction of advertising on BBC television or radio is the only source of funding for the BBC other than the licence fee. But it is not the only other source.

If the Government were really concerned about the future of broadcasting, let alone the future of public service broadcasting, if they were serious about the way in which our broadcasting system should be financed, and if they were concerned to develop a proper, coherent strategy for broadcasting, they would have commissioned an inquiry into communications policy generally for the whole of the United Kingdom.

As it is, this inquiry is a shoddy cop-out and it represents the price that the Home Secretary has been prepared to pay to, as he believes, achieve the objective of satisfying some of his hon. Friends who want to see a reduction in the influence and the services provided by the BBC as well as an increase in advertising.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster) rose——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I do not intend to give way to the hon. Lady. I know what she wishes to say, and I shall be coming to it.

It is the wrong inquiry and, as the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) wishes to remind me, I said that it was also chaired by the wrong man.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: That is the remark on which I wanted to comment.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I am afraid that the hon. Lady will not get the chance to say what she wishes to say in that case, because I am trying to protect the interests of those of her hon. Friends who wish to speak in the debate in the hour that is left to us, many of whom have asked me to make a brief speech so that they may do so.

The inquiry is chaired by the wrong man because, although Professor Peacock may be an estimable and worthy man, he is also well known for his free market views, for his support of laissez-faire economics and for his advocacy of such Tory measures as education vouchers. His views do not inspire confidence in either his objectivity or his impartiality on the issue with which he has been entrusted. Added to that is his public criticism of the licence system as a means of raising revenue for the BBC and his stated public tolerance of advertising on the American television networks.

Given that kind of track record, it is no wonder that such a man should have been chosen to hold the inquiry, and it is small wonder that many individuals in broadcasting, especially in the trade unions involved in broadcasting, feel that the inquiry is biased in favour of advertising and that the report could well have been written already.

It is difficult to avoid the suspicion that the Government and Professor Peacock have already arrived at their conclusion and that Professor Peacock is the man who has been chosen to make those recommendations and implement those proposals. It is difficult not to see the hand—on this occasion the malign hand—of the Prime Minister behind this proposal and this inquiry.

Of course, the Prime Minister is supported by the more philistine, unthinking and avaricious among her Back Benchers. Nothing was more disturbing and offensive than to witness the baying ranks of PR Tory Members of Parliament three weeks ago emitting clear spite, hostility and vengeance towards the BBC. They seem to be motivated by nothing more than vindictiveness towards public broadcasting, hostility to the BBC, and greed for what they see as the rich pickings likely to be had if advertising is introduced into BBC television or radio.

I say again that the Opposition are implacably and fundamentally opposed to the introduction of advertising on BBC radio or television.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Why?

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Because we believe that it would damage the BBC, the independent television network and the rest of the media.

Mr. Maclean: How?

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I should expect the hon. Gentleman to have done sufficient homework to be able to answer his own questions. As he has not, let me answer them for him. It would damage the BBC because it would inevitably lead to a lowering of standards, not just on BBC television but on independent television, and to producers and schedulers of programmes pandering—even if only unconsciously—to what they regard as the interests and demand of advertisers. They would tend to fashion their programmes and their scheduling to forms for which advertisers are prepared to pay the most. Inevitably, producers and programme devisers would respond to the lowest common denominator in establishing their programme priorities.

The hon. Member for Penrith and the The Border (Mr. Maclean) is no longer asking why or how. He seems to be easily satisfied. There would be a drive by the BBC to win bigger audiences, because that means bigger advertising rates, which means greater revenue. There would therefore be more worthless, philistine and superficial programmes. The consequence would be the type of appalling distasteful television which many of us have witnessed to our great dissatisfaction and which disfigures the screens of American television but which, apparently, according to the public record, Professor Peacock admires.

Nor does the Labour party accept that the introduction of advertising—even on one part of the BBC during a limited period of the day, on any of the BBC channels—would be tolerable or acceptable. Once advertising is allowed — whatever its form and however minute or marginal it is — it will be irresistible in future. Home Secretaries confronted by a broadcasting corporation needing an increase in the licence fee to meet that demand would extend the allowable amount of advertising. There would be irresistible pressures to extend and increase advertising every time the BBC asked for increased financial support. That would be an easy option that few Governments could resist.

The introduction of advertising not only would lead to a lowering of standards in the BBC and independent television companies and to more demands for even greater advertising but would damage irreparably the independent television companies, commercial radio and local newspapers. The Home Secretary has acknowledged that implicitly in the inquiry's terms of reference and during the debate when he announced the increase in the licence fee and the setting up of the inquiry.

Clearly, there is a risk that the introduction of any form — however minute — of advertising on BBC radio or television would substantially erode the financial viability of independent local radio, local newspapers and, in many ways, independent television companies. Many of them would face the prospect of severe financial difficulties, if not bankruptcy, because the advertising cake is limited. That is not my assertion; it is the assertion of Sir Denis Forman, the chairman of Granada Television, and Rodney Harris — [Interruption.] I understand what the Government are saying. Of course Rodney Harris has a vested interest. That does not mean that his opinions are right or that they are wrong. I am merely quoting his opinion.

Many others make that assertion — not just the chairman of Granada or Rodney Harris, the media director of the advertising agency that started this whole debate. During the past two weeks, that agency has confirmed that many independent local radio stations may face substantial difficulties if advertising is allowed on the BBC. Saatchi and Saatchi has spoken clearly about the risk to independent local radio. Many small radio stations and local newspapers would be bankrupted if advertising were allowed.

I suppose that all those individuals could be tarred with the brush of having a vested interest, but, as I have said, that is no reason to disbelieve what they have to say or to suggest that their judgment is suspect. I presume that the Minister of State does not have a vested interest. If he does, perhaps he will declare it.

Speaking in the late night debate on 19 December, 1984, the Minister made out a strong, powerful and compelling case against the introduction of advertising on the BBC. He talked about feast and famine in the margarine industry. I am not sure of its relevance, but he clearly went on to say:

"It is by no means certain that advertising revenue will continue to grow at the same rate as in the past 10 years. In fact, ITV revenue this year looks certain to fall short of the £1,000 million forecast for 1984, even though only two or three months ago it seemed likely"—

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is nothing about television advertising in the regulations.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): The Chair will decide what is relevant to the debate.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: The Minister of State said:

"ITV revenue this year looks certain to fall short of the £1,000 million forecast for 1984, even though only two or three months ago it seemed likely to reach that figure."—[Official Report, 19 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 507.]

He then went on to talk about the sharp downturn in adverising revenue and how there would be great difficulties for the ITV companies if the BBC took the major share of the cake. He spoke about competition from the BBC obliging the independent companies to take a reduction in their revenue.

If any Conservative Members are worried about the likely consequences for all our media of the introduction of advertising on the BBC, they will see no more compelling or convincing case than that presented by the Minister.

Those are clear, good, compelling and practical reasons why we should be careful about any proposal to introduce advertising on the BBC. They are important and must be taken into account. Leaving them aside, however, the Opposition resort to the arguments of principle. I reaffirm that there will be no circumstances in which the Labour Government who will be elected at the next election will allow advertising on BBC radio or television.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Could the hon. Gentleman be persuaded to deal with regulation 2? It relates to the increase in fees, which is of great anxiety in the north-west.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady knows that that is not a matter for me.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: As you will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but as the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), who intervened earlier, do not seem to know, we are talking about regulations that deal with the financing of the BBC. As part of the statement about the increase in the licence fee to which these regulations give effect, the Home Secretary announced the setting up of an inquiry whose terms of reference were to study the feasibility of obtaining the licence fee revenue which will be obtained by the order by means of advertising.

It is reasonable and acceptable, therefore, when discussing the financing of the BBC, to talk about the alternative means that the Home Secretary clearly has in mind, but which the Opposition feel would not just be damaging to the BBC, ITV and the media generally but would be completely unacceptable and indefensible in principle.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton) rose——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I shall not give way. We accept that as the licence fee increases so it becomes more regressive and burdensome on low-income individuals and families. It represents, for example, a high proportion of the income of pensioners.

Many of our pensioners, particularly those living alone, are very dependent on television. Many of them are housebound; many are inactive, ill or disabled. Indeed, it has been said that they watch 20 per cent. more television than other viewers do. It is clearly unjust that after this order has been passed by the House they should be required to pay £58 to have the privilege of watching television, while many other pensioners, because they live in sheltered housing accommodation, pay no more than

[Mr. Kilroy-Silk]

5p. That is clearly wrong. It is a very deep and serious cause of resentment and bitterness. It is indefensible and cannot be accepted.

It is also wrong and unjust that hotels pay the same £58 to provide 15 television sets; they pay exactly the same price as one pensioner living on a single pension. We have the ability to change that and we should have the will to change it.

Many pensioners—hon. Members on each side have the letters and representations at their surgeries—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] They are watching the football. Many pensioners are deeply anxious and distressed about their ability or inability to find the money that is required to pay the licence fee so that they can watch television not just in comfort but without guilt and without breaking the law. We recognise that, as the Home Secretary and the Government do not, and we shall therefore phase out the television licences for pensioners. We shall not be prepared to tax pensioners in order that they may have the benefit of watching television in their own homes.

We accept that that will cost the Treasury about £320 million a year, and no doubt the Minister, when he responds to the debate, will pour scorn on the amount of money that we are prepared to provide so that pensioners should have the ability to watch television without having to pay the new exorbitant fee. Yet, if we put this in the context of other tranches of £325 million, the comparison is not perhaps as odious as the Minister may attempt to make out.

In order to give all our pensioners a free television licence next year, we have only to take out seven months of the cost of the Trident programme. [Interruption.] It is a clear choice. This House has the power——

Mr. Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. While I heard very clearly your correct observation to the House that it is, of course, entirely for the Chair to determine the rules of order, may I draw your attention to the exact text of the order before us?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I remind the House that the debate must finish at 11.30 pm? Therefore, I ask for brevity. The hon. Gentleman should know that I have considered the order very carefully. We are discussing an increase in fee. All that has been said is relevant as to where the money comes from, the cost, and other matters.

Mr. Griffiths: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you indeed are the very last person whom I would wish to challenge. I would, however, respectfully say to you that the order before us contains two elements—first, the title of the regulations, and, secondly and quite specifically, the increase in charges. It does not deal with advertising; it does not deal——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the same respect for the hon. Gentleman as he has expressed for me. I have considered the order very carefully, and all that has been said about advertising, the cost and where the money comes from, in my view is relevant.

Mrs. Kellet-Bowman: And very boring.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I ask for great brevity, because the debate will finish at 11.30 pm.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: This is a matter for a clear political decision, which can and should be taken by the House of Commons. Hon. Members on the Government Back Benches are entitled to take the view that they would rather spend £325 million on the purchase of a Trident missile system. [Interruption.] We do not share that view. We believe that that kind of money could be much better spent on providing the facility of a free television licence for pensioners.

The £325 million that would be required to implement our promise to give free television licences to pensioners is also less than the Government's current spending on production support for surplus cereals. Can any hon. Member defend the expenditure of more money on producing and storing food that no one wants or consumes——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is trying the patience of the House. He must not list in detail the alternatives that the money is being spent on.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think you will understand that it is very difficult to make a speech, given the constant barracking and harassment of Conservative Members. [Interruption.] They are making my point again. I think you would also accept that as we are debating regulations which will increase the licence fee paid by all our constituents, it is reasonable and in order in that context to refer to people who can least afford to pay that licence fee. Surely, then, it is in order to meet the argument that will be deployed by other hon. Members later in the debate by drawing comparisons between the large cost of implementing this promise and other expenditure that I would regard as non-essential. In the light of the examples I have given—and I could give many others—we believe that providing free television licences for pensioners at that price is a bargain that we are prepared to pay and that I am sure they would welcome.

We want to preserve the integrity of the BBC and to maintain the standards of public service broadcasting. We want to preserve the economic viability of the independent television companies, of independent local radio and, indeed, of local newspapers. We want also to protect the political independence of the BBC from the philistinism, the avarice and the greed that will be demonstrated tonight by Conservative Members. All of those things that we wish to protect are under threat from the Government. It is our mandate to defend them and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) took 24 minutes in a debate which must end at 11.30 pm. I shall try to be brief. His speech was typical of what one expects to hear from Opposition spokesmen on Home Affairs matters. It was memorable for the total lack of support that he had from his own Benches. His offensive remarks about those who happen to disagree with him were also typical.

I was at least glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman does not propose to divide the House. I hope that the regulations will go through without a Division, because I believe my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is right in his decision. I hope that he will have the support of the House.

I want briefly to make four points. First, it is a fact that the BBC as a service has to be paid for. When one considers all the services provided by the BBC on television and radio, the fact that they are provided at a cost per day of less than would buy a copy of the Daily Mirror or The Sun shows that it is good value for money. That is the view of the vast majority of people. Speaking for myself, I have had one letter expressing concern since my right hon. and learned Friend made the statement about the increase in the licence fee. It may be the fact that it costs more to post one letter than to pay one day's licence fee for the BBC.

Secondly, I am interested to see that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has chosen to leave the Chamber. I do not blame him. I am not surprised that he has put up the monkey rather than the organ grinder to speak tonight. Frankly, the shameless vote-catching pledge given on 27 March by the right hon. Member for Gorton, claiming that if the Labour party were returned there would be no television licence free for old-age pensioners, is a disgrace, and Labour Members know it. According to the right hon. Member for Gorton, who has disappeared, not only are they opposed to any form of advertising, but it will not be provided out of general taxation. The real honest pledge for the Labour party to make if it wishes to go forward as the party that believes in freedom of information is to announce tonight not that a vote for Labour is a vote for free television licence for old-age pensioners, but that a vote for Labour is a vote for an £88 licence for everyone else. That is what it would mean.

My third point is that there is concern among old people about the cost of the television licence, because it has to be found as one sum. When he replies, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will give encouragement and support to the BBC by making it possible for the television licence to be paid for on a weekly or monthly basis. If it were paid for in that way, old-age pensioners would find it easier than finding the sum in one go.

My final point is about the inquiry that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has proposed. I do not object to the inquiry. Personally, I would regret it if the BBC were to be financed by advertising. It is arguable that the BBC has gone wider than it should. I was a members of the General Advisory Council of the BBC when it started out into local radio. I questioned its wisdom then, and I still question it today. It is an area that could be covered by the commercial interest, but that has been done, and, in fairness to the BBC, it has been done successfully. I questioned whether it was right to go into breakfast television. That is a very small part. It is right that any inquiry should look at the role of the BBC and ask whether it is right that what one might call the peripheral areas should be financed in the way that they are.

I say to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that I believe that the central thrust of the BBC, which seems to me to be its national programmes on television and radio, has enhanced the standard of television. Those programmes have enhanced it generally. If we were to turn to having them financed by advertising, it would be to the detriment of the standard not only of the BBC but of ITV. I do not dispute the need to look at sponsorship and other matters, but I hope that I shall not see the day when my right hon. and learned Friend invites the House to support advertising as a means of financing what I would call the BBC's basic services.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): I shall try to be as brief as the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), with whose views I largely agree.

Many years ago a young man went to a police station and told the sergeant on duty that there were some workmen dressed up as Oxford undergraduates digging up Piccadilly. He then went to the foreman of the workmen digging up Piccadilly and told him that there were some undergraduates dressed as policemen who were going to try to arrest them for wrongfully digging up the road. He then stood by and watched the most tremendous fight between the police and the road workers. That is very much what the Labour party has done on this matter. The Labour party is so void of ideas that it has tabled a prayer for no other reason than to cause trouble among Her Majesty's Government.

It is right for the House to realise that. One is sorry to intrude upon private grief. Nevertheless, this is a prayer. Whereas reading it on the Order Paper made it sound like an agnostic prayer, having heard it, it is more like an atheist prayer. It is supported by three Opposition Members, and when it was presented by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) he totally ignored the Wireless Telegraphy (Broadcast Licence Charges and Exemption) (Amendment) Regulations 1985, against which he was praying.

When the Labour party was in government between 1974 and 1979, it had every opportunity to cut or abolish the licence fee for old-age pensioners. During the four or five years in which Labour Members had the opportunity to do that they did absolutely nothing, but now that they are in opposition they say, "Let us save £320 million". This is no more than a charter to rent a grannie. If there were legislation whereby pensioners would not have to pay a licence fee, all that would happen is that everybody would find a pensioner who would somehow apply for a licence.

When the Labour party was in government it did not even undo the 5p licence for pensioners in warden-controlled accommodation. It would not have been difficult for that to be done. The excellent Annan report said:

> "Moreover, other elderly people who were not eligible for the licence considered that it favoured those who were already favoured by living in a home or in accommodation with the services of a warden."

The Labour party is wasting the time of the House on what is nothing more than a villainous little prayer, by which it is trying to make trouble. It is total humbug.

I am in favour of the continuation of the television licence in order to preserve the independence of the British Broadcasting Corporation. I would not like commercials to be shown on the BBC. God help us if people cannot have one channel, or preferably two, on which they can watch programmes of quality that are not interrupted every few minutes. Those who watched the open golf championship in America and found that every few minutes the action of play was interrupted by yet another commercial know how appalling it is to be unable to watch quality television without interruptions. If this prayer should come to a vote, and I hope that it does, as does the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South, my right hon. and hon. Friends and will not support it.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): The 25-minute speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) convinced me, if I needed to be convinced, that there is a thought-free zone opposite. On a subject so important as the financing of the BBC it is appropriate that we should spend the scarce time that is available to us upon the key issues. It is a pity that when Parliament is provided with only a very limited opportunity to debate the BBC—about once every three years—it does not discuss the issues at stake.

This debate is largely about the size of the licence fee, not whether advertising should be allowed. I am content to await the outcome of the inquiry that has been set up by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, although I disagree in principle with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle). At my instigation a debate was held shortly before Christmas on the possible alternatives which I hope will be considered by the inquiry.

This debate is also not about the editorial content of BBC programmes. My view has certainly never been conditioned by any criticism in that respect. On the contrary, many of the BBC's programmes are excellent, but that is not to say that some ITV programmes are not excellent, too.

I have two main reservations about the present situation. The first concerns the period within which the inquiry is to report. I believe that August 1986 stretches the time limit beyond all reason. If the report were to be available at the end of the two-year period—that is, by March 1986, in time for implementation in the year ending March 1987—that would go a long way to reassure me. Perhaps my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will be able to apply some pressure in that direction.

The second main issue is the fee. Two factors are involved. First, the increase is greater than the predicted rate of inflation not just over the two-year period but over three years, if we are to take my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at her word, as I certainly do. That lends credence to the view that the BBC, like many institutions, will be less rather than more committed to improving efficiency. The argument that inflation in broadcasting is higher than in the economy as a whole is a self-fulfilling prophesy. We must encourage the BBC, like any other institution, to create less inflation than in the economy as a whole and thereby help to reduce inflation in the economy as a whole. Much of the extra inflation in broadcasting is in fact due not just to overmanning in the BBC but to overmanning and restrictive practices in the IBA as well. That is one reason why, contrary to the view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South, I believe that it is important to have competition for advertising.

Secondly, the principle of the BBC licence fee has declined in legitimacy. In the days when the BBC provided a monopoly service, it was an easy equation for the punter to decide whether the service was worth the fee, but that situation changed with the advent of the BBC-IBA duopoly. Since then, technical change has brought cable television and it will shortly bring satellite television. Furthermore, many people now use their television sets to play video recordings which may have nothing whatever to do with BBC or, indeed, ITV broadcasts. Yet the licence fee must still be paid. I therefore question the legitimacy of the BBC having a monopoly of funds from this source when it is no longer responsible even for the majority of the service to people with receivers.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will consider those two reservations. He may be able to reassure me on the time scale, but I remain profoundly worried that he has gone along with an inflation figure greater than that for the economy as a whole.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I wish to make just two points.

First, provoked to some extent by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party, I wish to mention the problems of elderly people living on their own. Labour Members believe that there is every justification for ensuring that a concessionary television licence fee is available for such people. For many elderly people, particularly those getting on into their seventies, television is not just entertainment but a link with the outside world, especially during the winter months. I believe that it is right to have other concessionary schemes for the elderly such as the bus pass, and I hope that no one is suggesting that this should be discontinued. If any Tory Members think that it should be, they should say so to their constituents. If we accept that it is right to have schemes for the elderly, then I believe they should pay a much much smaller fee than the proposed £58 for a colour television licence. Such a scheme will be introduced in due course, if not by this Administration and thereafter no Government will dare withdraw it.

I am strongly opposed to any attempt to introduce advertising in BBC transmissions. Only a few months ago my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) introduced a Bill that would have had that effect, but it was defeated, mainly with the help of Labour Members. There is no enthusiasm in the country for advertising to be introduced on to the BBC. In the main, viewers welcome the opportunity to be able to watch television without having to suffer commercial breaks, and sometimes quite long ones.

There seems to be a lobby for advertising on the BBC on the Conservative Benches, but I welcome the remarks that have been made so far by Conservative Members who are opposed to it. I am sure that others want to argue the case for the introduction of advertising on to the BBC.

Whatever my criticism of the BBC—I was certainly critical of it during the previous general election because I do not believe that it was as free from prejudice as it should have been—it would be madness to undermine the professional excellence, independence from advertising and wide esteem, leaving aside political matters, in which the BBC is held in Britain and by so many abroad. We have had public service broadcasting for many years and anything that will erode the service that it provides, such as advertising, should be fiercely resisted. I hope that the Home Secretary and his Cabinet colleagues will resist the undoubted pressure from the Conservative Benches for the introduction of advertising into BBC transmissions.

Mr. Tim Brinton (Gravesham): My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones) questioned the need for a licence fee for the BBC. I suspect that we shall attempt closely to consider and scrutinise what the licence fee revenue should be used for, and that we shall be unable to do so without discovering what new finances would do for all other broadcasting.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) described the prayer as "villainous", a word which has been called into question. Perhaps it would be more apt to describe it as evil. If it were carried, it would condemn the BBC to a licence fee of £46, or perhaps nothing. It would certainly provide for no increase. However, Labour members have sought to defend the BBC. This is almost unbelievable. Why should such mischief be caused by those who are the defenders of the BBC?

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) referred to concessions for old-age pensioners. He did so without regard to their means. Not all old-age pensioners are on the basic old-age pension. Some of them, including retired Prime Ministers, are quite well off and can afford to pay a BBC licence fee. We should protect old-age pensioners and the needy by providing a DHSS test to ensure that a concession is given to those who need it most. We must help the needy and reform the present system, but we must consider closely the entire broadcasting system if we are to contemplate change.

The £58 fee is becoming too high a target for too many people. The average income is stretched to find such a sum once a year. I applaud what has been said about weekly or monthly payments, which are a way round it, but we must ask whether we should use a compulsory tax, called a licence fee, to provide bread and circuses, chocolates and light entertainment, to quite the extent that the BBC does. We should ask whether we want the BBC to go into every new piece of electronic progress. Such issues must be considered when we are discussing the financing of the BBC and the rate of the licence fee.

I am adamant that any attempt to make the BBC advertise would be doomed to failure in terms of the quality of the BBC's programmes and the rest of the advertising world. That is not the way forward, but the Peacock committee will take evidence from many people. The way forward is to be constructive and to question whether, with multi-choice, people are prepared to pay a compulsory levy. We must ask whether we should find some other means, such as a subscription, and back up a base licence fee set at a reasonable level with payments for services.

Time is short and I have gone on for too long. I hope that this is the first of many debates on the future of public service broadcasting.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): When the increased fee was announced on 27 March the opposition to the increase was strong on this side of the House. I am astounded that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) scarcely dealt with the hardship that will arise for the old and other low-paid people in the north-west if the increase goes ahead. I am astounded, if the rumour is correct, that the Opposition do not intend to divide the House. If they do not believe in the regulations, to which the hon. Gentleman hardly referred, they should at least have the courage to stand up and vote. As it is, precisely two Labour Back Benchers are present.

I should like some information about how the BBC is spending its money. I should like to know whether it is true that 200 members of BBC staff or, as has been suggested in another newspaper, a mere 140, are to cover the snooker championships in Sheffield. If so, why should the elderly and low-paid in my constituency pay for such gross overmanning? I agree entirely with those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who have said that there should not be such overmanning.

Advertising is not the only alternative. Economy should be the watchword. If the BBC is to economise, it should do so not on invaluable services, such as overseas broadcasting, but on the frills. It should concentrate on what it does so well and leave the rest to others. I am utterly opposed to the increase in the fee and hope that there will be a Division so that hon. Members who feel as I do can vote against the regulations.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): When the regulations increasing the licence fee to £46 were introduced, I gave notice that I would not support any further increase in the fee unless there was clear evidence of the BBC actively seeking alternative sources of financing to cover at least part of its programmes. There is not the slightest evidence of such an attempt. The BBC has decided that it can rely on Parliament to provide it with a licence fee which will allow it to go on with its present programming.

It has been said consistently that there is something peculiarly British about the BBC and that there is an especially high quality which must be defended. One of the most significant television experiences of the past few months was "The Jewel in the Crown". That was not on BBC, which screened a cheap and nasty import called "The Thorn Birds." It was not on ITV that only a week or so ago a pop singer pulled down his trousers and exposed himself: that occurred on BBC, for which we are told that higher standards operate. It was not ITV which pirated a news broadcast only today; it was the BBC, whose standards are supposed to be so high that we would do damage if we introduced an element of the commercial.

My constituents believe that an increase in the licence fee to £58 is too much. That licence fee will operate for two years, and the Peacock committee will report in the meantime. Undoubtedly the BBC will claim, "We shall have to take a very long time considering and discussing it," and there will be yet another increase. That is unacceptable.

There should have been a simple, straightforward statement that the licence fee would be held at its present level, plus an increase of 5 per cent. for this year's inflation and that, within 12 months, the BBC should come forward with its own proposals for raising the rest of its revenue after that time. By doing so, we would have concentrated the BBC's mind wonderfully and seen the way ahead.

I trust that there will be a Division so that we can flush out Opposition Members who had the gross gall to talk about a concessionary licence fee when they know darn well that none of their hon. Friends is present to vote for it. I also hope that there will be a Division so that the 50 or more Conservative Members who signed an early-day motion opposing an increase in the licence fee will have a chance to show just how serious they are.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): As a Conservative Member who signed the early-day motion, I came here fully intending to vote for the prayer, but when I heard the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) deliver his piece, I decided that there was no way in which I could go into the same voting Lobby as the hon. Gentleman.

I then discovered that the Opposition will not even press the prayer to a vote. The Opposition Front Bench are not supported by any of their Back-Bench colleagues. Tonight has been an exercise in sheer political humbug by the Opposition. They have promised the old-age pensioners that if they vote Labour at the next election they will not have to pay for a licence fee, without mentioning where the money will come from. We know that by the time the next election is held the Labour party's research department and all its pressure groups will have said, "Hang on a moment. There are others who ought to be included. What about the unwaged who are earning less than pensioners? What about those in the minority rights group?" In the end almost everyone will be exempt, and only 2 million people will be paying £200 a year for a TV licence. Labour's promise will be that everyone will be exempt and that the paternalistic Labour party will hand out free TV licences.

Two things concern me about the proposed increase to £58. First, it is three times above the rate of inflation, certainly in the two-year period, and above the predicted rate of inflation in the three-year period. I am one of those poor Back-Benchers who were not able to see the 200 pages of the Peat Marwick report which the BBC suppressed. There may be very good reasons why I should not be able to see it.

Mr. Brinton: In fact, the Peat Marwick report was published and placed in the Library, with one or two bits left out.

Mr. Maclean: I apologise if 200 pages were not suppressed, but perhaps the one or two bits that were left out would have helped hon. Members to conclude, "Yes, we will vote for a £58 licence fee." It is no good the BBC saying, "Trust us, we are efficient and we need this for our future expansion and development. Here are the reasons, but we shall not tell you why," especially when Peat Marwick Mitchell had to step in the day after the report was published to correct some of the misleading information which had been issued by the BBC. So much for high standards of reporting and broadcasting.

Secondly, I believe that the time scale is slightly too lax. I welcome what my right hon. and learned Friend has done. I called for an inquiry into the scope, nature and financing of the BBC. The inquiry is to be welcomed, and I congratulate my hon. Friend on initiating it. It is not appropriate for us to talk in depth about advertising in the BBC or other forms of sponsorship. The inquiry must determine that. I am worried that after the inquiry reports in August 1986 there will be months of consultation, it will be found appropriate for the Government to issue a Green Paper, and we shall then discover that we are in the run-up to a general election or that a new licence fee is required. That would be iniquitous. I agree that we should then say to the BBC, "I am sorry, but we shall cut off your licence fee and impose a new system." We must give it a run-in, and to do that we must have a shorter inquiry and a full investigation of the BBC. Let us find a system so that we can put into force alternative methods of funding by the time of the next licence fee inquiry.

I must tell Opposition Members that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I also wish to see pensioners and the low-paid exempt from the fee. The way to achieve that is not to force others to pay an exorbitant fee, but to freeze the fee at its present level while we find alternative methods of propping up the BBC's finances. We must be fair to everyone and not dish out licences like a social service. If the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and his two hon. Friends who remain present have any courage or political integrity, they will force the issue to a vote. They should not go round the country afterwards saying, "We put down a prayer which opposed the terrible increase in the licence fee and, oh, if only you had voted for us we would have given you free television licences". That would be deplorable. They should have the courage to vote tonight.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): I regret that, because we have lost some time, it will not be possible to hear further speeches from my right hon. and hon. Friends, many of whom wished to participate. The debate is being held in the most absurd circumstances possible — on a prayer, with few performers in the church. The remarks of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) were scarcely worth noting, except for one passage in which he quoted accurately from a rather brilliant speech that I made in December on these issues. I found that thoroughly acceptable, and recommend it to my hon. Friends.

The important speeches have come entirely from this side of the House. I face the ranks of Tuscany, and happily they are not evident. Those of my hon. Friends who have taken the issue seriously from the word go, have once again demonstrated their genuine anxiety about the progress of the BBC's financing.

The Government's role in judging what should be a correct settlement of fee occurs every three years under the present arrangement. During that period there will inevitably be considerable pressure about what a Government should do at the vital moment of reappraisal. I thank my hon. Friends who have made their views known loudly and clearly. It is certainly in view of all that they have said that my right hon. and learned Friend has made this year's settlement of such a special character.

First, I shall seek to justify to my hon. Friends the size of the increase that has been made. I fully understand that an increase from £46 to £58 cannot be accepted easily, especially by those who are living on fixed incomes. However, as I suspect my hon. Friends are aware, the three-year licence settlement which preceded this proposal means that, at the end of the period, the corporation was running not at a £46 licence fee equivalent, but at a £51 licence fee equivalent. That is inevitable if one seeks to establish a flat fee for a long period. During the first year the corporation was running at about £50 million below the licence fee generation, during the second it was equal to that generation, and in the third it exceeded that generation.

It is perfectly true that during that period the corporation was also increasing its services and seeking to offer greater value for the money that it was asking the viewer to pay—as many Conservative Members would wish. It is not reasonable for my hon. Friends to say that the job of the Government is to produce a licence fee and then to determine how to manage the BBC. There is no way in which the House, or indeed the Government, would wish to run the corporation and take over the role of the governors and the executive. I do not believe that that is what Conservative Members wish.

However, hon. Members expect the Government to provide for the next period major changes in the way in which the corporation should use its licence income, partially because they recognise that there is a significant alteration in the efficiency and productivity of the corporation. Therefore, my right hon. and learned Friend suggested that an independent inquiry should be held into its efficiency, and Peat Marwick Mitchell reported. I should make it clear that the £58 fee now proposed requires the corporation, bearing in mind its application for £65, to run the existing services at a higher rate of productivity than that which Peat Marwick Mitchell recommended in its specific objectives. It will require the corporation, which said in its application that a £60 licence fee equivalent is required to run existing services, to create a further improvement in productivity.

Secondly, when it comes to making a further extension, whether it be in development or in new services, the corporation must find existing services that can be covered by internal efficiencies and savings.

Therefore, during the next three-year period for which the licence fee has been set, there will have to be significant changes in the productivity and efficiency of the corporation. My hon. Friends were anxious to ensure that that should be part of the settlement, to determine once and for ever that there is no divine right suddenly to determine by application that the fee requested should be accepted under the threat that there would be major changes in what the corporation must do. The fact remains that the fee settlement, in relation to what the corporation sets out to do, is extremely tough. As Mr. Milne said to us the other day, having to forgo £350 million worth of revenue during a three-year period has required the corporation to take seriously into account the requirements for improved productivity and efficiency.

To deal with the licence fee period, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones), who I thought made a most trenchant contribution to the debate, asked about the time scale of Peacock and the relevance of the two or three-year licence period. I remind him that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, in his licence fee statement, said:

"I have therefore decided that the present licence fee settlement should be for a period of two years with the intention that any possible changes in the system of financing broadcasting should be considered in the light of the committee's report before the licence fee falls to be further renewed. But if decisions cannot be made in the light of the report within two years, or if it is decided there should be no change to the system, this settlement will run for a third year with the licence fee continuing at the rates I am announcing today."—[Official Report, 27 March 1985; Vol. 76, c. 480.]

I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that there is a possibility—I trust that it will be more than that—of the Peacock committee's report running to time, which means that it will be published by the middle of next year. That would influence the third year which my right hon. and learned Friend announced on 27 March. I fully accept the importance that my hon. Friend attaches to that objective.

My hon. Friend and several other hon. Members asked about the inflation rate. I must tell him that the inflation rates within the television industry are substantial, as he will know. The House must recognise that this is not wholly of the corporation's making. There is a large question mark over the pressures on costs that are presently exerted in the ITV system. Hence, the Government's review of the structure of the levy could have an important role to play, because the terms of reference of that review suggest that we are not entirely satisfied that the present structure of the levy does not result in cushioning ITV companies against resisting cost pressures. That, too, will be an important consideration when we consider further financing objectives for the corporation.

Finally, in reaction to the Peacock committee, many of the comments made have referred to whether there should be change. But what I trust the debate has demonstrated beyond doubt is the crucial importance that this matter be properly examined. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) was right to say that the Peacock committee's examination must be done carefully, not rashly or wantonly. I assure the House that the Peacock committee, in its terms of reference, has been given a wide range of options, which will ensure that many of the propositions that have been suggested by hon. Members in their anxiety to move quickly to advertising in this or that section of the corporation will be taken on board by the committee and by the Government. The Government, not the corporation, will receive that report, and the corporation, I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), is not a party to the decision-making of that committee. That is the way in which we shall examine this matter.

With a licence fee settlement that, at the very best, is to remain unchanged for three years, and has been arrived at with a much tougher rein on the productivity and efficiency of the corporation, with the Peacock committee genuinely looking at alternative sources of funding——

It being half-past Eleven o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 4 (Prayers against statutory instruments, &c. (negative procedure)).

PETITION

Transport Bill

11.42 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I have been a Member for more than 19 years, and I have never before presented a petition. The fact that Gwent county council has asked me to present this petition on its behalf shows that the county of Gwent is concerned about the proposals in the Government's Transport Bill. The petition is signed by the chief executive of the council, Mr. Michael Perry, and by the council's chairman, Mr. Viv Etheridge.

The petition points out that if the proposals are implemented there will be fewer services, less reliability, and little, if any, co-ordination. The council fears the possible withdrawal of the Council's concessionary pass scheme for the elderly and the disabled, and its replacement with a less flexible token based scheme.

Likewise, the council fears lower standards of vehicle safety and maintenance and inadequate resources for enforcement purposes.

The petition goes on to say:

There are wider aspects to the proposals. Gwent is an area of high unemployment and low car ownership. Public transport fulfils important environmental, social and economic functions, the loss of which would be felt by all sections of the community. In particular, the loss of mobility for the non car owner will reduce job opportunities, which in turn will frustrate efforts by new companies to recruit and maintain their work forces. Business and the community as a whole will therefore suffer.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House reject any legislation to implement the proposals of the White Paper on "Buses" and the Transport Bill.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Post Office, Pontarddulais

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): I am grateful for the opportunity to make known, in the stongest terms the opposition of the people of Pontarddulais to the closure of their sub-post office at Bolgoed road.

I raised the matter on the Floor of the House on 28 February this year during the annual Welsh affairs debate. I then pointed out that the Post Office has a code of practice for the closure of post offices, which is supposed to take into account six factors. None of those factors seems to have been considered in relation to Bolgoed road post office, which serves people up to two miles away who will now have to walk 2½ miles to collect their pensions, benefits and stamps, because there is only one other office to cope with their business. They will have to join existing queues for service at that other office. Most of the people affected are pensioners who will have to negotiate a long hill into Pontarddulais. There is no regular or reliable bus service.

The closure will take place despite the fact that Pontarddulais is scheduled in the local plan, following the efforts of the local chamber of trade and County Councillor Gareth Williams, for further development.

There are six ways in which the code of practice should operate in favour of Bolgoed road post office. I have received over 100 letters from people in Pontarddulais protesting at the closure and asking me to do what I can to prevent it.

I shall read just three of those letters, which are short, to the point and representative, to illustrate the hardship that the closure will create. Miss E. Williams of 49 Bolgoed road states:

"May I make the following observations in connection with the closure of Bolgoed Road Post Office.

1. In recent years there has been such a great deal of additional building of houses, e.g. Pentre Road and the new Council Houses in Pantiago (which also cater for infirm and disabled persons), that the above-named Post Office has served not only the upper end of Pontardulais, but also these new estates.

2. Planning permission has also been granted for a new site for approx. 80/90 houses on the old Brickworks in Bolgoed Road, which would mean further business for this Post Office.

3. Speaking on a personal basis, my Sister (an old-age Pensioner) is Blind and the only time she ventures out is to collect her Pension on a Thursday. The other residents of this road watch out for her so that they may help her across the road. This is her only walk of the week and she feels she accomplishes something herself by collecting her Pension. There is no way she would be able to walk down to the Dulais Road post office.

4. As I work from 8.0 a.m. to 5.0 p.m. and have to travel, there is no way I can collect her pension from the Dulais Road Post Office, and this would mean I would have to collect it on a Saturday morning.

5. At present the queues in the Dulais Road Post Office are not conducive to Old Age Pensioners, many of whom find it difficult enough to walk distances and then have to stand for a long time.

Surely, in this day and age, when there are so many Pensioners, it is ludicrous to even suggest closing a Post Office which serves so many people so well. Also, when so many people now purchase stamps for electricity, gas, television, etc., this again is a service, and should be preserved."

The second letter comes from Mr. Victor Davies, of 11 Twyniago road, Pontarddulais. He says:

"Dear Sir,

[Mr. Gareth Wardell]

As regards the closing of Bolgoed street Post Office, Pontardulais, this will mean to the wife and myself three quarters of a mile walking, as there are no buses available. We both are pensioners and are over 83 years old, 'registered disabled' persons, and unable to walk only very short distances. How we are going to manage I don't know. We have no children, and no relations at hand."

The third letter is from Mr. W. B. Jones, of 208 St. Deilo street, Pontarddulais. He says:

"I am in total agreement with not closing Bolgoed road sub-post office. My wife prior to her death was the sub-postmistress there for many years and I have some knowledge of how convenient it was for the aged, a few who are blind and many who suffer the malady of rheumatism, etc. Add to this the people who now live in sheltered homes, now opened in this area, the new housing estate at Pentre road with its young mothers and children, etc., then one can see where opposition against such closure stems from. I also cannot see what the 'Crown Office' in Swansea would save by this closure, for it is the Sub Postmaster himself who pays the rent, rates and other overheads appertaining to the business, not the Crown Office. The office in Dulais road is not a 'Crown Office' but another 'sub-office' . . . but with the closure of Bolgoed Road he would obviously get a higher remuneration, the saving to the 'Crown Office' would be minimal and would do nothing to alleviate the catastrophe of larger queues on the short and narrow stretch of road which is used by buses and other vehicles. It would mean the appointment of traffic wardens and even police at times, and our rates are high enough without this addition. So speaking as a healthy old age pensioner and for ones not so healthy, may your fight against this closure be victorious. We thank you for your help."

The Post Office document, "A Strategy for the Future", and Mr. Potter, chairman of Wales and the Marches Postal Board, speaking at the all-Wales conference on the closure of sub-post offices at Merthyr Tydfil on 15 February this year, said that urban sub-post offices must close so that the money saved can be spent on equipping Crown Offices with new technology, and on making them more attractive. The question is, attractive to whom? To the people in town who can already use a plethora of existing banks and building societies? One third of the Post Office's business is DHSS payments. Those customers need a local service. They do not want, nor can most of them afford, to pay bus fares to collect their pensions and benefits. The people of Pontarddulais tell me that they would sooner have their pensions and benefits paid into the bank than walk 2½ miles to collect it at the town post office.

Would the Minister, relatively young and fit as he is —and, at any rate as far as I can detect, free from arthritis and rheumatism—think it right that he should have to walk 2½ miles to collect his income each week? From his face, I note perhaps a lack of enthusiasm. Perhaps we are fortunate in this House not to have to walk many steps to enter the Members' post office. Yet this is the way the Post Office intends to expand its business, despite knowing that more and more of its customers are already opting for their pensions and benefits to be paid directly into their bank.

Mr. Potter said that if people use automatic telling machines outside post offices, they would go inside the post office to do other business. I disagree completely. People use automatic machines outside banks so that they will not have to queue inside, are not confined to one bank and can obtain cash outside bank hours.

The strength of the Post Office is its extensive local network. If people do not have a post office within easy reach, they will not use the service except to stock up on stamps. The attempt to turn post offices into banks will hasten their decline, not reverse it.

What about the social functions, supposedly laid down by statute, that the Post Office claims it cares about? Certainly the Post Office does not care about the social function of Bolgoed road sub-post office. The Post Office informed me in a letter dated 7 August 1984 that pensioners could nominate someone else to collect their pension. That showed a complete disregard of the morning spent on an hour's walk to the post office and back, with extra time spent chatting to friends on the way. That is what many pensioners do. Apart from the fact that they enjoy it, it is good for them to get out and be independent. That will be denied to the customers of Bolgoed road because they would have to walk too far, but the Post Office does not care. The Post Office does not take these social factors into account because to do so it would have to cost them, and that it has been unable to get right.

Mr. Potter says that these closures are taking place because of the financial limits which the Government have imposed on the Post Office. He said at Merthyr Tydfil that the Government had insisted that last year's profits of £70 million had to be invested in Government stock, and that those profits could not be used for development, but only the interest. The Post Office strategy document says that the Post Office must meet the Government demand of a 4 per cent. profit on turnover for the financial year 1984-85. It seems to me that the Post Office is being asked to do so with one hand—its profits—tied behind its back in Government coffers. Certainly it is to meet this financial requirement that the Post Office is closing 5 per cent. of its urban sub-post office network, despite the social cost.

I sent the letters that I received, over 100, to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for his examination. The reply I received from the Under-Secretary of State said that regretfully the Government's role was "confined to broad issues of general policy and to matters of overall financial control";

therefore, the closure of Bolgoed road was a matter for the Post Office. I expect that the Under-Secretary will make the same response tonight. But I must tell him plainly that from the viewpoint of the people of Pontarddulais and mine that will not be a good enough answer.

Under the Post Office Act 1969, the Post Office became a corporate body responsible for its own actions. Clearly, if the Government's role is with broad issues of policy, and if the Government dictate how profits will be used, or in this case not used, then it is Government policy and Government action that determine what happens to local post offices. The Government cannot wash their hands publicly of the responsibility for closures which result from the policy they dictate and from their financial controls on the Post Office service.

The Government and the Post Office have underestimated the strength of opposition to the closure of sub-post offices. It is an issue that people feel strongly about because it affects their day-to-day living. The fact that over 100 people, representing, as families, well over 200 of my constituents in one part of Pontarddulais, took the trouble to put pen to paper, demonstrates how strongly people feel.

Therefore, even at this late stage, and despite the comments made in the House on Monday by the Minister for Information Technology, I urge the Minister to reconsider his position and urge the Post Office to review the closure of the post office in Bolgoed road, Pontarddulais, I genuinely feel that the hardship to the people of that village in my constituency will be enormous and the service of which they will be deprived will make the quality of their lives poorer than it is at the moment, with the post office open.

12.1 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on his tenacity in fighting the case in which he so passionately believes on behalf of his constituents. I have examined the quite thick file of correspondence that he has initiated. Perhaps he himself, in fighting this case on behalf of his constituents, has gone some way towards making a significant contribution to the turnover of the Post Office. Of course, that was not his prime objective. His prime objective is to use our procedures legitimately and properly to raise a matter of considerable urgency.

The hon. Gentleman will have heard Ministers say from the Dispatch Box that they share his concern, or are equally worried about one phenomenon or another, but I say to him at the outset that there is hardly a Member of Parliament on either side of the Chamber who has not been faced with excruciating dilemmas similar to those which the hon. Gentleman exposed to us when deploying his arguments.

The hon. Gentleman described in some detail the efforts that he has made to persuade the Post Office that the Bolgoed road post office in his constituency should not be closed. It is, of course, quite right that he should have undertaken those efforts on behalf of those of his constituents who use that post office, and I can understand his disappointment over the fact that the Post Office has, nevertheless, decided to close that particular sub-post office.

The hon. Gentleman explained why he believes that that decision was wrong and why it should be reversed. However, as he rightly surmised, I am not able to comment on the particular circumstances of the particular case or to make any assessment of the Post Office's decision. Later I should like to flesh out that observation by pointing to the fact that there has been no change in the procedure adopted by this Administration compared with the procedure adopted by the previous Labour Administration. The hon. Gentleman has not raised the matter as a party political point. He has not sought to sensationalise the argument in political terms, and I shall not respond in that way. However, I am sure that if he were to examine later this week the number of closures by previous Administrations, and the way in which the policy has been implemented, he would find consistency, but it is that consistency that is upsetting his constituents at the moment.

My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in his reply to the hon. Gentleman's letter of 11 March to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, said that he was unable to comment, and referred the correspondence to the chairman of the Post Office. That was not because he was being obstructive or unhelpful. He was following the clear and consistent policy of this Government and their predecessors on such questions, which are operational ones for the Post Office to decide on, and are not for the Government under normal circumstances.

It should be clearly understood that the Post Office is responsible for running the counters network and that decisions about individual post offices are operational ones for the Post Office and not for the Government. This is in accordance with the clear distinction, of which the hon. Gentleman is aware, between the respective roles of the Government and the Post Office Board. Since the Post Office was established in 1969 as a public corporation with its own board, it has been the policy of successive Governments, embodied in the relevent legislation, that decisions concerning the day-to-day management of the business are the responsibility of the board. The role of the Government is confined to broad issues of general policy and matters of overall financial control.

I think that the majority of right hon. and hon. Members of this House have constituents who are affected by post office closures. The hon. Gentleman's arguments are at this very moment being deployed in my constituency. Of course no post office closure is popular, because it will inevitably mean some inconvenience to people who will have to travel further to the nearest alternative. It is quite understandable that the average post office customer's primary interest is in the particular post office which he or she is used to going to and is concerned if a decision is made to close that office. But the Government are required to take a wider view.

As far as the network of post offices is concerned, the Government's interest and responsibilities relate to the network overall, and the Government considered the Post Office's proposals for the urban network where most of the controversy has arisen in this context.

The Government have frequently stated their recognition of the valuable role that post offices play in the economic and social life of this country. However, if the network of post offices is to continue to play such a role in the future it is vital that the Post Office, in running the network, should look to ways of improving its efficiency and effectiveness.

By its nature, the counters business is an operation that has high fixed costs, and the economics of running it depend heavily on the volume of business which is undertaken. I must stress that the Post Office is a commercial organisation, and it is under no illusions that it is owed a living. It recognises that there are effective competitive alternatives for many of the services available in post offices and is well aware that if the counters network is to retain existing business and win new business it must provide an efficient and cost-effective service at prices which customers are prepared to pay. The majority of the business undertaken at counters is, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, work for Government Departments, public corporations and local authorities. They use the network because it provides a cost-effective way of meeting their requirements. It would be quite wrong to expect these agency customers to use the counters network irrespective of their costs, which are of course borne by their customers, taxpayers or ratepayers.

Since 1945, the Post Office has had a criterion of providing post offices in town areas at intervals of not less than one mile. This is not, and was never intended to be, a precise and inflexible standard. It represents what the Post Office has regarded as a reasonable balance between the service its customers would like and the costs involved.

[Mr. John Butcher]

The Post Office has not applied the criterion rigidly but has, over the years, made decisions about particular post offices in the light of local cirumstances. Up to the late 1960s the network grew as a result of new housing development population growth and growth in business. However, with some exceptions, closures were considered only when sub-postmasters resigned or retired and the distribution of population was not fully reflected in the provision of post offices. A review which the Post Office undertook in 1983 revealed an excess of about 2,000 offices against the general criterion. The excess of offices was particularly evident in the cities, especially the inner city areas.

The post office was, of course, aware that any proposals to tackle this excess of offices were bound to be unpopular and I think that it is to be commended in that it did not take the easy option of doing nothing but had the courage to draw up its proposals to reduce the number of post offices in urban areas.

The Post Office informed the Government about the outcome of the review and the proposals to reduce the size of the urban network. Our concern was to ensure that the proposals did not prejudice our commitment to the maintenance of a network adequate to enable the Post Office to fulfil its statutory duty as regards efficiency and economy and social needs. The Post Office's proposals included its intention to consult the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, the Post Office trade unions and the Post Office Users National Council. It also confirmed that individual closure proposals would be subject to the existing code of procedure agreed with POUNC in 1981, and revised in January 1984 to include Crown offices, which provides for consultation with local interests before final decisions are made to close individual offices.

We were satisfied with the overall balance which the Post Office was seeking to strike between the needs of those whom it serves and the need for reasonable economy and efficiency, and that the proposals were not inconsistent with its statutory duty. That, however, is the extent of the Government's involvement. We are not involved in decisions which the Post office takes on particular offices, nor are we involved in the process of prior consultation.

That is the background. Perhaps I may now deal with some of the points which the hon. Gentleman made, although, for the reasons that I have given, my comments are of necessity general ones and not specific to the circumstances surrounding the Bolgoed decision. As I have said, the Government have to take the broader view and consider the network as a whole.

In undertaking the review of the urban counters network and in framing the subsequent proposals for reducing the size of the network, the Post Office's aim was to improve the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of the network. The Post Office is well aware that the closures are not popular, but it believes that the exercise is essential to secure the future of the network to the long-term benefit of the community. The Post Office has the Government's full support in that regard.

The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about the operation of the code of procedure setting out the process for the Post Office to consult local interests before closure decisions are made. That concern has been echoed by a number of hon. Members and I am bound to say that there may be disagreement about the interpretation of the code in some areas.

As I have said, the Post Office does not apply the 1-mile criterion rigidly and the code sets out the other factors which are taken into account. As well as the distance from other offices, it considers the amount of business done, the type of business and whether, for example, a lot of pensions are paid there, the difficulty customers would face in getting to another office—for example, whether there is a suitable bus service and whether there are steep hills—the ability of nearby offices to absorb additional work and the likely future development of the area.

The hon. Gentleman has gone through those factors and explained why he disagrees with the Post Office's assessment in the case of the Bolgoed road sub-post office. I am not in a position to make a judgment on whose view is the better one. Clearly any assessment is bound to be a mixture of fact and subjective judgment, but at the end of the day it is for the Post Office to make the decision. I am aware that the hon. Gentleman is not alone in his criticism of the consultation process, but a distinction has to be made between criticism of a decision and criticism of the route taken to reach the decision.

In more than 10 per cent. of cases the Post Office has withdrawn proposals to close offices following local consultation, so consultation has certainly not been a cosmetic exercise. I think that that is clear evidence that the approach is not rigid and inflexible and that the Post Office takes the consultation process, which is not a statutory requirement, very seriously. It listens to local views, and when it has been convinced by the arguments it has changed its mind. To describe the process as window dressing or a sham, as some hon. Members have suggested, is to do the Post Office a grave injustice.

With regard to powers to intervene, section 11(2) of the Post Office Act 1969 refers to directions of a general character to remedy a defect in the general plans or arrangements of the Post Office for the exercise of its powers. A particular closure decision clearly cannot be regarded as a general plan or arrangement.

The hon. Gentleman raised two or three other issues which, for the sake of further clarity, we may wish to pursue in further correspondence. I am grateful to him for raising an issue which has specific implications for his constituents but which is also a matter of general concern. I hope he will be reassured that we are aware of the issues and are anxious to respond in an appropriate manner.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Rosemaund Experimental Husbandry Farm

1. Mr. John M. Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to pay an official visit to the Rosemaund experimental husbandry farm in the west midlands.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I have no plans at present to visit Rosemaund in the near future.

Mr. Taylor: Is my hon. Friend happy with the advice being given to farmers by ADAS on conservation generally and on the management of broadleaved woodlands on farms in particular?

Mrs. Fenner: Advice on forestry generally is a matter for the Forestry Commission. However, ADAS does give wide-ranging advice on conservation matters, including the management of woodlands, as part of the farm enterprise.

Agricultural Prices

2. Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the 1985 agricultural price levels.

3. Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further consideration has been given by the European Economic Community Council to the Commission's agricultural price proposals.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): My Department has received representations about the Commission's price proposals from the farmers unions in the United Kingdom, representatives of the food manufacturing industry, food retailers and consumers. The Agriculture Council discussed the proposals at its meetings on 25 and 27 March and on 1 and 2 April and discussions are expected to resume at the next meeting of the Council starting on 22 April.

Mr. Strang: Is the Minister aware that there is a desperate need to start to tackle the problem of high sale prices and the surpluses that they create, which is why both sides of the House supported the stand that he took in our debate on this issue? Will he give the House a cast-iron assurance that in no circumstances will he agree to a price-cut of anything less than the 3·6 per cent. put forward by the Commission?

Mr. Jopling: I agree that it is very important that the right signals are given about cereals right across the Community. We must bear in mind that when we arrive at this year's harvest we could find 15 million or 16 million tonnes of grain still hanging over from the previous harvest.

Mr. Deakins: What attitude will the Minister adopt in the Council if, as is likely, his colleagues from the other Common Market countries alter the Commission's price proposals to increase the total cost outside the scope of the financial guideline laid down by the Heads of Government and the Finance Council?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will remember the discussions that we held on the general principles on 18 March when we expressed our opinions. He will know that if it seems likely at any stage of the negotiations that the costs of the proposals will go above the agreed ceilings, there is provision for a Joint Council with Finance Ministers at a future date to thrash out the financial problems.

Mr. Maclean: Following the representations that my right hon. Friend has received, will he assure the House that he is strongly urging the European Commission on the abolition of the co-responsibility levy and also fighting to the utmost for the retention of the beef variable premium?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that in the debate, in which he took part, I made it clear, in regard to the beef variable premium, that it was my intention to fight for the continuation of that measure, and there was broad agreement among hon. Members on that. He will also recall the proposal of the Commission to reduce the co-responsibility levy from 3 to 2 per cent. I have been greatly heartened by the discussions; in particular, by hearing the French representative say for the first time that he believed that we should be thinking in terms of phasing out the co-responsibility levy for milk — a sentiment which I strongly support.

Mr. Nicholson: In view of the protracted negotiations that are taking place in Brussels on the co-responsibility levy, will the right hon. Gentleman consider introducing an interim measure, to take effect from 1 April, to reduce the levy by 1·5 per cent.? That would at least provide some aid for the hard-pressed dairy farmers, who have suffered much in the last 12 months, and such a step would not in any way affect the price of milk to the consumer.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that because we were not able to reach agreement in the discussions the 1984-85 marketing year was extended to 28 April. Within that arrangement we already have a further 1 per cent. reduction in the milk quota. The Commission made it clear that there would be nothing to stop the backdating of the reduction of 1 per cent. in the co-responsibility levy to 1 April.

Mr. Body: In considering the representations, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that agricultural price levels have been declining and that farmers' real incomes have been maintained only by increasing output? Is he aware that if restraints on output are imposed many thousands of farmers will face a great dilemma, unless there is a reversal of policy at home?

Mr. Jopling: I am naturally concerned about the impact of these measures on farm incomes. My hon. Friend will agree, however, bearing in mind the massive over-production and huge surpluses which overlay the Community market, that it is important to put our house in order now. Otherwise, it will be infintely more difficult to do so at a later stage.

Mr. Maclennan: What proposals does the Minister have with respect to livestock producers' incomes in the light of the representations that he has received?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman was present when we debated that issue on 18 March. He will remember that I said—and I repeated it today—that it was important to maintain the beef variable premium scheme. He will also recall that part of the Commission's proposals was for a move to the second stage of the introduction of the carcase classification grid for beef. I made some remarks in the debate about sheepmeat and the importance of making sure that any alterations to the sheepmeat variable premium were compensated through the annual ewe premium, or the system would be discriminatory against the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the cereals sector has not experienced the same income reductions as have been suffered by the livestock sector? Does he further agree that a cut in the price of cereals would help the livestock sector, as well as benefiting the consumer and helping to curb surpluses? What minimum cut in grain prices is he insisting on during the current negotiations?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will recall that in the debate on 18 March I made it clear that I did not believe that the proposed 3·6 per cent. cut in cereal prices made by the Commission was adequate and that the full cut of 5 per cent., stemming from the guarantee threshold, should be applied. I have therefore been telling the Council of Ministers that, for the reasons to which my hon. Friend rightly draws attention, a 5 per cent. cut would be the correct move to make.

Mr. Skinner: When the Minister has stripped all the jargonese from his remarks, will he explain whether the Government, in accordance with their philosophy, believe that market forces will apply to farms and that uneconomic farms will close? Alternatively, does he believe in continually subsidising farms, as is happening this year to the tune of about £20,000 per farm?

Mr. Jopling: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman was present in the Chamber when we debated these matters on 18 March.

Mr. Skinner: I was.

Mr. Jopling: I am glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman was in his place. We do not usually forget his presence.

In France, for example, there is expected to be a major reduction in the number of uneconomic dairy farms. That demonstrates that market forces are operating much more effectively within the CAP and that the level of support is being reduced. The hon. Gentleman will remember that at the Stuttgart summit there was general agreement in the Community that we could not continue to subsidise enormous surpluses of food.

Mr. John: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into account the fact that, even if we achieve a full 5 per cent. cut in cereal prices, there is still a danger that the rake's progress of increased cereal production will continue?

Mr. Jopling: No one can tell, but the hon. Gentleman must remember that last year there was what amounted to a reduction in cereal prices. If we were to have another reduction, many of those who are growing what amount to surplus cereals on land which traditionally has not been used for that purpose will have to consider whether it is wise to continue to produce cereals.

Surplus Grain

4. Mr. Wareing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new methods of disposal of surplus European Economic Community grain have recently been considered; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): There is currently some discussion about finding new outlets for Community cereals, and the issue has been raised in this year's price fixing discussions. We would look positively at proposals into the development of any such outlets if they seemed likely to be economically viable. It remains to be seen whether this will be the case.

Mr. Wareing: Is the Minister aware that certain elements in the EEC have made the appalling proposal that surplus food should be converted into plastic material? Surely that is an appalling proposition at a time when millions of people in sub-Saharan Africa are in need. Will the Minister give an undertaking that the British Government will not support the proposal and will seek positive ways in which the surplus can be used to feed people, which is the purpose for which it was grown originally?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are spending considerable sums in disposing of quite a large part of the cereal surplus as emergency food aid to the African drought countries. We intend to deliver 1·2 million tonnes from last year's harvest. However, there is still a surplus, and that is why other suggestions are being made. I have not heard the suggestion to which the hon. Gentleman referred, but there is no sense in spending vast sums to find alternative outlets. We must ensure that any such outlets are economically viable.

Mr. John : As opposed to what has been allocated by the EEC, how much of the surplus grain has been delivered to Ethiopia and the Sudan?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not have the exact figures immediately to hand. If the hon. Gentleman tables a question seeking that information, I shall answer it.

Privatisation

5. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the estimated savings by his Department for 1984-85 as a result of privatisation schemes.

Mr. Jopling: No functions of my Department were privatised during 1984-85. However, new savings as a result of further contracting out of services are estimated at over £200,000 in a full year.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend ensure that small firms are given sufficient opportunities to tender for these services?

Mr. Jopling: Yes. My hon. Friend may like to know that tenders are open to all-comers and that contracts have been placed with firms for cleaning, security guarding, press cutting, laundry, maintenance and a number of other services, including data preparation and graphic production.

Mr. Home Robertson: As there has been speculation about privatisation in other areas, will the Minister acknowledge that the agri-chemical and fertiliser industries would have a vested interest in becoming involved in any privatised advisory or research services and that, with the best will in the world, they would be unlikely to give advice which would reduce the sales of their own products? Therefore, does he accept the overwhelming environmental case in the public interest for retaining independent advisory and research services under the auspices of his Department?

Mr. Jopling: I have no plans for the privatisation of the functions of ADAS. I have accepted in principle that it is appropriate for those who benefit from the services of ADAS to contribute to the costs, and I am pursuing the practical implications of that. The hon. Gentleman makes a mistake if he thinks that farmers are gullible. They always look to see where the advice comes from before deciding what assessment to make of it.

Agricultural Prices

6. Mr. Torney asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration he is giving to the interests of consumers and taxpayers in the farm price review negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I have regard to all United Kingdom interests, including those of consumers and taxpayers, in the negotiations on CAP prices.

Mr. Torney: Is not the best way to dispose of Common Market and our own surpluses to lower their prices and make it possible for people to purchase them? Furthermore, with the accession of Spain and Portugal to the Common Market, will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to protect our taxpayers' interests, because enormous sums of money will be needed to bring the Spanish and Portuguese agriculture and fishing industries into line wih EC regulations? Will he make sure that we do not pay more than our fair whack?

Mr. Jopling: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, the accession of Spain and Portugal is rather wider than his question. The Government have consistently pressed for a more realistic pricing policy under the CAP. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that CAP prices were reduced in 1984 for the first time and that within the past six years consumers have had an infinitely better deal than they had under the Labour Government, when, in five years, food prices rose by 117 per cent.

Cereal Production

7. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the alternative means of restricting cereal production which are under consideration in his Department.

Mr. MacGregor: Decisions in that area are matters for the Community, but I accept the need to bring the cereals sector into a better balance. Restricting production directly could be one way of doing that. Others include developing new outlets, finding new ways of financing existing policies, or encouraging the greater operation of market forces through a restrictive price policy or by reducing the impact and coverage of support measures. I remain convinced that a sustained policy of price restraint is the best way of improving the balance of the cereals market.

Mr. Home Robertson: Earlier it was said that there was likely to be a 16 million tonne carry-over of cereal surpluses into next year. Does the Minister accept that a marginal price cut, be it 3·6 or 5 per cent., will lead to pressure to increase production? Does he further accept that the draconian price cuts necessary to have the effect of suppressing production would have a devastating effect on smaller producers? Will he now take our advice and consult about contingency plans for cereal quotas, or has he learnt nothing from the shambles of the hastily introduced milk quotas?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman underestimates the effect that a sustained policy of price restraint could have. We have obviously been engaged in contingency planning. Our analysis of the alternatives and awareness of the difficulties and disadvantages involved in them leads us to the view that price restraint is by far the best answer, if it can be achieved.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend ensure that those contingency plans are ready to be implemented quickly, because our experience over milk quotas tends to suggest that when the Council of Ministers makes a final decision we shall not want to be caught on the hop again?

Mr. MacGregor: It is important to recognise that in the current price-fixing negotiations the proposal on the table is for price restraint. That is what we are discussing. The position is rather different from that of milk last year. Therefore, it is important to try to obtain a realistic answer along those lines in the negotiations.

Common Agricultural Policy

8. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to co-operate with the European Economic Community Commission to produce a rationalisation of the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Jopling: I am willing to co-operate with all concerned to ensure that the process of putting the CAP on to a more rational basis is continued.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that if the rationalisation plans inevitably lead to reduced financial expenditure, especially in rural upland areas, the Government must have contingency plans to ensure that we do not return to the bad old days in the early 1960s of rural depopulation and unemployment?

Mr. Jopling: Certainly the Community is extremely worried about those matters. I have no doubt that within the areas which the Commission has identified such matters will be of concern. In particular, one of the groups proposed by the Commission is to study agriculture in society—that is, the position of agriculture in the rural economy.

Mr. Latham: Regarding rationalisation, does my right hon. Friend appreciate that those of his hon. Friends who heard both Lord Peart and the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) separately introduce expansionist White Papers when they were Ministers of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are looking to him soon to produce a general strategy document for agriculture in the light of the new restrictionist policy?

Mr. Jopling: At present, when so many uncertainties and matters are in the process of coming to fruition, it would not be appropriate to produce a White Paper of that sort. However, I do not rule that out. I have an open mind about it for the future.

Mr. Maclennan: What induced the Minister to stand on its head the expansionist policy of his predecessor?

Mr. Jopling: The answer is simple. In June 1983, within a few weeks of the general election, the European Council meeting in Stuttgart at last decided that the CAP should be brought back to reality and rationality. As a result of those sensible decisions, which should have been taken years earlier—if British advice had been followed they would have been taken years earlier — we have been able to return the CAP to a degree of realism.

Sir John Wells: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the British hops industry, which was strong for 60 years until two years ago, is currently in a state of great anxiety? Will he take steps to ensure that there is a greater degree of rationalisation throughout the European Community regarding hops? Will he pay a further visit to hop growers, as opposed to the Hops Marketing Board, this year?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend may recall that last September, besides visiting the headquarters of the Hops Marketing Board, I visited hops farms and saw the harvesting and processing of hops. I am aware of the current position, which gives rise to many difficulties. As my hon. Friend knows, we have a problem of over-supply at present. I shall most certainly keep my eye on the matter.

Livestock Farming (Financial Resources)

9. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what shift in financial resources he has been able to make from cereals to livestock for the year 1985-86.

Mr. MacGregor: Discussions are currently taking place on the Commission's proposals for the 1985-86 price fixing, which would reduce the CAP support price for cereals, leave unchanged the price of beef and pigmeat and make modest increases in the price support for milk and for sheepmeat from January 1986.

As my hon. Friend knows, we are committed to trying to achieve a better balance of support between the arable and livestock sectors, and we have indicated that we feel the Commission's proposals do not go far enough in reducing the price support for cereals.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that much more needs to be done if lifestock farmers are to receive the same financial opportunities as cereal farmers? Can we expect an accelerating trend towards livestock farming in the coming year?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend will know that in view of the market position, for example, in beef, the Community beef management committee recently agreed to augment the existing programme of hindquarter intervention with a short period of private storage aids. I hope that that will help. I believe that our endeavours to retain the beef premium scheme—at present it costs £2 million to £3 million a week to help producers—will undoubtedly help. We are trying to restore the balance in all those directions. However, I also believe that the recent reduction in the breeding herd will help to restore the balance and will help livestock producers in the long run.

European Community (Portugal)

11. Mr. Proctor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the National Farmers Union regarding the effect of Portugal's accession to the European Economic Community on British agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I am not aware of any aspect of the terms for Portugese accession which is of substantial concern to the National Farmers Union.

Mr. Proctor: What of the problems of the soft fruit farmers of the south of England?

Mr. Jopling: The arrangements that we have made regarding the cost of Portuguese accession to the Community budget, in view of the major uncertainties about developments between now and the end of the 10-year transitional period, should mean that the National Farmers Union need not have immediate and serious concern on this matter.

Mr. Forth: Is my right hon. Friend not worried about the potential effect on the balance of voting in the Council of Ministers of the EC when Portugal and Spain come in and add their weight to the votes of Greece, Italy and France to swing the emphasis of CAP money to southern products, to the detriment of our farming interests?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend should consider the terms of the accession agreement, which awaits ratification and signature. With the transitional period that has been negotiated, I believe that British growers need not have serious worries.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one reason for supporting agriculture in the United Kingdom, especially in mountain areas, is the fact that, for strategic reasons, we have learnt that we must keep livestock there, and that this could be affected substantially by the enlargement of the Community?

Mr. Jopling: Regardless of the fact that it is proposed that Spain and Portugal should join the Community, it is unlikely that our support for the upland areas will be eroded.

Milk Quotas

15. Mr. Penhaligon asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects producers to be told of their positions as far as final milk production is concerned for the year 1985-86.

Mr. MacGregor: The Milk Marketing Board for England and Wales will be notifying producers of their 1985-86 quotas within the next few weeks.

Mr. Penhaligon: Obviously, that is an improvement on last year. Can the Minister say that the Government have finally decided not to pay farmers the full quota allocated to them through the claims made at the tribunals? Is that decision final, or will the Government rethink their position and inform the farmers at a later date that their quotas have been increased by extending the outgoers scheme so that the extra quota allocated can be paid in full?

Mr. MacGregor: I think that the hon. Gentleman has in mind farmers with development claims who are looking for secondary quota from the tribunals. As he knows, that comes out of the reserve that we held back from primary quotas. Since the tribunals awarded the amount that they did, it is necessary this year to cut the awards by about 35 per cent. We do not yet know what the final position will be for next year, but I do not expect it to be much different. As to the outgoers scheme, the hon. Gentleman will know that, as milk producers become accustomed to quotas, they are more anxious to stay in milk production. Therefore, there is still some capacity left in the outgoers scheme.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Minister realise that the rough justice handed out in some cases by the quota tribunals, on their admission, as a result of the rules which they have had to operate, has meant much hardship for many farmers? Will he now confirm publicly what I understand he said privately: that he will sift through those cases to ensure that something can be done to assist such producers?

Mr. MacGregor: The tribunal process is a judicial one, and we made it clear from the outset that it would not be possible for us to intervene or interfere in the decisions about individual producers. That remains the case, but we knew from the outset that some difficult cases could not be covered by the regulations. We have made it clear that we are reviewing those cases, but without commitment, because it depends on having additional quota available to give to those whom we think deserve it.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Is my hon. Friend aware that a great many farmers believe that those countries in the EC which have no proper milk register are unable to operate a proper quota system? Will he tell the House which countries of the EEC have a proper overall milk register for quota system milk?

Mr. MacGregor: We made it very clear in the Council from the outset that the new system that has been introduced in the Community must be applied fairly and equally by all member states. We continue to insist on that, and that is why we took the decision that we did earlier about the payment of super levy. On the particular question my hon. Friend asked, I am endeavouring to get precise information on registers, but there is evidence that the vast majority of member states are now applying the quota system. It is quite significant that more than 20,000 dairy producers in France, for example, have come out of dairying in the past year.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister take this opportunity to accept the specific recommendation in the report of the Select Committee on Agriculture that Government compensation should be given to farm workers who lose their jobs as a consequence of these quota schemes? Can he give us any reason why this second search which is now taking place for outgoers to release quota for needy cases should be any more successful than the first one?

Mr. MacGregor: We shall obviously give our considered reply to the Select Committee's report, but, as we have made clear frequently in the House, the outgoers scheme is not a redundancy payments scheme and was never designed to be so. There are statutory redundancy payment arrangements, as the hon. Gentleman knows. On the hon. Gentleman's second point, it is important to recognise that we set ourselves, as the objective of the outgoers scheme, the yielding of enough quota to enable us to help all cases of exceptional hardship and all small milk producers to get back to 1983 production levels. I believe that the rate of progress we are making brings us very close to achieving that.

Beef Production

17. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the prospects for the beef sector of the agriculture industry.

Mr. MacGregor: There is at present a surplus of beef in the Community, partly due to the increased cow cullings following the introduction of milk quotas, and producers' returns are accordingly relatively low in relation to the Community's guide prices. In view of the market situation, the Community beef management committee recently agreed to augment the existing programme of hindquarter intervention with a short period of private storage aids. The need is to achieve a better balance between supply and demand in the Community.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that the longer-term beef production cycle means that there has also to be commensurate longer-term confidence in the United Kingdom beef producing sector? Is he aware that his and his right hon. Friend's robust defence of the scheme is welcome, in that it does lead and will lead to the consumption of beef? Can he seek to sustain it on a longer-term basis instead of a year-by-year negotiation basis?

Mr. MacGregor: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the scheme, and if we had been able to achieve that we would obviously have gone for it. Unfortunately, we were not responsible for the arrangement, which meant that it was on a one-yearly basis. My hon. Friend is right in the point that he makes about consumption. We estimate that if we had not had the beef variable premium scheme last year beef consumption would have been 8 per cent.

or more lower than was the case. That would have led to considerable increases in intervention, which, of course, also creates considerable problems of physical storage.

Mr. Jim Spicer: Does my hon. Friend agree that, against the background of the figures which he has just given, the view of the Commission is so irrational as to border on the lunatic? Did he by any chance hear the representative of the Commission on the farming programme this morning declaring in no uncertain terms that it was going to see the end of the variable beef premium? Is that not absolute nonsense?

Mr. MacGregor: We have made it very clear, as my hon. Friend knows, that we shall use every endeavour to retain that scheme this year. One of the arguments is that we estimate that without the premium 75,000 to 80,000 tonnes of beef would have had to go into intervention last year to keep producer prices at roughly the same levels. It seems to me that, with the problems of physical storage, it is very much better to have the beef going on to consumers' plates than into intervention.

Mr. Cockeram: Does my hon. Friend accept that small, family-run farms are the backbone of the livestock industry, including the beef industry, and that in recent years the agricultural price reviews have tilted matters in favour of the large producer? This year, is it not time that the balance was tilted in favour of the small, family-run farm?

Mr. MacGregor: I think that it is clear from the debate that we had on the price review proposals, and from the Government's response, that we agree that it is important to get a better balance between cereals and livestock. That is our endeavour in negotiations.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that we have reached Question 17, and that every Tory Member who has asked a question has called for more Government intervention, more subsidies of one kind or another——

Sir John Wells: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I did not.

Mr. Skinner: I have not finished yet. We have caught Tory Members at it. Every one of them wants more subsidies. Why does the Minister not——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are talking about beef. Perhaps the Minister will try to reply to the question as far as it has gone.

Mr. Skinner: Where is the beef? Will the——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have called the Minister to answer as far as the hon. Gentleman has gone.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister convey to his colleagues that if the Cabinet is prepared to intervene in the farming industry on a massive scale, to appease all these Tory Members——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have reminded the hon. Gentleman that the question is about beef. So far he has not referred to beef. Perhaps the Minister will now reply.

Mr. MacGregor: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman has not been listening, either to what my hon. Friends have been asking or to what Ministers have been saying in reply.

Mr. Skinner: They have been calling for more money.

Mr. MacGregor: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman just does not understand.

Conservation Projects

19. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the use of funds under the common agricultural policy for conservation projects.

Mr. Jopling: As I told the House on 13 March, the Commission has agreed to bring forward during 1985 proposals for a Community-funded scheme based on the new provision for grants to environmentally sensitive areas. This represents a very successful outcome to the initiative which I put forward last year. FEOGA funding is already available for conservation work undertaken as part of an agricultural improvement.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the personal initiative of my right hon. Friend in this matter. What is the value of the funds, and what proportion of the total do they represent? For the benefit of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) I assure him that I am talking about the switching of funds and not about the increasing of funds.

Mr. Jopling: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend, but it is not possible to isolate a figure to show how much FEOGA spends on the conservation element of agricultural improvements. It is too early to assess the cost of our new initiative. We shall be seeking primary legislation as soon as possible.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Now that the Government have effectively banned the use of the pesticide dieldrin, why do they not use some of the European money for conservation purposes to ensure that that dieldrin that still remains in the supply chain within the United Kingdom is not used? Why do they not purchase it, take it off the market and protect the environment in so doing?

Mr. Jopling: That is rather wide of the question, but the hon. Gentleman will well know—I know that he is a member of the Standing Committee that is dealing with these matters—that the Government are taking positive steps to reduce any risks from the use of pesticides.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Can the Minister give us an assurance that there will be no reduction in United Kingdom funded aid for conservation when we get the money from the Community, so that we avoid the dreaded additionality problem?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman should recall that the initiative agreed during March by the Council of Ministers is, at this stage, a nationally funded scheme. We hope that, at a later stage, we can persuade the Community to embrace the scheme as one funded by Community money. We have in progress an investigation of that possibility.

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. Friend give the House an assurance that it is his policy, wherever possible, to conserve land for agricultural use? In view of the arguments that we hear in the House from time to time about north versus south, does he agree that it would be helpful if he and his ministerial colleagues would take on board the point that so long as we allow farming land to be eaten up for development in areas such as Dorset, we are doing everything that we should not be doing if we wish to encourage growth in the less-favoured parts of the country?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will know that a great deal of the effort of my Ministry goes in giving advice about the quality of the land that is concerned in development. He will know that over the years the Government have had a policy of trying to prevent the very best land being taken by development.

Agricultural Prices

20. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the lates position regarding the Common Market price fixing negotiations; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) earlier today.

Mr. Latham: Now that we have a regime of milk quotas, has not the milk co-responsibility levy lost all meaning? Surely my right hon. Friend ought to start negotiations in the Common Market to try to get rid of it?

Mr. Jopling: I agree very much with what my hon. Friend says. He will know that the Commission has proposed to adjust from 3 to 2 per cent. the milk co-responsibility levy. I have said consistently that if one is to try to help dairy farmers I would much rather it were done through reducing the co-responsibiliy levy than by increasing the price.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Brinton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to attend a banquet given by President Banda.

Mr. Brinton: In thanking my right hon. Friend for that reply, may I ask her if she has yet had time to study the people in work figures published yesterday, which show that there were 340,000 more people in work last year? Will she also confirm that, at 65 per cent., the proportion of people in work in this country is among the highest in the major industrial nations and well above the European average?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the subject of the increasing number of people who found jobs in 1984. If one takes the period since March 1983, one sees that some 613,000 more jobs have been created. Had we said in March 1983 that it was our policy to create 600,000 more jobs by March 1985 we would not have been believed. In fact, they have been created. As my hon. Friend has said, the proportion of the population of working age in work is higher in this country than in West Germany, France or Italy, and equal to that in the United States.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Prime Minister know that while she was away 39 shire counties were told that they were to receive less rate support grant than they had been promised? Does she know that the reduction in that rate support grant is the direct result of the Greater London council levying a lower rate than the Government anticipated? How does she justify penalising Kent, Lancashire and Essex because the GLC has not raised its rate as much as the Government anticipated?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, it is customary to give an expected rate support grant and later to correct it. In this case it was corrected because the GLC decided to agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. In fact, in spite of all its posturings it set a rate below the limit that he had specified.

Mr. Hattersley: That may be customary under the new system, but it is clearly absurd. I ask the Prime Minister again to explain why Lancashire should be penalised because the GLC set a lower rate than the Government anticipated. Does it not demonstrate that the present system of rate support grant is preposterous and should be abolished, and that the Secretary of State for the Environment should go with it?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The GLC has bent towards my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the system used in this respect, the corrective system, was also used previously.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hattersley: As always, the Prime Minister has scored high marks for irrelevant stridency. But I ask again how she justifies Lancashire being penalised because the GLC has raised a lower rate than she anticipated.

The Prime Minister: Because that is the system that has applied not only under this Government but under previous Governments as well. There is — [Interruption.] It does no earthly good to get excited and hysterical about it. That is the fact. The right hon. Gentleman may not like it, but it is a fact.

Sir Hector Monro: Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to try to understand the shadow Cabinet's shambles of a policy on mortgage relief? Can she confirm that mortgage relief is safe under the Conservatives?

The Prime Minister: I note that it is now Labour policy to abolish tax relief on mortgages. It is Conservative policy to keep tax relief on mortgages, and will continue to be.

Dr. Owen: Has the Prime Minister seen the forecast, given by her former adviser, Sir John Hoskyns, of 10,000 job losses as a result of the national insurance changes in the Budget? Will she consider a reduction in the overall rate of the employers' contribution to offset the welcome effect of the restructuring at the lower end of national insurance?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. The restructuring of employers' national insurance contributions, taken across the board, was slightly favourable towards employers. As the right hon. Gentleman will recall, if he looks at the figures in the Red Book, the restructuring was slightly favourable overall towards employers because they received more relief at the lower end than imposition at the higher end. Of course, it will vary from employer to employer.

Q2. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cox: Is the Prime Minister aware that today's statement that the Government are to get their act together in the inner city areas will be met with utter disbelief by those who live in them? Is she unaware of what her policies have meant for the inner cities? There is massive unemployment, inadequate housing and the people there have had to mount a continuous campaign to try to keep their hospitals and local social services. If she is unaware of the result of her policies, why does she not go to those inner city areas and meet not the local Tory party officials but those who live there? Why does she not do that? No amount of dressing up Tory policies will solve our problems unless the money is provided to do that.

The Prime Minister: A statement has been put out and task forces are to be set up in certain specific city areas. No matter what the hon. Gentleman says about hospitals and the Health Service, it remains a fact that after inflation has been taken into account 20 per cent. more has been spent on the NHS under this Government——

Mr. Cox: Rubbish.

The Prime Minister: That is a fact. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to challenge it, perhaps he should table a question. He will find that the answer to it is exactly the same as mine today.

Mr. Cox: Come to my constituency and see.

The Prime Minister: This Government have a far better record on the Health Service than the Labour Government ever had, and a far better record on building hospitals and on providing doctors and nurses than the Labour Government had. That is true, despite the hon. Gentleman's shouting and hysteria, which we have come to expect from him.

Viscount Cranborne: My right hon. Friend will no doubt be aware that the investigations into the social security system are viewed with considerable interest and that their results are also awaited with some interest. Will she give an undertaking that, when the results are considered, she and the Government will bear in mind the interaction between the social security and taxation systems, and that any reforms will be wide enough to consider including a basic income guarantee scheme, or a negative income tax scheme, or a variation thereof?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Questions are becoming far too long.

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend is aware, the results of the social security reviews are expected to be out within about two months. I think that it is better to wait until they come out before we make further comment. With regard to my hon. Friend's specific question about the interaction between social security and taxation, it was with that in mind that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reduced the employees' national insurance contributions at the lower end of the income scale.

Mr. Coleman: Now that the Prime Minister has returned from places where democracy and working people are not of much account, will she turn her attention to visiting places in this country — for instance, the Llandarcy refinery where 750 people who are shareholders of British Petroleum have been told that they are to lose their jobs? Will she, as the trustee of the nation's shareholding in BP, tell BP that this sacking must not take place, especially as it has been suggested that it would break European Community rules?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is very much aware, there is a surplus of refinery capacity over the world as a whole, as well as in this country. Nothing that either of us says can avoid that fact. I am afraid, therefore, that it is likely that corrective action will have to be taken.

Q3. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 18 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Will the Prime Minister accept that the reason her support is crumbling is not least because everybody, apparently — except the Cabinet — sees the country crumbling all around her? The setting up this morning of city action teams to co-ordinate con tricks, without one penny of extra money going to the inner city areas, conceals a real cut in money for inner city areas of £150 million in the next three years and displays nothing but a complacent and callous attitude.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that when the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced his Budget he mentioned that public expenditure was increasing, unfortunately, despite everything that we have done. If the hon. Gentleman wants more money to be spent on the particular project he specified, can he say from whom he would take it away?

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the abolition of domestic rates would be one of the most popular steps that this Government could take and that her proposals to this effect are eagerly awaited in South Suffolk and by ratepayers all over the country?

The Prime Minister: It will be some time before the detailed results of rating reform come out. When they do, they will be published for consultation and discussion in the House. I hope that they will be out in time for legislation before the next general election.

Mr. Michie: Will the Prime Minister find time today to consider whether she is serious about imprisoning, surcharging or making bankrupt local councillors whose only crime is that they carried out their mandate and the wishes of the local electorate?

The Prime Minister: Local councillors are subject to the law of the land, as is everybody else, and I hope that they will duly carry it out.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that we need to use both blades of the scissors to cut unemployment? Is not any suggestion that a return to an all-party, simplistic, Keynesian solution would cut unemployment just as fraudulent as any suggestion that we might just leave it all to the market place?

The Prime Minister: There is no simplistic solution to unemployment. If there were, it would not be found all over Europe. The solution lies in the creation of genuine jobs. I repeat that 613,000 more jobs have come into existence since March 1983, that the United Kingdom is the only major European country in which employment is currently increasing and that the proportion of the population of working age in work is higher in the United Kingdom than it is in West Germany, France and Italy.

Q4. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago and I thank him for giving me notice of the supplementary question that he wishes to ask.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Prime Minister aware of the great sense of outrage in the north-west of England at the decision of Scottish and Newcastle Breweries to launch a bid for Matthew Brown pubs and breweries in the north-west of England? Is she aware that Scottish and Newcastle has repeatedly refused to give undertakings about the future of jobs in the breweries in Blackburn, Carlisle and Workington or about the future of the low barrelage pubs? Will the Prime Minister now intervene personally and ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to put the matter to the Monopolies and Merger Commission, because we object to the proposed merger, and it is for the Secretary of State to use his powers to obstruct it?

The Prime Minister: That was indeed the subject of which I was given notice, although the terms in which the question was asked were a little different. As the hon. Gentleman knows, this is not a matter for Cabinet decision. It is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—in the light of the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, who I understand the hon. Gentleman has met—to decide whether the proposed merger or takeover should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. My right hon. Friend will take into account all representations, including those of the hon. Gentleman, and the decision will be made as soon as practicable.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 APRIL—Opposition Day (10th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The Dismantling of the Welfare State."

TUESDAY 23 APRIL—Opposition Day (3rd Allotted Day) (Second Part). Until seven o'clock there will be a debate on trade union ballots, on a motion in the names of the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party.

Second Reading of the Ports (Finance)Bill.

Motions on the Foreign Limitation Periods (Northern Ireland) Order and on the Water and Sewerage Services (Amendment) (Northern Ireland) Order.

WEDNESDAY 24 APRIL—There will be a debate on the White Paper on Financial Services in the United Kingdom, Cmnd. No. 9432, which will arise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Remaining stages of the Insurance (Fees) Bill.

THURSDAY 25 APRIL—A debate on Foreign Affairs which will arise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 26 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 29 APRIL—Second Reading of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Hattersley: First, I welcome next Thursday's foreign affairs debate. I hope that the Leader of the House will agree to extend that debate beyond the usual time so that as many Members as possible can take part.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman will recall that it is now more than a year since a debate was first promised on the Government's Green Paper on the long-term prospects for public expenditure. I know that this is an increasingly embarrassing topic for the Government, but will they now fulfil that promise?

Finally, may we have a statement next week from the Paymaster General as to what his duties are? He said on the radio this morning that the Government had not prevented this year's GLC's elections from taking place. The House should have the opportunity to examine that statement — a statement which I fear cannot be adequately described within the rules of parliamentary language.

Mr. Biffen: I shall consider the right hon. Gentleman's point about the Paymaster General and convey to him the anxiety that he should make a statement in the House.

As for the request for a debate on long-term public expenditure, this is clearly a matter of great interest to the House and it is the subject of an investigation being undertaken by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. It might be a courtesy to the Select Committee for the House to be in possession of its findings before such a debate, but I shall of course consider the matter further.

I welcome the importance that the right hon. Gentleman attaches to Thursday's debate on foreign affairs. I very much agree with him and think that there would be merit in extending the debate until midnight.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): Will my right hon. Friend enable the House to debate rate increases some time next week or the week after as they have increased by 58 per cent. under Labour in Avon as opposed to 27 per cent. under the Tories in Somerset? Should we not give the Labour party an opportunity to explain the increase in Avon, as the Leader of the Opposition is unlikely to take it when the press put that question to him when he visits my constituency tomorrow?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that, in these delicate days ahead of 2 May, there will be a lively interest in these matters. I cannot at the moment provide what my hon. Friend asks in Government time, but I have great faith in his ability to make his case in his own way.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): May we have an early statement on the Government's drastically amended Trustee Savings Bank Bill which will not undermine the independence of the Trustee Savings Banks in Scotland or the protections afforded by another place to depositors throughout the United Kingdom? Now that the Leader of the House has announced an Opposition day in our name, will he confirm that useful discussions have taken place to ensure that a fair hearing is given to issues raised from this Bench? Will he welcome the use of that time to ensure that the House debates issues which the other two parties might not want to be debated?

Mr. Biffen: It is a matter of touching observation how the Liberal party now seeks solace in the behaviour of the other place, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that the appropriate place for this House to consider the Trustee Savings Bank Bill is this Chamber.

As for Opposition time and its distribution, I am happy to confirm that, on 13 November 1984, at the conclusion of the debate on the Loyal Address, it was said that there would be a chance to consider those arrangements. I hope that the House will have a chance fairly soon to consider revised Standing Orders. It will then be able to give its authority to what has been suggested.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Is my right hon. Friend aware that we all welcome next Thursday's free-ranging debate on foreign affairs? Does he recall that the House has also called for a full and free-ranging debate on law and order? Is he aware that, until we are allowed such a debate rather than the narrow things that we have had this week, we shall go on asking as people are fed up with the state of law and order?

Mr. Biffen: I note that my hon. Friend intends to keep on asking.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is the Leader of the House aware that when, last Tuesday, the Prime Minister described next Thursday's national half day school strike as politically inspired, as the president of the campaign which has called that strike I agree with her? It was politically inspired and I am asking the right hon. Gentleman to change the order of business next Thursday because the inspiration for that national half day strike on 25 April has come from the Government's policies of using youth training schemes to massage the dole figures and to reduce young people's wages? We ought next Thursday to debate the youth trade union rights campaign demands that every youngster on a training scheme receives a minimum £55 a week—the trade union rate for the job—and is guaranteed a job at the end of the training scheme.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has had a good run and delivered the speech that he will be unable to make because I have no reason to think that there is a general desire in the House that the debate on foreign affairs promised for Thursday should be dropped from next week's business.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): In view of the massive Government majority last night on the BBC licence fee, may we have another debate on that issue so that we can learn the views of the Opposition? We do not know whether they want to increase it further or to have no licence at all. It is obvious that we should have a debate.

Mr. Biffen: The proceedings of this House rest upon a delicate desire not to intrude where it appears to be unseemly.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Does the Leader of the House recognise the need for a debate about the state of the National Health Service, especially in south Manchester where decisions are being taken today that could result in the closure of many wards and the redundancy of up to 100 nurses and 200 non-nursing personnel? Does not that issue demand time within Parliament to discuss the mismanagement of the NHS by the Government?

Mr. Biffen: I should have thought that Monday's debate on what is purported to be the dismantling of the welfare state would give the hon. Gentleman exactly the opportunity that he seeks.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will my right hon. Friend, as an urgent priority, ensure that this House has an opportunity to discuss in full the implications of the Silberston report? Is he aware that the clothing and textile industry is the fourth largest employer in this country and that many of its employees are concerned at Silberston's prediction that if the report is accepted by the Government another 100,000 people will be made redundant?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend will be aware that there were a number of demands and requests before the Easter recess to debate the textile industry. I said then that I hoped that such a debate could be arranged at some time, but I am afraid that I cannot see that happening in the near future.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Will the Leader of the House rearrange next week's business and find time, perhaps on Wednesday, to debate the proposed closure of the special steels division at Tinsley park that will cost 1,000 jobs in an already decimated area? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a constituent of mine who works at that British Steel corporation plant has recently been awarded the British Empire medal for his work over the past 20 years? He is now facing the possible closure of that plant.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a very serious issue for the constituencies affected by the proposed closure. I cannot alter the business set down for next Wednesday, but I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that, after the Second Reading of the Finance Bill a week next Monday, no more controversial Government Bills will be introduced this Session? As a long period of tranquillity in legislation is needed, could the Government, for the remainder of this Parliament, manage on a three-day week, leaving the other two days to Back Benchers?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has been here long enough to realise that controversiality lies in the eye of the beholder. His proposals are interesting, and I shall no doubt bear them in mind for next Session, but they could not conceivably reflect upon this Session.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate in a matter that is causing undoubted concern—the future of the Royal Navy, and especially the dockyards at Rosyth and Devonport, and the implications of the proposals for those two bases on the naval base in Portsmouth? Is he aware that there is an undoubted need for a wide-ranging debate on the Royal Navy and especially on the defence industries in the Portsmouth and Devonport areas?

Mr. Biffen: Siren voices below the Gangway draw my attention to the business for next Tuesday, but I would not be so cheap as to note that. No Government time can be found for the debate that the hon. Gentleman requests, but I shall draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): In view of the Government's commitment, arising out of their Green Paper, to introduce legislation on the control and welfare of dogs, and while the contents of the next Queen's Speech are currently being considered, will it be possible to have an early debate in the House about an issue that affects many of our constituents and about which they are very concerned?

Mr. Biffen: We are running into a rather delicate period of parliamentary life—May, June and especially July—and I would not wish to add to our postbag or to the general contentiousness by raising the issue of dogs, so dogs will, therefore, lie.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): On the subject of the renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement, will the Leader of the House treat the matter with a little more urgency because some of us think that we detect a certain reluctance by the Government even to renew it? As has already been pointed out, that would mean disaster to the textile industry and the loss of up to 150,000 jobs.

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to that fear. There is no complacency on the part of the Government, but I must have regard to the fact that the House will shortly have to deal with the Finance Bill on the Floor of the House, and this consideration and others must make me a little cautious as to how I answer such requests.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will my right hon. Friend accept that many hon. Members on this side of the House will support the views expressed by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) about the proposed takeover of Matthew Brown by Scottish and Newcastle Breweries? Will he therefore request that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry makes a statement next week on the issue and makes it clear that the matter will be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

[Mr. Nicholas Winterton]

My right hon. Friend may find it surprising that I support the official Opposition spokesman, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), in requesting that the debate on foreign affairs next week should be extended beyond the normal hour of 10 o'clock to enable more hon. Members to take part.

Mr. Biffen: I have already conceded the last point that my hon. Friend makes, and there is nothing surprising about him supporting the Opposition. My answer to his question about the proposed brewery takeover is that the Prime Minister set out clearly and precisely the exact legal situation, and I suggest that the House would be well advised to pause before asking for ministerial intervention to set aside what would otherwise be an administrative process.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate urgently to discuss education, bearing in mind the present dispute? I do not want the right hon. Gentleman to reply simply by telling me that we debated education and the dispute not long ago. Is he aware that in a fresh debate we might find the answer to the problem and get the Government off the hook?

Mr. Biffen: I fully endorse the observation of the hon. Gentleman about the effect that the conflict is having on the education services of our counties and cities. I shall, of course, refer the point that he makes to the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. Gerrard Neale (Cornwall, North): Has my right hon. Friend any further news about the Government's intention to make an announcement about the decision by the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Okehampton bypass? If not, will he urge the Secretary of State for Transport to make an announcement to remove doubt on the matter? Will my right hon. Friend also consider the seriousness of the inadequacies of the current public inquiry system affecting major roads, reservoirs and power stations and provide time for a debate on the subject so that we may initiate a new system which will speed up decisions, while providing time for the public inquiry procedure so that all the issues can be heard?

Mr. Biffen: As my hon. Friend says, this is a matter of acute concern to the south-west. The issue is still under consideration by the Secretary of State for Transport, but I shall remind him of the point that my hon. Friend makes about the virtue of an early announcement of a Government decision in the matter.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Will the Leader of the House discuss with the Secretary of State for Social Services the best way in which the House can give consideration—either by way of a statement or a debate — to the important report of the Royal College of Nursing on the future of nursing education? Is he aware that that report estimates that by the end of this decade there will be a shortage of 12,000 nurses? Does he agree, therefore, that the House should give consideration to that possibility?

Mr. Biffen: I take at once the importance of the point to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and will bring it to the attention of the Secretary of State for Social Services. Meanwhile, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel it appropriate in Monday's debate to adduce arguments about the future of the nursing services.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will my right hon. Friend also accept my thanks for giving additional debating time to the alliance? Many of us are finding the greatest difficulty, especially during the current elections, in establishing exactly what the alliance's policies are on any subject. Will my right hon. Friend help the people of Southend by giving the alliance a little more time next week so that we can ascertain whether it is or is not in favour of retaining Southend's excellent grammar schools?

Mr. Biffen: It is not for me to anticipate how the Chair will interpret the width of the motion on Tuesday. The issue that my hon. Friend has raised might well have to be dealt with outside the Chamber. He may well find that as a result of Tuesday's debate he will be stranded in the centre by the rightward lurch of the alliance.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I ask the Leader of the House with the utmost seriousness to approach the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education and Science for the purpose of finding time for a full-scale debate on the problems facing the teaching profession and education. I have recently returned from the conference of the National Union of Teachers and I have never before seen such unity over the years that I have attended its conferences. It is clear that these moderate people will not back down easily.

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that we are faced with long industrial action and that if we had a debate in which the grievances could be aired we could move possibly to a conclusion which would benefit education, the teachers, the parents and the children? That could well be the result if only the Government would take some action.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will concur with the view that in all quarters of the House there is a strong awareness of the utmost importance of the education dispute and the factors that it embodies. I shall convey his request to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall try to call all those Members who have been rising in their places since the business statement was made, but it will be easier for me to do so if hon. Members ask brief questions.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that during next Thursday's debate on foreign affairs it will be in order to raise matters concerning the space defence initiative—the so-called star wars programme, which is very much misnamed—matters affecting NATO and disarmament?

Mr. Biffen: The debate will take place on a motion for the Adjournment, which is the traditional pattern for foreign affairs debates. It is recognised that such debates range widely. I am sure that the House will wish to talk about East-West relations, arms control and the Geneva talks, which will cover the very issues that my hon. Friend has in mind.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Does the Leader of the House recognise the problems that have been caused to local government by the changes that have been made to the rate support grant settlement after most councils have fixed their rates? Will he arrange time for this issue to be debated? Would it not be appropriate to debate it before polling day in the county elections?

Mr. Biffen: There are no immediate plans for such a debate, but I shall consult my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and convey to him the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is growing concern for the future of the motor car industry, especially because of the delay in the announcement of the BL corporate plan? Will my right hon. Friend ask the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement on the plan as soon as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I shall convey that request to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Ronald Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to read column 202 of yesterday's edition of Hansard, in which the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, says that

"the Community should revert to a more normal relationship with Turkey, starting with the unblocking of the outstanding aid"? —[Official Report, 17 April 1985, Vol. 77, c. 202.]

Is he aware that many peace activists in Turkey are in gaol in terrible conditions and that many other activists, including many thousands of trade unionists, are on trial? Will the Government not be losing an essential lever in persuading the Turkish Government to release these activists from gaol and to abandon the trials by urging the Community to revert to a more normal relationship with Turkey? Surely the Minister who is responsible should justify a policy change before the House instead of doing so by means of a written answer.

Mr. Biffen: I recognise that many hon. Members have taken a close interest over a long period in relations between Britain and Turkey and Turkey's domestic arrangements. I think that Thursday's debate will enable the hon. Gentleman's observations to be aired.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that Monday's debate will provide both the time and the inclination for Opposition spokesmen to tell the 4 million mortgage payers in Britain whether they will abolish their tax relief?

Mr. Biffen: Yes. That is why I think that it will be a standing-room-only occasion.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman look at early-day motion 525 about the strike of cleaners at Exclusive Cleaning and Maintenance at the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority at Risley?

[That this House strongly condemns the action of Exclusive Cleaning and Maintenance at the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, Risley, in reducing cleaners' earnings by 21p per hour which means that wages have been cut from £25 to £22·50 per week coupled with a reduction of holidays from four weeks to one week, and the use of blackleg labour in a sensitive area who have not received security clearance, despite this having previously been a condition of employment for cleaners; calls upon the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority to intervene to ensure that their sub-contractors pay trade union rates and provide decent conditions, particularly in view of the high profits announced by Exclusive Cleaning; and also calls upon the Government to set up an inquiry into the commercial cleaning industry in order to protect the workers and customers from exploitation by unscupulous profiteers.]

Will he ask his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement to the House on why Exclusive Cleaning, an anti-trade union company, has the contract for cleaning the Houses of Parliament, particularly as it is trying to reduce the wages of 132 women by 21p an hour to £22·50 a week which has resulted in a strike that has continued for nine weeks? Will he recommend to his right hon. Friend that he should terminate that company's contract forthwith?

Mr. Biffen: That is an interesting extension of the responsibilities that I am supposed to possess with regard to next week's business. I am advised that the contract between Exclusive Cleaning and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority is consistent with Government guidelines on cleaning contracts, but I shall refer to the relevant Minister the points that have been made.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Notwithstanding my right hon. Friend's announcement of a foreign affairs debate next Thursday, will he arrange for a statement to be made, before the dispatch by the Polish community of Ealing and beyond of its 100th 32-tonne truck full of food and medical aid to Poland next week, upon my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary's most successful tour of iron curtain countries, particularly Poland, his excellent meeting with Cardinal Glemp, his most moving visit to the grave of Father Popieluwski and his talks with leaders of Solidarity? Those are most important and precious to the Polish community in Ealing and the rest of Britain.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made generous and justified references to the recent visit of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to eastern Europe, and I shall draw his attention to my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Is the Leader of the House aware that, while the report on the Commission for Racial Equality on immigration control procedures may be gathering dust on Home Office shelves, many people in the House and in the country think that the issues that it raises require a debate, and pretty soon? Is the right hon. Gentleman yet in a position to say whether such a debate will ever take place, and, if so, when?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot really add to what I have said previously. I recognise the keen interest that there is that such a debate should take place. I am not yet in a position to provide Government time, but I shall bear in mind the interest.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): A moment ago my right hon. Friend refered to his role and powers. Is he aware that he rightly enjoys on both sides of the House a reputation for protecting the interests of Back Benchers and the House? In the light of that, will he share my concern that a statement has come from the Department of Transport to the effect that airports policy, in so far as it relates to current discussions over Stansted, Manchester, Heathrow and so forth, is to be decided, not in the light of the recent debates and decision in the House, but in private quarters within the Department of Transport, and thereafter, not even referred to the House for its approval?

Is not that a disgraceful situation which is a matter of concern that has nothing to do with party politics or even partisan feelings about one's constituency? In the light of what happened over the Maplin Bill 10 years ago, will my right hon. Friend do his duty as Leader of the House to ensure that the present position is reversed?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's preliminary and good-natured remarks were misplaced. I am a shameless boss's nark and always will be. Unless I were prepared to do the job on those terms, I would not be standing at this Dispatch Box.

My hon. Friend's second point raises a matter that I should like to look into. I shall therefore be in touch with him.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): The Leader of the House, in announcing the business for next week, said that the Second Reading of the Ports (Finance) Bill would take place on Tuesday. I tried to obtain a copy of that Bill from the Vote Office but I was told that it was not there and it was not known when it was likely to be there. In view of the importance of that debate, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that there is a copy of the Bill in the Vote Office in the next couple of hours?

Mr. Biffen: I shall look into that matter at once.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Has my right hon. Friend seen today's press announcements about the provision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment of city action teams, and the towns that have been selected? Will he advise the House when we can expect a statement from the Secretary of State so that cities such as Leicester can be pleaded for by people such as me? The scheme appears to be good, and the House would like other cities to be considered favourably.

Mr. Biffen: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety that Leicester should also have the advantage of this recent provision, I shall call the attention of my right hon. Friend to what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will Tuesday's debate on trade union democracy on a motion tabled by Liberal and Social Democratic Members, be sufficiently wide for hon. Members to refer to the fact that a great deal of hypocrisy abounds from those two parties? The leader of the Liberal party refused to accept the decision of the Liberal party conference when it held a ballot about cruise missiles and said, "Stuff the ballot", and the leader of the SDP fought on one manifesto and changed sides in mid-stream but has not had the guts to tell his electorate in Plymouth that he had changed his mind and there should be a ballot to endorse his membership of this House. Will the debate be sufficiently wide for such matters to be raised?

Mr. Biffen: The width of the debate is properly a matter for the Chair. However, I have such boundless faith in the ingenuity of the hon. Gentleman that I know that he will open up an aperture through which many other hon. Members will follow.

Earnings-Related Pension Scheme

4.1 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's plan, which has just been revealed, to axe the state earnings-related pension scheme."

The matter is specific because the clear and explicit intention of the Government is reported in the Daily Telegraph of today in an article which is clearly based on Government briefing. It states:

"The Government has decided to scrap the SERPS."

The decision is specific in another sense. It specifically contradicts the explicit and unequivocal pledge that was solemnly given by the Prime Minister, conveniently before the general election, in a letter of 20 May 1983 to my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John). She stated:

"Nor are there any plans to change the earnings-related component of the state pension."

The matter, also, specifically and in terms, contradicts the equally binding pledge given by the Secretary of State for Social Services to the House when he said:

"My aim in setting up an inquiry is not to call into question the fundamental pensions structure that was established in the 1970s with all-party agreement, and to which I was a party." —[Official Report, 23 November 1983; Vol. 49, c. 360.]

The matter is important and, indeed, vital because it will drastically worsen the standard of living of millions of pensioners. Only the SERPS, which the Labour Government introduced in 1975, will take 2 million of the poorest pensioners above the state means-tested poverty line. The Government's alternative of private pensions will never do that. The state earning-related scheme was introduced precisely because of the failure of the private sector to provide adequate pensions in the past.

The matter is also important because billions of pounds earmarked for future funding for pensioners is now to be clawed back by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to provide a further bonanza of tax handouts for the rich. The report states that the Government claim that the SERPS cannot be afforded. It is vitally important that the matter is fully debated, especially as that claim is directly contradicted by the Government Actuary and, as the Government's Social Security Advisory Committee recently stated:

"At this distance of time we do not think there can be solid grounds for altering the scheme now for fear of all the worst outcomes occurring steadily for 40 years."

It is important that the matter is fully explored to expose the inconsistency between the Chancellor's projection of future growth of 3 per cent.—when the Government wish to crow about economic success — and the projection for future growth of the Secretary of State for Social Services of 1·5 per cent.—when the Government want the nation to believe that decent pensions cannot be afforded.

The matter is urgent because this is the first unambiguous sign that the Government would carry through by far the most serious and damaging attack yet on pensioners in the radical dismantling of the welfare state, on which the Government are now hell-bent. The SERPS is a central arch of the welfare state. It would increasingly become the sole protector of millions of pensioners against poverty and the indignity of dependence on means tests. To destroy it now—the best deal that pensioners have ever had—would be a sin against the British people and, therefore, I earnestly request a debate at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's plan, which has just been revealed, to axe the state earnings-related pension scheme."

I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I do not consider that the matter is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would you confirm that if you had ruled in favour of the Opposition's submission it would have required 40 or 50 Back-Bench Members to rise in their places, yet only 26 Labour Back-Bench Members are present?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not wish to consider hypothetical questions.

BILL PRESENTED

PORTS (FINANCE)

Mr. Secretary Ridley, supported by Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Peter Bottomley and Mr. David Mitchell, presented (under Standing Order No. 111 (Procedure upon Bills whose main object is to create a charge upon the public revenue)) a Bill to provide for grants to be made to the National Dock Labour Board; to increase the limit on the amount of financial assistance to the Port of London Authority and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company; to make further provision relating to borrowing by and the audit of the accounts of certain harbour authorities; and to repeal section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 129.]

Orders of the Day

Social Security Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

4.6 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek the recommittal to a Standing Committee of new clause 12. I understand that it is possible to recommit parts of a Bill for reconsideration by a Standing Committee.

I do not wish to detain the House, but the point is important, and we must not allow it to go by default. The Government have virtually hijacked the Social Security Bill in that they have introduced substantial parts of the Budget into it, especially into new clause 12. Forty-one Government amendments and new clauses have been selected for debate today, notwithstanding the others that were also tabled for debate. That is an abuse of our procedures. There is no objection to the Government tabling proposals that derive from Committee to be properly considered on Report. However, the practice of wholesale importation and insinuation of new and substantially different proposals is out of order and a piece of procedural chicanery. As a marker for the future, we should try to dissuade the Government from future procedural chicanery of that nature. We should tell the Government that, whenever they seek to do that, we shall seek to recommit at least some of the clauses in the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having given me prior notice that he might wish to raise this question with me. I have considered the matter and have decided, in pursuance of my powers of selection under Standing Order No. 34, that I should not be prepared to accept a motion for recommittal.

New clause 12

CALCULATION OF CONTRIBUTIONS

'(1) In subsection (1)(b) of section 4 of the Social Security Act 1975 (incidence of Class 1 contributions), the words "primary Class 1" shall be substituted for the word "such".

(2) The following subsections shall be substituted for subsection (6) of that section—

"(6) Subject to regulations under sections 128 to 132 below and to section 27 of the Pensions Act, the amount of a primary Class 1 contribution shall be the appropriate primary percentage of so much of the earnings paid in the week, in respect of the employment in question, as does not exceed the current upper earnings limit (or the prescribed equivalent in the case of earners paid otherwise than weekly).

(6A) The appropriate primary percentage is a percentage of the rate specified in subsection (6B) below as the appropriate rate for the primary earnings bracket (or the prescribed equivalent in the case of earners paid otherwise than weekly) into which the earner's earnings fall.

(6B) Subject to any order under this section or section 122 or 123A below, the primary earnings brackets and their appropriate percentage rates shall be—

	Weekly earnings	Percentage rate
Bracket 1:	current lower earnings limit to £54·99	5 per cent.
Bracket 2:	£55·00 to £89·99	7 per cent.
Bracket 3:	£90·00 or more	9 per cent.

(6C) Subject to regulations under subsection (7) or sections 128 to 132 below and to section 27 of the Pensions Act, the amount of a secondary Class 1 contribution shall be the appropriate secondary percentage of the earnings paid in the week in respect of the employment in question.

(6D) The appropriate secondary percentage is a percentage of the rate specified in subsection (6E) below as the appropriate rate for secondary earnings bracket (or the prescribed equivalent in the case of earners paid otherwise than weekly) into which the earner's earnings fall.

(6E) Subject to any order under this section or section 122 or 123A below, the secondary earnings brackets and their appropriate percentage rates shall be—

	Weekly earnings	Percentage rate
Bracket 1:	current lower earnings limit to £54·99	5 per cent.
Bracket 2:	£55·00 to £89·99	7 per cent.
Bracket 3:	£90·00 to £129·99	9 per cent.
Bracket 4:	£130·00 or more	10·45 per cent.

(6F) The Secretary of State may by order alter the number of primary or secondary earnings brackets below the highest bracket.

(6G) An order under this section may make such amendments of any enactment as appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient in consequence of any such alteration made by it

(6H) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by, a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(6J) An order under this section shall be made so as to come into force—

(a) on a date in the tax year in which it received parliamentary approval; or

(b) on a date in the next tax year.

(6K) Such an order shall have effect for the remainder of the tax year in which it comes into force and for any subsequent tax year (subject to the effect of any subsequent order under this section); and for this purpose the order is to be taken as receiving parliamentary approval on the date on which the draft of it is approved by the second House to approve it.".

(3) In section 7(1) of that Act (weekly rate of Class 2 contributions), "£3·50" shall be substituted for "£4·75".

(4) In section 8(1) of that Act (amount of a Class 3 contribution), "£3·40" shall be substituted for "£4·65".

(5) The following section shall be inserted after section 123 of that Act—

"Further power to alter certain contributions.

123A.—(1) For the purposes of adjusting amounts payable by way of primary Class 1 contributions, the Secretary of State may at any time make an order amending section 4(6B) of this Act by altering any one or more of the following figures—

(a) the upper weekly earnings figure specified in respect of Bracket 1;

(b) the weekly earnings figures specified in respect of Brackets 2 and 3; and

(c) the percentage rates specified as the appropriate rates for Brackets 1 and 2.

(2) For the purposes of adjusting amounts payable by way of secondary Class 1 contributions, the Secretary of State may at any time make an order amending section 4(6E) of this Act by altering any one or more of the following figures—

(a) the upper weekly earnings figure specified in respect of Bracket 1;

(b) the weekly earnings figures specified in respect of Brackets 2 to 4; and

(c) the percentage rates specified as the appropriate rates for Brackets 1 to 3.

(3) No order shall be made under this section so as—

(a) to alter either of the percentage rates specified as the appropriate rates for Brackets 1 and 2 in section 4(6B) above to a rate higher than the percentage rate which at the time the order comes into force is specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 3 in that subsection; or

(b) to alter any of the percentage rates specified as the appropriate rates for Brackets 1 to 3 in section 4(6E) above to a rate higher than the percentage rate which at the time the order comes into force is specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 4.

(4) Without prejudice to section 120 or 122 of this Act, the Secretary of State may make such order—

(a) amending section 7(1) of this Act by altering the figure specified in that subsection as the weekly rate of Class 2 contributions;

(b) amending section 8(1) of this Act by altering the figure specified in that subsection as the amount of a Class 3 contribution, as he thinks fit in consequence of the coming into force of an order made or proposed to be made under subsection (1) above.

(5) An order under this section may make such amendments of any enactment as appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient in consequence of any alteration made by it such as mentioned in subsection (1), (2) or (4) above.

(6) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by, a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(7) An order under this section shall be made so as to come into force—

(a) on a date in the tax year in which it received Parliamentary approval; or

(b) on a date in the next tax year.

(8) Such an order shall have effect for the remainder of the tax year in which it comes into force and for any subsequent tax year (subject to the effect of any subsequent order under this section); and for this purpose the order is to be taken as receiving Parliamentary approval on the date on which the draft of it is approved by the second House to approve it.".'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Amendment (a) to the new clause, in line 36, leave out 'or more' and insert '£481'.

Amendment (b) to the new clause, in line 63, at end insert

'and

New clause 22—Upper Earnings Limit for Secondary Class I Contributions—

'(1) At the end of section 4(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 (Class I contributions—incidence) and of section 1(1) of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 (earnings limits) there shall be added the words "except that for the purpose only of determining the maximum amount of weekly earnings in respect of which secondary Class I contributions are payable the upper earnings limits shall be as follows:

(a) £265 from 6th April 1985 to 5th October 1985

(b) £285 from 6th October 1985 to 5th April 1986

(c) £335 from 6th April 1986 to 5th April 1987

(d) £385 from 6th April 1987 onwards"

(2) In regulation 7 of the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 1979 for the words "the lower and upper earnings limit" there shall be substituted the words "the lower earnings and except for the purpose of determining the secondary Class I contributions payable the upper earnings limit".

(3) Where by virtue of subsections (1) and (2) above secondary Class I contributions are payable on an amount which exceeds the amount of the upper earnings limits for the purpose of primary Class I contributions the secondary contributions on that excess shall be the normal percentage as defined in subsection (2) of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 (contracted-out rates of contributions and benefits) of that excess and in cases to which that section applies shall be payable in addition to the contributions specified in subsection (1) of that section.'.

New clause 23—Changes in the Upper Earnings Limit During the Year—

'After paragraph (5) of regulation 6A of the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 1979 there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"(6) Where:

(a) the upper earnings limit is changed in respect of secondary Class I contributions with effect from a date in the year ("the effective date") being a date other than 6th April, and

(b) the earnings periods for a person fall to be determined in accordance with the provisions of paragraphs (2) to (4) above the earnings period in which the effective date would but for the provisions of this paragraph fall shall notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs (2) and (4) above terminate on the day before the effective date and a new earnings period shall commence on the effective date.".'.

Government amendments Nos. 92, 93, 167, 94, 95, 96, 168, 170, 97, 98, 102 and 104.

Mr. Newton: I shall explain the Government's purpose in proposing the new clause and the amendments as succinctly as possible and then try to pick up as fully as possible points which hon. Members on both sides of the House may wish to make during the debate.

The purpose of the new clause and the associated amendments is to implement the changes announced in the Budget by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect of national insurance contributions. There are three main elements in the Government's proposal. First, there is a graduated system of contribution rates. At present, there are two uniform rates of contribution: 9 per cent. for employees and 10·5 per cent. for employers, payable on all earnings if they exceed the lower earnings limit, which at present is £35·50, up as far as the upper earnings limit, which at present is £265, above which no contributions are paid. From 6 October, we propose two brackets of lower contribution rates at 5 per cent. and 7 per cent. for employees with lower earnings, and three brackets of lower rates at 5 per cent., 7 per cent., and 9 per cent. for employers in respect of their lower-paid employees. The earnings levels at which those lower rates will operate are set out in the new clause, so I shall not elaborate them in my speech. They mean that, from October, employers will pay less in contributions on all earnings under £130 a week, and employees earning less than £90 a week will similarly pay less.

Secondly, we intend to abolish the upper earnings limit for employers' contributions. From 6 October, they will pay the 10·45 per cent. rate of contributions on all earnings that exceed £130.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): Does my hon. Friend accept that the point he has just made raises a major issue of principle with regard to the contribution arrangements? By introducing such matters in a new clause on Report, it makes it difficult for the House to give full consideration to all the implications of what is undoubtedly a complex proposal. Had they been contained in the Finance Bill, they would have been debated in Committee. But to introduce it at this stage, when the rules of debate are extremely restricted—one can speak only once, for example—means that it is difficult to give proper consideration to what the Government propose.

Mr. Newton: I respect the view of my right hon. Friend, but several new clauses and amendments directed towards the aspect of the Government's proposals to which he referred have been tabled, and I believe that the debate will provide a proper and adequate opportunity for anxieties such as those that may be felt by my right hon. Friend to be expressed. I shall certainly try to respond to those anxieties if they are expressed. As my right hon. Friend will understand, with his long experience and distinguished service as a Treasury Minister, it is impossible, as I understand the rules of procedure, to make amendments affecting national insurance by the medium of a Finance Bill. Indeed, it would have been necessary to introduce a separate Bill had we not had the opportunity of incorporating those proposals in this Bill.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) will not overlook the fact that the proposals, which we hope to introduce in October — it will be a significant administrative task for the Department to implement them in that time—will be of significant benefit to many millions of lower-paid employees. The Government, having decided upon this policy, would have been open to considerable criticism had they not taken the earliest practicable opportunity to ensure that those proposals were implemented and the substantial benefits that they confer on millions of people put into practice.

Mr. Higgins: Of course, I accept the point of substance made by my hon. Friend, and I also accept his technical point about the difficulties of incorporating the proposals into the Finance Bill. In that case, the right course of action should be a separate Bill with a Committee stage, or the Bill should be recommitted so that the new clauses can be given detailed consideration.

Mr. Newton: I understand why my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire have raised the matter, but I believe that it is appropriate to proceed in this way. The debate this afternoon will provide an adequate opportunity for hon. Members to raise the points that they wish to raise about the upper earnings limit. I shall do my best to respond to any points that my right hon. Friend wishes to make.

4.15 pm

I had mentioned two aspects of the changes that we propose in contribution rates. The third is that, from 6 October, the class 2 flat rate contribution paid by the self-employed will be reduced by more than one quarter from £4·75 to £3·50 a week. There will be comparable reductions in the voluntary class 3 contributions available to those who, for a variety of reasons, wish to improve their contributions record.

Taken together, these are significant changes in the structure of national insurance contributions—possibly the most significant since the introduction of full earnings-related contributions. Despite the increased income from the abolition of the upper earnings limit on employers' contributions, the changes will have an overall cost in a full year of £450 million, made up of an £80 million net reduction in employers' contributions, a £270 million reduction in employees' contributions, and a £100 million reduction in contributions by the self-employed.

In proposing the changes, we are seeking to advance, and I believe we shall move successfully further towards, two important economic and social objectives. The first, which I mentioned in passing, is to foster the creation of new jobs as part of what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor rightly described as a Budget for jobs. As a direct result of the changes, the cost of employing about 8·5 million workers earning up to £130 a week will fall by up to £3 a week. For the lowest paid—those earning up to £55 a week—employers' contributions will be cut by more than half. That will make existing jobs more secure, and at the same time give important encouragement to create new jobs in this part of the job market, with special advantage to the job prospects for youngsters, to which great importance is rightly attached on both sides of the House.

The change will also reduce, for employers and employees, the distorting effect of the present lower earnings limit, which currently takes people from no national insurance contributions to national insurance contributions on their entire earnings if they pass the present £35·50 a week lower earnings limit. I accept, of course, that the proposed changes involve the acceptance of such edges at the margins between the new bands, but they are significantly less steep cliffs than the cliff edge involved in the present system. There is no doubt that the overall effect, taking account of the broad reduction in national insurance contributions as a whole, for this area of the labour market will leave us with a more sensible and rational system than the present one.

If one of the Government's objectives is to increase employment, the other — no less important — is to improve incentives by increasing the rewards of employment at modest earnings, and to give additional help to the lower paid. The proposed national insurance changes alone will mean increases in net income ranging from £1·10 to £2·18 a week for nearly 3·5 million workers earning less than £90 a week. The effect becomes even more significant when combined with the increase in tax allowances announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget statement.

For a young person earning £50 a week the national insurance change alone will increase take-home pay by £2 a week, and there will be a further gain of £1·15 a week from lower income tax. That combined saving of £3·15 a week from tax and national insurance contribution changes is equivalent to an increase in take-home pay for that young person on £50 a week of 7·5 per cent. For a married man earning £80 a week there will be savings of £1·60 a week in national insurance contributions and £1·73 a week in income tax, giving a total gain of £3·33, or 5 per cent., in take-home pay. To give another example, which is especially striking in cash terms, although I do not pretend there will be many such examples, for a couple where the man earns £80 a week and the wife earns £50 a week, as a result of the national insurance and tax measures, their combined take-home pay will increase by no less than £6·48 a week. I know most hon. Members in the House at the moment well enough to know that they will very much welcome the increased income which this provides to many of the low paid. It is a significant gain from these proposals.

Alongside these changes for those who are employed, self-employed class 2 contributions fall from £4·75 to £3·50 a week, with a total benefit to the self-employed as a whole of £100 million. In addition, there is another tax measure—namely, the introduction of tax relief on that half of the class 4 national insurance contributions of the self-employed which can be roughly equated to the employer aspect of national insurance contributions. That has been very widely welcomed in all parts of the political spectrum, and certainly by the self-employed. That is a recognition of the important role that the self-employed already play in our economy and of the important part that self-employment can play in job creation, and it shows the value that the Government place on the contribution of the self-employed to economic activity in Britain.

Lastly, I want to turn briefly to the collection of Government amendments associated with this new clause, most of which are technical or consequential on the major change, but some of which are concerned with the Government's proposals to ensure protection of the benefit rights of people which might otherwise have been affected by the changes in contributions which we are proposing.

We intend, where the annual total of contributions notified to the Department is low enough to indicate that reduced rate contributions have clearly been paid or, indeed, are likely to have been paid, to enhance the benefit entitlement flowing from those contributions by a varying formula, depending on the contributions recorded. That will be done by regulations under powers which already exist relating to earnings factors. We shall ensure, first, that the record for flat rate benefits will not suffer at all, and, secondly, that the record for earnings-related benefits will not suffer where earnings have been at a uniform rate. Thirdly, where earnings have fluctuated, low earners will be fully protected, though a few higher earners who have had short periods on low earnings may lose very small —I emphasise "very small"—amounts of earnings-related rights. The main point that I want to make is that no one will lose rights by comparison with the contributions that they have paid. In this respect, the enhancement can only add extra benefit rights whenever they apply.

The other very important point is that, even by comparison with earnings received, the extent to which earnings-related benefits will be enhanced will outweigh the extent of the very small losses that will occasionally be sustained by those who pay the reduced rates for short periods.

I hope that I have said enough to enable the House to form some view on the merits of the Government's proposals. The changes incorporated in this new clause and the associated amendments constitute a major plank in our programme to promote employment, not least for young people, and to focus additional help on the less-well-off in work. I hope that the House will give them a fair wind.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): As is so often the case with this Government, the initial reaction to the proposal to change the national insurance contribution system was perhaps two cheers—certainly one cheer—since it has been a very regressive system and one which penalises the lower paid far more than the higher paid. Unfortunately, even though the time for debate and consideration of these changes has been extremely limited, it has become clear that there are more problems than might at first have been imagined.

One of the major problems is the extent to which the existing rather severe trap that is sprung when a person moves from one level of earnings to another has been replaced by several traps, perhaps slightly less severe in their effect but nevertheless just as real. It is the effect of these traps that is of particular concern to the Opposition.

Although the Minister dwelt very much in his remarks —as indeed did the Chancellor in his Budget statement —on the effects that it is hoped will flow from these changes in terms of increased employment, most commentators have made it plain that any such effect, should it take place at all, will be very marginal and that the major effect will be to add an extra incentive to keep wages down. The Minister touched on this in his remarks but laid very little emphasis on it.

This is a matter of very considerable concern to us because it is as dishonest as it is damaging to keep wages down at a time when there is a 12 per cent. increase in water rates owing to a Government-imposed tax, when gas and electricity bills are increasing because the Government have imposed charges on those industries, when national health prescriptions have gone up again and are, I think, 900 per cent. higher than they were when the Government came to power, and perhaps most of all when the Government are constantly talking in connection with every provision of the welfare state about people standing on their own feet, taking on themselves a greater part of the burden of their pensions, providing for themselves through more private education, more private health care, and so on.

The Minister referred particularly to the young employed and said how much benefit they would derive from the changes that are being made in this Bill. He drew attention to the fact that it might amount to a few pounds a week. For those young employed who are in families receiving housing benefit, that might be a very small return for the almost £9 which the Government decided to take off them last year in the non-dependent deduction. They will still be paying a very severe penalty for the privilege of being in work.

I note from the various comments on these proposals that the Institute of Directors is extremely concerned—and it appears to me that some of the amendments and other new clauses that have been tabled by hon. Members on the Government Benches also show concern—about the highest earners and the effect of these changes on them and their employers. We understand the point that they are making, but it always seems to me to be somewhat strange and certainly rather illogical that those in the Institute of Directors and hon. Members on the Tory side of the House feel so strongly that the higher earners must be allowed to earn more if they are to retain incentive, and talk about the disincentive to them of raising taxation, but believe that the lower earners must get lower wages—as will be the effect of these changes—if incentives are to be kept going. That is not an argument that I understand and it is one that the lower paid in this country find increasing difficulty in understanding.

[Mrs. Margaret Beckett]

The Minister also mentioned the effect of these changes on the self-employed. We recognise, of course, that these are welcome changes for that group. What greatly concerns us—particularly in the context of his and the Chancellor's speeches—is that it appears that the extent and nature of the changes for the self-employed go back to the myth, which the Government are always peddling, that that is the way to get new jobs. The present situation has nothing to do with the Government, nothing to do with the problems that the Government have created, and there is nothing that they can do to solve them. The best thing to do, it is said, is to have, like the Americans, lots more small businesses, and encourage people to become self-employed, because that is where employment will come from.

We often hear members of the Conservative party quoting the number of new jobs in small companies in, for example, the United States. What they do not quote, however, is the number of those companies and jobs that disappear within a year or two, or the net effect on job creation, which is extremely small. I seem to recall that in his Budget statement the Chancellor referred to the self-employed as "a sector of the economy where an increasing proportion of the jobs of the future is likely to be found."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 798.]

That may have more to do with where all the other jobs are going than with the net increase in the self-employed.

We are concerned that in giving this assistance to the self-employed the Chancellor has chosen to be extraordinarily generous to the better-off self-employed. If I understand correctly the changes that the Government are making—and that is no mean feat—it appears to me that even self-employed people, who are perhaps quite wealthy and certainly earn substantial sums, will pay only £3·50 a week to retain their entitlement to the basic pension. That is good value in anybody's terms and certainly a lot better value than is got by many people who are employed but earning substantially lower incomes. That means, as does this reduction, that to some extent the state is subsidising this improvement for the self-employed.

4.30 pm

I have one or two questions for the Minister about the proposed changes. One of the effects of these changes is that more people will be pushed into part-time employment, and perhaps into more than one part-time job. What will be the effect on them? At present, if both of those part-time jobs are below the lower earnings limit, the person does not have to pay any contribution. Will this apply in the future? What will happen if the sum of the earnings in the two jobs adds up to the level that brings them into a different contribution band? What will be the position of an individual with more than one job to which different contribution rates apply?

We looked with interest at amendments Nos. 94 and 95 and wondered what the Government had in mind. Both the Minister and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) spoke about the difficulties in debating these things. The Minister then said casually that much of this will be done through regulations, so that the Government will have to come back to the House with the regulations, so that we can see what they have in mind. That is a bit of a cheek.

The Minister referred to the earnings factor. This was something on which I wanted to question him. I did not understand much more after his remarks. As I understand it, the theory is that entitlement to benefit is set by the earnings that occur between the existing lower and upper earnings limit and not by the rates of contribution that are paid. Entitlement also relates to earnings over the whole year. We recognise that there is not always a simple and clear relationship between contributions paid and earnings, but as a general rule the differences have been comparatively slight. With the new, much more complicated and wide-ranging changes, we wonder what the effect on benefit entitlement will be.

We suspect—and if the Government feel injured by this they have only themselves to blame because this is wholly characteristic of their behaviour—that amendment No. 95(b) which says:

"The Secretary of State may prescribe circumstances in which pensioners' earnings factors for any relevant year may be calculated in such manner as may be prescribed."

is the Department giving itself a get-out. It does not have the faintest idea how this will work and does not know what people's entitlement to benefit will be and how it will be assured. Which genius will devise a computer programme to work it all out and throw out the cases that do not look correct?

Someone could pay different rates of contribution during the year—the Minister referred to that possibility—for the same total level of earnings, or he could have different earnings during the year and still end up having paid the same rate of contribution. How will this work and what will it do to benefit entitlement? The Labour party is left with the unworthy feeling that a decision was taken in the Treasury to make a change in the basis of national insurance contributions because the Chancellor thought that it would look good in terms of job creation and particularly because he hoped that it would help to keep wages down. However, nobody thought through what the effect of the entitlement to benefits would be. The amendment has been drafted to catch up with the fact that later on somebody will have to work out what all this will mean for benefit entitlement.

The Minister suggested that there would be opportunities for enhancement and that nobody would really lose. We have heard these assurances from Ministers and the Department before, but things have not always worked out as they have suggested. Overall, we are looking at a complicated package of changes. The Labour party suspects that even the Government do not understand how it will work out or what problems it will cause. Most of all, we fear that the disadvantageous effects of these changes will keep wages down, whereas the job creation advantages that the Minister has sought to present will not materialise.

In the shadow Budget, the Opposition proposed that there was a need to look at the changes in the national insurance contribution system and we suggested a variety of ways in which such changes might be carried out. We did not go for any one particular formula because such changes need extremely careful working out, consideration and thorough debate. That is precisely what these changes are not having.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): All Conservative Members will no doubt welcome the basic principles of new clause 12 and the fact that we are to have a more graduated system of national insurance contribution, with a considerable reduction at the lower end of the scale which will ease unemployment problems for many people, particularly younger people. Therefore, it is exceedingly surprising that it should have had such a cool reception from the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). The Labour party is constantly bleating about unemployment, but when specific proposals to improve employment prospects are put forward it simply pours cold water on such constructive ideas. That is amazing.

I took particular exception to the hon. Lady's statements about the self-employed. She gave the impression that all the self-employed are rolling in money and do not make a great contribution to our society. She did not recognise the levy without benefit that was placed on them by the Labour Government in the late 1960s that we are seeking to mitigate. In many parts of Yorkshire and in my constituency, the self-employed are a vital part of our employment scene and of the growth and revival of new industries.

A number of problems on one or two specific matters arise out of new clause 12, and I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would give sympathetic consideration to them. The fact that there is no longer an upper earnings limit for employers' secondary contributions is one of them. Setting such a limit is the basic principle in amendment (a) tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) and myself. It is causing growing concern to many sectors of industry. That concern has escalated in the past few days, when minds have been concentrated, so rapidly after the Budget statement, by the legislation that is to put it into effect. There will be an increased pay bill for certain types of firm, and no doubt other hon. Members who may catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will elaborate on different sectors of the economy where this will be a problem.

The problem will affect not only firms of highly paid solicitors, people in the City and so on, or high technology firms. It will affect many firms with a high proportion of skilled manual labour, with people who are earning now, even in the supposedly depressed north, more than £265 a week. A particular point of concern is that often part of those earnings is bonus and productivity payments. The fact that there is no upper earnings limit for employers makes such deals less attractive to the employer. There will be some problems, many of which could affect a certain number of firms across the board in the economy. Most other countries, particularly in western Europe, that have an insurance contribution system have an upper limit. In West Germany, which in Bismarck's day was the pioneer of the insurance system, has a limit of about £20,000 on employers' contributions.

Another concern is that the contributory system is such that benefits depend on the amount of national insurance contribution paid in the appropriate year, but there is a ceiling on the benefit paid. As I understand it, this applies to all contributory benefits. My hon. Friend may argue that that does not matter because the Government are retaining an upper earning limit for employees. However, employers will be paying substantially higher contributions and the employees to whom those contributions relate will receive no improvement benefit. That will add to the gradual erosion of the contributory principle that we have experienced in recent years. Increasingly there is less relationship between what one pays into the system and the benefit one receives from it.

It is to be welcomed that national insurance contributions are becoming a less regressive tax, but we are simply replacing a regressive employment tax with a progressive employment tax. It is becoming more and more an employment tax and little else.

Mr. Higgins: Unfortunately, because of the timing of the debate, it has not been possible for many hon. Members to see the evidence which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service on this very point or, indeed, the note that was provided by the Treasury on it. The fact is that the evidence given to the Select Committee suggests clearly that the employers' contribution will confer no benefit right whatsoever.

Mr. Galley: My right hon. Friend is right. The changes will make it more and more a taxation system. We perhaps should avoid the hypocrisy of saying that the contributory principle is important and must be retained because it has some relationship with benefits, because in this case it has not.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the hon. Gentleman realise where his argument is leading him in regard to the whole principle of graduated contributions? The argument seems to be that, because we are abolishing the ceiling in respect of employers' contributions and giving no extra rights to employees, it is a bad system. One could argue equally that it is wrong to have graduated contributions because as one moves through the salary scale and pays a greater sum, although only the same percentage, in national insurance contributions, one is only getting the right to certain specific benefits. The much more interesting point is the one made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) about the right to benefit. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) is putting forward a totally misleading argument.

Mr. Galley: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's point. It is still valid to say that this is becoming increasingly a tax which goes further from the contributory principle which has been held as important by Governments of all shades for many years.

Another important point relates to people who are contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme and who enjoy a rebate on their contributions between the lower earnings limit and the upper earnings limit because their occupational pensions will provide their earnings-related pension. There is an abatement for employees of 2·15 per cent. and for employers of 4·1 per cent. As I understand it, that abatement will cease for employees above the upper earnings limit. Employers will be paying more and employees will receive no additional benefit through contracting out.

When firms decided to provide their own scheme, it was a factor that there would be a rebate on employers' contributions. That may have been an important consideration in the financial equation that they had to consider. Surely it is fair that the rebate system should be extended to apply to all earnings, including those above the upper earnings limit, for contracted-out employees.

Mr. Frank Field: I support new clause 12, but for somewhat different reasons from those put forward by the Minister. His first reason for commending the clause to the House was that it would have an important effect on job creation. There is a real danger of hon. Members on both sides of the House taking up unreal positions. Hon. Members on the Government side may say that certain costs are all-important in determining whether jobs are created, while Opposition Members may ignore those costs completely. I should be surprised if many jobs were created by these changes. The Minister was on somewhat safer ground when he said that the changes may protect jobs already in existence. That is the first, though not the major, point that I wish to make.

4.45 pm

I join the Minister in the other reason that he put forward for commending the new clause to the House. He said that it is an important reform for lower-paid workers. The reform will be paid for by lifting the ceiling on employers' contributions. As someone who has said for many years that the ceiling should be raised, it would be churlish of me not to welcome that change. Although I tried to pay careful attention to the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley), I do not think they carry much weight.

In opposition to this change some people have said that instead of having one poverty trap we shall have three poverty traps as a result of the change. We have to accept that, but we must remind those people who put this argument of two major changes that will be brought about by the Bill. Surely it is better to pay a 5 per cent. or a 7 per cent. contribution and then a 9 per cent. contribution rather than a 9 per cent. contribution from the beginning. It seems better, too, to have that tiered system at the higher income thresholds laid down by the Government.

I welcome the proposed changes. They are not perfect and there will be difficulties, but the new clause should be supported by the Opposition for two reasons. First, the new system will be better than the present one. It will reduce the contribution made to the national insurance scheme by lower-paid workers. Opposition Members have often called attention to the regressive nature of the national insurance scheme.

Secondly, it is terribly difficult to make major changes in the national insurance scheme because of the costs involved. My guess is that if a Labour Government were proposing changes, they would have come up with a similar scheme.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I wish to give qualified support to new clause 12. Of course, every hon. Member will applaud the reduction in the national insurance burden on the low-paid. Indeed, it was a matter to which I devoted some attention in a speech in the little debate that we had on 1 March on the tax and benefits system. It is rare that the Government are so swift to respond to suggestions made in debate. I am grateful to them for taking on board the points that I made and for transplanting them into legislative form.

However, certain difficulties will be created by the clause in its present form. It is for that reason that I have tabled two new clauses. New clause 22 proposes, instead of abolishing the upper earnings limit, to increase substantially the limit on the employers' contribution and to phase in that increase over three years. The effect would be that for the six months from 6 April 1985 the limit would be £265 per week or £13,780 per annum; from 6 October it would be £285 per week or about £15,000 per annum; from April next year it would be increased fairly substantially to £335 per week or £17,500 per annum; and, finally, from 6 April 1987 it would be increased to a maximum of £385 per week, which is equivalent to about £20,000 per annum.

There are several reasons for taking that approach rather than completely abolishing the limit, as the Government propose. It would seem that the limit is being abolished purely to pay for the reductions in the national insurance contributions at the lower end of the scale. Thus, the reason must be one of expediency. It is unfortunate that this way of doing things has been chosen, because a question of principle is involved. I naturally bear in mind what my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) have said about the lack of any benefit attaching to the employers' contribution. However fraudulent the system is—and it is a fraud, because it is a tax and it is not greatly related to the benefits that employees will ultimately derive—the fiction has been perpetuated by Governments over the years.

We are seeing a change of principle under the guise of expediency, but I think that the wrong way has been chosen for bringing about such changes in the social security system. Therefore, we must consider the scheme as a method of funding and discuss whether there are better ways of doing it. The beneficial effects of reducing the national insurance contributions at the lower end of the scale will, to some extent, be diminished by the disincentives to wealth creation that the abolition of the upper earnings limit will bring in its train. In the long term, I believe that some jobs may be sacrificed in order to increase the number of jobs at the lower end of the scale. Therefore, the net effect may not appear to be as great as the Government claim.

I understand that the national insurance burden overall is to be reduced by about £350 million through these changes. We all applaud that, and it is very good, but it disguises the massive redistribution of the national insurance burden among companies in different industries. Of course, some companies, such as those in the retail and textile trades, and those involved in local government will be better off and will welcome that. However, some firms will be much worse off as a result of the changes. Not all of them will be able to bear easily the burden placed upon them. Reference has already been made to high technology companies, and one could also mention North sea oil operators, those involved in financial services, and exporters as well as much of manufacturing industry.

I shall point out, in particular, the disproportionate effects that will be experienced by small companies with few employees who are, on the whole, well remunerated. Jobs will undoubtedly be lost in some areas. The London Business School has estimated that although 250,000 jobs will probably be gained at the bottom end of the scale —it differs from the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who claims that the effect will be negligible— 100,000 jobs will be lost at the top end. That represents a significant diminution in the real value of the changes.

Large high technology companies must be tempted to cut the number of unskilled staff in order to pay for the extra cost of the national insurance contribution on skilled staff, whilst at the same time they must maintain their capital investment and research and development programmes to protect their profitability. That is to be deplored. Many small high technology companies probably do not employ any unskilled staff. As a result of these changes, those companies may fail or face a great disincentive to continue in business. In many cases that disincentive will correspond to a 10 per cent. increase in the major part of one of their biggest costs, and could, at the margin, wipe out their profits altogether. In this rapidly growing area of the economy, salaries are competitive on a worldwide basis. Thus, we are also looking at salary scales and costs in the United States, Germany, Japan and in the countries of all our major competitors.

The abolition of the upper earnings limit will have a very deleterious effect as a result. Small North sea companies will be particularly hard hit, and that is to be deplored. Indeed, I believe that the abolition of the upper earnings limit represents a tax on business leadership. It reduces a company's ability to increase salaries at the top of the scale. Senior executives, who are in charge of hiring and firing and who know about the costs that arise in addition to salaries, are bound to know that, and to that extent it is bound to be demotivating in so far as they look to increased profitability to bring about increased remuneration for themselves.

Higher rate thresholds were increased in the Budget this year, but only by the rate of inflation. However, the increase in personal allowances went beyond the amount needed to account for inflation. Thus, although we may not be hitting those parts of the economy upon which we depend for increasing the national income and for wealth creation, we are not greatly benefiting them. We are also allowing a tax on exports. The cost of employing exporters has increased substantially during the past two years, because the phasing out of the 25 per cent. income tax deduction for days worked overseas contained in the Finance Act 1984, combined with the proposed national insurance changes, will increase the cost of employing an exporter by 20 per cent. if he spends a quarter of his year abroad and by 30 per cent. if he spends half of his year abroad. That cannot be ignored, and the Government should address themselves to that point.

The measure is also a tax on invisible exports, such as financial services and advertising. One thinks, perhaps, of Saatchi and Saatchi and of its incursions into the American market—to pluck just one example out of the air. But it makes things more difficult for those exporting such services. One agency that has come to my attention supplies British managers, consultants and engineers for United Kingdom and overseas projects. It calculates that it must increase its base charging rate to the client by more than £2 an hour, thereby making it uncompetitive with German and American companies. At present, the contracting industry is in the doldrums. Although United Kingdom engineers should be encouraged to earn some foreign exchange and to pick up know-how and experience abroad, they will not be led in that direction.

We are also seeing a tax on performance-related pay. The Government have rightly encouraged remuneration by way of share option and incentive schemes. That is an excellent development, but in some instances cash bonuses are the most appropriate incentives, either in conjunction with option schemes or on their own.

Some firms cannot offer incentives by means of option schemes. I think, for example, of unincorporated businesses and of non-profit-making bodies. Indeed, there is no more typical non-profit-making body than the Government. Why penalise these firms at the expense of those that can offer incentive schemes in other ways?

One of the most disturbing effects of the changes is that they will encourage remuneration through perks. In successive Finance Acts the Government have rightly set their face against benefits in kind. But the changes proposed will go against the whole trend of Government policy in that respect. The administrative costs of the Department and of businesses will be increased, although that is contrary to the Government's intentions as manifested in the recent paper entitled "Burdens on Business", which proposes major reductions in such burdens.

I wish to refer to the complications which will result from the change to the rules in October. Under the post-1975 system, there is no established procedure or precedent for making such a change, because the system is geared to the annual cycle of the tax year. It will create a major complication both for companies and for the Department. It will create particular hardship for companies which entered into contracts before Budget day and which will extend beyond 6 October 1985. Those companies cannot, for competitive reasons, readily change their prices at short notice, even if their contractual arrangements do not extend beyond 6 October. Contracts for high-paid personnel will be particularly adversely affected.

My conclusion, therefore, is that, while the changes to the national insurance contributions rightly concentrate upon job creation, this method of bringing them about is calculated to damage the wealth-creating capacity of the economy. Although the overall net effect will be beneficial, I wish that other means could have been found to finance the changes so as to maximise rather than minimise their effect.

New clause 23 affects, in particular, company directors. This is a technical point rather than one which relates to general policy. Since 1983 the rules relating to company directors have provided that national insurance contributions should be levied on the first earnings of directors — first in a chronological sense — up to the annual maximum, which is 53 times the upper earnings limit. Consequently, no special provision is made for what happens when the upper earnings limit is changed with effect from a date during the tax year, because in the past this has never been contemplated by any Government. The abolition of the upper earnings limit could mean that if a director is on a monthly salary of twice the annual maximum, his national insurance contribution will be paid on the full £14,000 in the six months to 5 October and also on the full £14,000 in the remaining six months of the year. That will be a particularly penal provision.

Even if my hon. Friend the Minister is not minded to accept the more radical proposals contained in new clause 23, I hope that he will take on board the points that have been put to him in this respect. This new clause would override the relevant part of the existing regulations. Instead, it would provide for a new earnings period to commence on the effective date for the upper earnings limit change. Therefore, it divides the year into two, with the annual maximum apportioned pro rata to each period. If the upper earnings limit is abolished on 6 October, it will mean that the employers' national insurance contribution in the first earnings period to 5 October will be payable only on the earnings in that period up to half the annual maximum. I believe this to be an equitable solution. I cannot believe that the Government intended the inequitable way in which new clause 12, as drafted, will apply. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to provide some relief.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I find myself in the uncharacteristic and curious position, after the extremely well-informed and well-argued speech of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), of giving, on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself, a slightly greater welcome to this set of proposals than did he. The restructuring of the thresholds is a positive step forward, although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and the hon. Member for Tatton have pointed out, it is not altogether ideal that something which is just as much a political as a practical issue should be tacked on to the front of a significant piece of legislation. However, I appreciate the reason for this, as was outlined by the Minister in his speech.

The Government's approach is surely right. They are trying to reduce the distortion and to ease the burden upon the encouragement of employment. Any step that will encourage new employment, including youth employment, is to be welcomed. However, to be fair, this must be set in context. Although the Chancellor made it clear that he is most concerned about the unskilled labour force and youth unemployment, there is no doubt that many of the changes that have been outlined will also encourage part-time employment. We do not wish to discourage part-time employment, but it is quite clear that the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses Ltd. would like more full-time employees to be recruited if only the economy, in terms of demand, were better, and if only some of the financial conditions under which they have to operate were more satisfactory. To introduce measures that will probably extend the scope of part-time employment cannot be a satisfactory or adequate response or solution to the problem. On this point I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). Therefore, the improvements, although welcome, are likely to be felt only at the margin. I echo what has been said by the Child Poverty Action Group. It welcomed the restructuring of contributions

"insofar as it reduces the burden of national insurance on the lowpaid without disenfranchising them from entitlement to national insurance benefits."

This has to be a key element in a change of this nature.

It is also significant that on the evening of Budget day the BBC television programme "Newsnight" visited a part of the country that is suffering some of the most severe problems caused by the recession and unemployment. On that programme a local business man who might have been expected to benefit from these changes said that it was unlikely that he would be able to create more full-time, long-term employment. He believed that the abolition of the upper earnings limit might discriminate against the profitability and competitiveness of his company. I believe that this is a genuine cause for concern.

The hon. Member for Tatton referred to North sea oil-related companies. Given the geographical location of Ross, Cromarty and Skye, hon. Members will appreciate that oil-related industries are a significant factor in their economy. Certain firms that are seeking to expand those activities and at the same time to encourage local employment may face difficulties at the top of the scale over their higher-paid employees.

All this, however, clearly falls within the Government's broader intention to move towards a more flexible and, certainly to some extent, more low-waged economy, with which I very much disagree. The Highlands and Islands Development Board recently commissioned a survey that showed that average earnings in its area were about 10 per cent. below the national average. Yet, for typical economic reasons, and for some cyclical reasons related to oil and tourism, unemployment is extremely high—well over 20 per cent., and more than 30 per cent. in some parts of my constituency. It is clear, therefore, that one cannot go too far in seeking to relate low wages to the encouragement of employment because, persistently and historically, the situation in my area has shown the opposite to be the case.

Mr. Frank Field: I agree that the Government are putting undue emphasis on the creation of low-paid jobs, but I am genuinely puzzled as to how anyone can interpret the proposals in new clause 12 as part of that policy. I do not see why raising the earnings threshold for national insurance contributions from £33 to £55 and then starting at 5 per cent. and tapering up to the full 9 per cent. at £90 per week will increase the number of low-paid jobs.

Mr. Kennedy: Curiouser and curiouser—I began by agreeing with a Conservative Member and a Labour Member is now defending the Government against me. We welcome the restructuring, but the changes must be seen in the context of the general approach outlined elsewhere in the Budget. I have grave doubts about the Government's broad approach. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead has said, the proposals before us are unlikely to have a resounding impact if they are set within that broad framework. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that is a fair point.

We are happy to welcome the changes, especially to the extent that they may herald moves towards full integration of the tax and benefit systems, which I believe would command broad support throughout the House. We congratulate the Government on their initiative in that respect, albeit tempered by qualifications arising from other aspects of their general economic policy.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): I welcome the restructuring of national insurance contributions especially warmly, not least because in the employment debate earlier this year I urged my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to deal with the problem of national insurance contributions at the lowest earning levels. I welcome the significant boost that the changes will give to the take-home pay of the lowest paid, the incentive for employers to offer relatively low-paid employment and the incentive for potential employees to accept such employment. I also welcome the scope for further modification to the brackets and to the rates, which I hope foreshadows more radical changes in the system of levying and collecting national insurance contributions, so that the system moves in stages, like the income tax system, rather than from one bracket to another.

Like my hon. Friends the Members for Halifax (Mr. Galley) and for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), I have received representations from companies in my constituency about the removal of the upper earnings limit for employers' contributions, the non-availability of contracted-out rebate above that limit and the non-cumulative basis on which employers' contributions are to be calculated and collected.

5.15 pm

Taking new clause 12 as a package, I believe that the importance of the benefits given at the bottom of the scale is so great that if the only way to fund it is to remove the upper earnings limit, companies employing predominantly higher-paid staff will have to live with that burden. Overall, there is a modest reduction of about £80 million in the total burden of employers' contributions, but the cost is redistributed according to the pay profile of the employees concerned. Naturally, I have sympathy for companies that will be hit especially hard by the removal of the upper earnings limit, but the value and impact of the benefits at the lower end of the scale in my view justify that burden.

As for the contracted-out rebate, I understand that there is a limit to the earnings taken into account for the accrual of earnings-related pension. That being so, it is logical that any rebate should apply only to that level of earnings which would otherwise qualify for the state earnings-related pension because the rebate is a recognition of the fact that by providing a scheme with benefits equal to or better than those of the state scheme the employer is relieving the public purse of certain costs. Therefore, although this is also a greater burden for companies operating contracted-out schemes, it is logical that rebate should not extend beyond the upper earnngs limit.

The non-cumulative basis on which employers' contributions are calculated and collected, however, presents real problems for companies operating incentive and bonus schemes. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address his thoughts to that rather narrow point. A company operating a contracted-out pension scheme and incentive bonus schemes, where employees' normal earnings are below the upper earnings limit, will benefit from the contracted-out rebate, but if an incentive bonus is paid in one lump the earnings in that week or month may exceed the upper earnings limit for that period and push the employer's contribution up to the full 10·45 per cent. rate even though the employee's earnings over the year may still be below the £13,000 limit.

It would be sad if these imaginative restructuring proposals had the unintended side effect of discouraging employers from offering incentive bonus schemes. I hope that my hon. Friend will give further consideration to that problem and, if possible, seek a remedy that will remove the possible adverse impact on incentive schemes, as I am sure that all Conservative Members wholeheartedly support such schemes.

Mr. Kirkwood: We have always said that national insurance contributions constitute a tax that bears disproportionately on the poor, so we welcome the restructuring proposals. However, I hope that the Minister will pay attention to the circumstances that employers now find themselves in. High earners and their employers have enjoyed a slightly anomalous privilege as a result of the upper earnings limit, and they naturally resent losing it. I should have preferred more time to have been spent in consultation with industry about what will result from the change. Nevertheless, the change is necessary in the public interest.

There is a danger and a suspicion that high earners and their employers will get round the change and try to mitigate the impact of it by shifting the emphasis from salaries to perquisites. The Minister has an opportunity to say that, if companies and employers do that, the Government will seriously consider tightening the tax regime that applies to perquisites.

Employees' national insurance contributions should be integrated fully with income tax. That would involve applying the combined rate only above a personal allowance threshold—which threshold might have to be lowered to compensate for the loss of national insurance contributions currently levied—on all income from the first pound. We should like a move to be made towards the tax credit scheme that we have adumbrated for many a long year.

The Government could have approached the matter in other ways. I should have liked them to have considered the redistribution to low-paid employees in the form of employees' national insurance contributions throughout the earnings range above £35·50 a week being levied only on earnings above, say, £10 a week instead of on all earnings. That would have given some benefit to everyone rather than being directed entirely at low earners, and it would have been simpler to administer and have avoided the anomalies that we now have in many poverty traps.

We support the changes in the employees' national insurance contributions, but the House should recognise that the clause will introduce parts of the poverty trap in other ranges of income. The high marginal rates will be reduced by a few per cent., but at the expense of moving them still closer to the discontinuities introduced by new clause 12. I understand that some of the calculations that have been done show that, for a 1p increase in salary, sums of up to £1·77 can be lost. That must be a disincentive.

We fear that the encouragement of employers to take on more low-paid workers as a small contribution to reducing unemployment might be marred by a tendency to lock many people, especially women, into wages just below the £55 or £90 a week level, just as many part-timers are now locked into wages below £35·50 a week to avoid national insurance contribution liability. Except in that latter regard, these objections do not apply to the stepped structure for employers' national insurance contributions, which is generally welcome for its redistributive and job promotion effects.

I should like the Minister to give the Government's view about the emphasis being shifted from salary to perquisites.

Mr. Higgins: It is completely wrong that we should be debating new clause 12. When the Bill was given a Second Reading, such a clause was not generally envisaged. The important principles involved in the clause were therefore not considered at the stage at which it is normally appropriate to consider them.

These are highly complex matters which deserve detailed scrutiny such as can be given only in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) mentioned the effect on employees who are contracted in and on those who are contracted out. That matter deserves detailed examination, preferably specific amendments, when hon. Members can speak more than once. On Report, an hon. Member can make his point only once, as has happened with my hon. Friend the Member for Slough. If he does not like the Minister's reply or if the Minister does not understand what the argument is about, there is no way in which my hon. Friend can come back, as he could in Committee. This clause should have been the subject of a separate Bill or, at least, it should have been recommitted so that it could receive the consideration and attention that it deserves.

[Mr. Higgins]

These measures were clearly part of the Budget. I fully understood my hon. Friend the Minister's reply to my intervention, when he gave the technical reasons why these measures could not rightly be incorporated in the Finance Bill procedure. Nevertheless, the measures were clearly part of the Budget, and it is therefore right that the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee should have given careful attention to them.

The Select Committee has taken evidence from Treasury officials, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Governor of the Bank of England, the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress. We took evidence from the TUC and the CBI only last Monday. I understand that, fortunately, I am able to refer to that evidence as it was all taken in public and has been reported to the House. It would not be right for me to quote it because the official published report has not yet been corrected. The House has not had the opportunity to consider evidence which is directly related to what we are debating today before reaching a decision. That is extremely unsatisfactory.

The broad point about the changes in the lower end of the contributions scale and the effect that they will have on employment is a matter that the House is likely to welcome. I do not think that there is a division of opinion on that. However, that does not mean that the changes do not raise some difficult technical problems which ought to be discussed in detail. It is likely that we agree about the beneficial effect of the changes on employment.

Studies made by the Institute for Fiscal Studies suggest that, of the 270,000 people who are affected by the poverty trap, even at the 75 per cent. effective marginal rate of tax level, only 10,000 will be taken out of the poverty trap by my hon. Friends proposals.

We should spend a little time considering the implications of contributions on both employees and employers. We run immediately into the vexed question of the contributory principle. I was deeply worried about that principle when I made my maiden speech because official obeisance to it over the years had ruled out from any benefit as of right the people who were over a given age when the scheme was first introduced. That gave rise to great anomalies. I introduced a private Member's Bill on the matter and I am happy to say that the first thing that the previous Conservative Government did on coming into office was to put the matter right. The over-80s, as they were generally known, got that part of the national insurance pension which was not covered by contributions. Even on the employees' side, the contributory principle has to a large extent been pure myth. The problem is even more difficult on the employers' side.

We are substituting three separate scales for the poverty trap scale. That creates problems, especially in regard to overtime.

5.30 pm

I understand that I can refer to the evidence given to the Select Committee, but cannot directly quote from it—although when the words are published, they will be seen to be cogent. Last Monday we took evidence from Sir Terence Beckett on this very issue, and he made a number of specific points on removing the upper limit on employers' contributions. He mentioned the interesting point—and the CBI has evidence from those able to analyse the position carefully—that, because of the increased costs at the upper end of the scale, employment may be reduced at the lower end of the scale. That may not be the general case, but Sir Terence appears to have specific evidence on this matter.

Sir Terence made the important point that the effect of increasing the burden at the upper end of the scale would inevitably make many high technology industries less competitive both at home and in export markets. He said that we should be moving towards the bigger value added end of the production scale. In reality, the effect of the proposal will be to deter those who are contributing significantly to increasing the amount of value added either in competition with imports or for export markets.

In further evidence, Sir Terence spoke about the various anomalies likely to arise, especially with regard to overtime. I understand that the scheme is to work on the basis of the weekly pay packet. Apparently, a number of firms are concerned that the £1 that employees earn in overtime at particular parts of the scale may actually make them £3 worse off. That is nothing to do with the "why work?" syndrome or the poverty trap. It is a question whether people should work overtime when both the employer and the employee think it justified. Some people will work overtime under the scheme but be worse off, which is clearly absurd. If we were in Committee, we could be banging the issue back and forth, seeing the extent of the problem and trying to find a solution. Concern is being expressed about the effects of the removal of the upper limit for employers' contributions.

On the so-called contribution principle for employers, if it ever existed it most certainly will not exist if we agree to the new clause. In evidence to the Select Committee, the Treasury made it absolutely clear that if we accept the new clause there will be no link between the contributions paid by employers and any benefit that they or anyone else might recieve. In short, the scheme is a payroll tax, and let us have no doubt about that. Moreover, it is a graduated payroll tax with the adverse effect of working against the encouragement of high technology, not low technology, projects and against making us competitive in world markets.

In answer to questions about the employers' contribution, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer accepted that a contributory principle was not really involved. I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Minister has had an opportunity to study the Chancellor's evidence. Perhaps he will tell us whether he has. It is relevant for the House to know the views of the Chancellor on this new clause. I regret that there is no Treasury Minister present to illuminate us further. It is sad that we should come to this. It is a straight payroll tax at the upper end of the scale. Although I welcome the amelioration at the lower end of the scale, we must be concerned about the effects of the ending of the upper limit.

Many of us campaigned for a long time for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge—a tax on jobs imposed by the previous Labour Government. I am glad that it has now been abolished. However, for employers employing people at the upper end of the scale, the effect of that abolition will be offset by the proposals in the new clause. I hope that my hon. Friend will answer a specific question. At what level of income is the abolition of the national insurance surcharge wholly offset by the proposals?

I do not intend to oppose the new clause. It is a curate's egg. We can welcome its effects on the bottom end of the scale while having grave reservations about its effects on the upper end of the scale. If my hon. Friend is in his usual good debating form, he will no doubt legitimately say that if we do not want to agree to the change at the upper end of the scale, we must tell him how to raise the money to pay for that. We could have a long debate about the general economic situation, and I presume that that would be in order. We could debate general fiscal and monetary policies and so on, but I do not want to go that far. We must take for granted the fiscal stance that the Chancellor has put before us. However, I still think that there are better ways to save money than the proposals in the new clause that affect the upper end of the scale.

To be specific, I believe that it is a mistake to increase the own resources to the EEC. No case has been made to the House on why we should give more money to increase agricultural production, when we all know that there are obscene surpluses in many areas of agriculture. Therefore, I am happy to suggest that as an alternative to removing the upper limit.

We have had very little time to debate this matter; and we have had no time to bandy it back and forth. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree to drop at least the part of the new clause that relates to the upper end of the scale.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I wish to give the warmest possible welcome to new clause 12. Prior to the Budget I strongly advocated the changes that it incorporates and I am delighted to see that they have been included in the Bill. It is an important step towards improving the incentives for low-paid work. I do not share the reservations expressed by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). At the very least, I believe that reducing the employers' contribution is a far better way to promote low-paid jobs than raising tax thresholds.

Reducing the employees' contribution has the further advantage of making it more attractive for employees to take low-paid work because of the increase in their take-home pay. The combination of those two measures will be beneficial in promoting prospects for youth employment.

I do not share the concern expressed about the abolition of the upper earnings limit. The money that we shall gain from that will be used on something much more worth while. However, I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) mention an alternative source of funding the £800 million that will be gained. I agree with his point about own resources. I should like that money to be saved in addition to the money saved in abolishing the upper limit.

I wish to make three brief points. The new clause drives a complete coach and horses through the idea that national insurance is any longer either an insurance or a contributory system. I happen to believe that that is very welcome. It is an overdue acknowledgement by the Government that the contributory basis is completely bogus.

I hope that we shall hear no more of that argument because it has been used to obstruct all sorts of reforms in the national insurance system over the years. We have seen contributions at the lower end reduced. As a result of the new clause, contributions at the higher end will be increased, but there has been no change in the benefit to which people are entitled. Thus, there is no insurance principle at stake here.

Mr. Frank Field: A number of hon. Members have said that a coach and horses has been driven through the national insurance system. Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on the position of our constituents when they come to claim benefit? Many of them are denied benefit on the basis of inadequate contributions. For them, therefore, the contribution principle remains intact.

Mr. Yeo: I appreciate the point that the hon. Gentleman makes as it affects those who have been paying in the past. I am simply pointing out that for those who think that they have been buying a benefit by their contributions and who are suddenly told that, because they are higher earners they must pay two, three or four times as much without any increase in benefit, there is no insurance principle, and the same applies at the bottom end of the scale.

I acknowledge that the perception of many people who have paid national insurance contributions has been that they have been buying an insured benefit. Let us disabuse them of that perception as quickly as possible. The new clause will help to do that.

The distortion will continue, though to a lesser extent because the rate of contribution is payable on total earnings. Thus, when one moves through the thresholds, one has a marginal rate of what I would call tax of well in excess of 100 per cent. That is unfortunate, but it is not as serious as it was, and we should continue to try to refine the system to avoid that disincentive effect, which will, to some extent, apply to employers as well as to employees.

I hope that the new clause is only the first step to the complete integration of national insurance contributions with income tax. Once we have recognised that we are no longer dealing with an insurance system, and once we have acknowledged that national insurance is, in effect, a tax, we are ready to integrate the two systems.

Employees' national insurance contributions could easily be merged with their income tax. We have the ironic consequence, as a result of the changes made by the new clause and last year with the abolition of the investment income surcharge, that investment income is now effectively taxed at a lower rate than earned income. I see no reason why that situation should continue.

If we merged employees' national insurance contributions with tax, there would be some disadvantage initially for pensioners, but that could be dealt with by raising the age allowance. Employers' national insurance contributions have always been a payroll tax, and they should be further reduced in future years.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), during Prime Minister's Question Time, raised a point which seemed to be critical of the changes that are now proposed. However, I was glad to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) supporting the changes. It is a comfort to those of us who like to see familiar sights to have the SDP facing in opposite directions at the same time. I hope that that will not deter the Government from moving ahead eventually to the complete abolition of national insurance and its integration with tax, which would result in considerable administrative savings.

I do not always have cause to congratulate the Government on the effect of their fiscal and financial policies on the voluntary sector. However, since, on the whole, voluntary organisations have an above average proportion of low-paid workers, they will be substantial beneficiaries of the changes that are being made. The large charities, of which I have close personal knowledge, will experience a considerable saving in their wage bills as a result of this measure.

5.45 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I apologise to the House for being delayed, and I apologise in particular to the Minister for not being present to hear him move the new clause.

I recognise the broad strategy behind the new clause, and I support it. However, I wonder, in relation to its implementation and bearing in mind the removal of the employers' upper limit, whether the Government have understood the full implications of what they are doing. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) did the House a service in referring to some areas that were troubling him. I agree that as detailed a new clause as this warrants the careful attention of hon. Members.

The House will note amendments (a) and (b) to the new clause which stand in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). My hon. Friend represents a northern seat and I represent an industrial seat in the midlands. The reason for our choice of £25,000 in respect of amendment (a) was that it seemed logical to have an upper limit. After all, while our European partners do not have identical schemes, they are similar; for example, the French have had an upper limit for many years. It is a variable limit—depending on whether the contributions are for pension, unemployment, health or sickness—of about £11,000 depending on the pound-franc exchange rate. West Germany, which is perhaps the closest analogy to the United Kingdom, has an upper limit of £20,000. Therefore, before we rush away from the idea of having an upper limit, we should think of our relative competitiveness with out continental partners. That was one of our motivations in tabling that upper limit.

Our second purpose was to try to have some relationship with the other guides that we have in Britain, and the one that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax and I chose was that at which people no longer get tax relief when they are made redundant. If one is unfortunate enough to be made redundant and one has a tax benefit payment, it is tax-free up to £25,000, and beyond that it is taxable. That was the logic behind the figure that we chose.

In choosing that figure, we were not aware of the question that had been tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) on 15 April, in which he asked for the cost of what we propose. It was made clear in the answer, at column 40 of the Official Report for that date, that the cost would be the substantial sum of £275 million. However, I was cheered as I journeyed south this afternoon to hear that the outturn from the public sector borrowing requirement was a good deal better than the Chancellor had forecast at the time of the Budget. In other words, that £275 million has probably been saved.

Amendment (b) may appeal to the Minister. It would allow him, should he wish to do so at a future date, to put on a top limit—that is, if he is not persuaded today that £25,000 would be the right figure. In other words, it would give him a degree of flexibility to meet many of the points that have been made today. I look forward with interest to hearing his reply on that point. It is true that the days have gone when a limited contribution produced a limited benefit. I take the point of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) that it is conceivable that a man or woman who is short of contributions at a certain stage may make good, make an enormous contribution to the national insurance fund, and still be ineligible for the basic pension because of an insufficiency of contributions. That is an anomaly to which my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security should address himself. Those who find themselves in that position will feel aggrieved, and rightly so.

Only four weeks have passed since the Budget but calculations have been made by four companies in Northampton which show that, if the proposed levels of contribution are implemented, a medium-sized company that tends to operate in the high-tech area will pay more than it will save from the national insurance surcharge. That seems to be the wrong approach. I suspect that we shall find that many medium-sized companies are adversely affected. It is the growing, medium-sized company that we want to prosper, and such companies should be given every encouragement.

It is a fact that national insurance contributions are paid for up to 52 weeks for an employee who is working overseas. When that rule was introduced it was the norm for employees to go abroad for 18 months or two years. That was the normal tour. That was reduced to about 15 months. However, there has been a further change and the bulk of expatriate Britons in the middle east or far east, where my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing has been recently, are abroad for nine months. As the cost of living abroad is higher than it is here—that is usually the position — salaries have to be enhanced and employers will find themselves having to pay enhanced national insurance contributions. That will produce an additional on-cost for those whom we want to be more competitive in the market.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his ministerial colleagues have rightly placed great emphasis on share incentive schemes over the past few years. This is to be applauded, but we must recognise that such schemes are likely to be attractive to middle management and top management. If someone is on the shop floor or is a member of lower management and he receives an annual bonus, which in many ways is comparable to a share option scheme, which will attract medium and top management, he will find himself in the top bracket for contributions if the bonus is paid in any one week. That is an unnecessary disincentive. It will not encourage better employer-employee relationships and it will negate the benefit of having good involvement between men and management.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr.

Higgins) in his complaints about the introduction of the clause at this stage in the Bill's passage through the House. It is clear that we have an important new clause before us, but the Bill was intended originally to be much smaller in scope. It was not envisaged that it would involve the enormous implications that will undoubtedly flow from the new clause.

It is sad when a Department uses a Bill which is a minor measure when set against the provisions contained in the new clause as a vehicle for placing additional legislation on the statute book quickly without giving Parliament the opportunity of a proper Second Reading debate or the opportunity fully to examine in Committee the measures proposed in the new clause.

It is wrong that this new clause should have been presented in this way. The provisions contained in it should have appeared before us in a separate Bill. Parliament has a duty to consider what the Executive are proposing for the taxation of individuals. The new clause will apply to virtually the entire population at one time or another; and yet we shall let it pass after an hour or two's debate without any proper consideration of the implications.

We have had a number of interesting Second Reading speeches and some hon. Members have attempted to do the work that they would have done if they had had the opportunity of considering the Bill in Committee. The introduction of the new clause at this stage is an abuse of parliamentary procedure. If we allow this to happen and Departments learn that they can treat the House in this way, they will do it again. We shall all suffer as a result, but the nation will suffer most of all. As a consequence, Parliament will be treated increasingly by Departments as a dead letter or a rubber stamp. I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing in his complaints, speaking as he did with the authority of being Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service. When the Minister for Social Security replies, I hope that he will give us an assurance that this is an experiment which his Department does not intend to repeat.

We all accept that national insurance contributions had to be related to earnings and a number of years have passed since the earnings-related system was introduced. There is no good reason for keeping the national insurance contribution separate from income tax, especially as it is collected through the pay-as-you-earn mechanism. The identification of national insurance contributions as something separate from income tax is a survival of a bureaucratic notion which should be brought to an end.

I accept that it is right to carry the contributions to the national insurance system up to the top ranges of earnings, but what justification then remains for keeping higher-rate tax at the same time? That retention becomes increasingly dubious. I appreciate that many of my right hon. and hon. Friends would not join me in this approach, but a few weeks ago I turned up the reports of the debates in Committee during the consideration of the Finance Bill of 1971. I looked them up for another purpose but I found that at that time I recommended strongly that we should bring to an end the higher rate of tax as it did no one any good. I only regret that I have not said it more often since then. The economy would be in much better heart now if we did not have a system which attacks those who earn the most and who contribute most to the creation of wealth.

In moving towards higher rate contributions to the national insurance scheme we are, if anything, accentuating the evil effects of retaining the higher-rate tax. The House should ask itself who gains from discouraging the enterprise of those with the greatest earning potential. Secondly, who would lose if higher-rate tax were abolished? I believe that in a short time revenue would actually increase if it were abolished. When Sir Stafford Cripps halved the duty on wine, he doubled the yield in a very short time. If we did not have the higher-rate tax, taxpayers would pay much more within a short time in national insurance contributions and income tax at the standard rate. Much less effort and ingenuity would be wasted on tax avoidance, which is a major national industry.

We would help also to end the senseless distortion of salary structures. The sharp increases in salary that are sometimes received by senior management, especially in the private sector, are seen by some sections of public opinion as offensive; but the net effect of these increases still does not bring British levels of earnings within the range that is considered normal for top people in other countries.

Equally, we would take the unwanted burdens from companies of retaining the people that they need for the continuation of their business regardless of the enormous expense of paying the tax which goes along with paying the necessary gross salaries. If, in the enterprise economy, we ended discrimination against the most energetic and creative elements, everyone would gain and no one would lose. I hope that I shall have the opportunity to say the same thing again, because it is a point which needs to be made, if not by anyone else, then by the hon. Member for Kensington.

We have now had earnings-related contributions for a number of years. We still have no explicable relationship between contributions and benefits in national insurance. Employers' contributions should have a specific purpose and a definable, calculable end result. The recommendation that I would like my hon. Friend to consider is that the employer's contribution to the national insurance system should become a form of deferred pay which would go straight into a personal money-purchase scheme for each employee. The employer's contribution ought not simply to be lost in the fund, but should be retained as a personal entitlement of the employee in respect of whom it is paid. It should be allowed to accumulate on money-purchase principles to provide for his retirement as a form of deferred pay.

I do not like the employer's contribution going into what is, in effect, a final salary scheme. Final salary schemes have a redistributive or money transfer effect from the low to the higher paid and from early leavers to long stayers. That last point may not be a fair criticism of the state earnings-related pension scheme arrangements, but I support those who think that the state earnings-related pension system should be wound up as soon as possible. I should like the employers' earnings-related contribution to be retained and identified as the property of the individual employee, and for it to go towards the provision of his retirement income.

If employers made a 10 per cent. pension contribution, it would not be enough to give everybody all that they hope for in retirement, but it would certainly be the basis of a satisfactory retirement income and it would be possible to calculate how it had been arrived at.

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

I accept that employees' contributions cannot purchase specific benefits if the payments into the scheme are earnings-related but the benefits are flat rate. Equally, the benefits which people have learnt to expect from national insurance are related to their families' circumstances but there is no reflection of family circumstances on the contribution side. That is another anomaly.

I accept that there is inevitably a redistribution of income where employees' contributions are concerned, but that really has the effect of making national insurance contributions into a citizenship entitlement. It is not an insurance scheme in any acceptable sense of the term and the proposal before the House today takes us no further in clarifying the underlying relationships between contributions and benefits in the national insurance system.

National insurance is a citizenship entitlement with unacceptable gaps, as hon. Members have pointed out. Because of deficiencies in the contribution records which are held to exist in certain cases, some people are not entitled to claim against national insurance when they fall into need, and we then have to have a supplementary benefit system instead which gives them virtually the same entitlements. But that alternative simply clouds the moral basis for the redistribution of income and at the same time creates tremendous administrative difficulties.

In the years of the decline of the Holy Roman Empire, it was said that they legalised anarchy and called a constitution. The redistribution of income in Britain is in the last stages of decline and must be abolished and reconstructed in one way or another. This Bill legalises the extension of income tax and calls it a contribution. It is not really a joking matter; it is a system which urgently needs to be revised. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends are thinking seriously of what comes after the Bill. We know that studies are being made on the reform of the redistribution of income; but are they sufficiently radical to do away with the problems that have beset national insurance since it went over to an earnings-related contribution basis?

There is a strong element of hyprocrisy and muddle in this Bill. It has no place in the redistribution of income in a fair society and is a heavy brake on enterprise. We are entitled to expect from my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Chancellor a rational, comprehensible and transparently moral system for the redistribution of income. The new clause is not enough.

Mr. Newton: I find myself in the strange position of having had the least equivocal welcome for the new clause from the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), with whom I might, if I dare, couple my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and, very nearly, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). I hope that they will not think that I am doing too much damage by adding them to the company in which they have found themselves this afternoon. Having said that, and recognising that several cautionary remarks have been made and questions asked by many other of my hon. Friends, I want to thank them for the balanced and constructive way in which they put their points.

I agree with the hon. Member for Birkenhead that it is nonsense to put forward the proposition that the new clause is directed towards promoting low-paid employment at the expense of other forms. The Government's proposition is that there has been an unduly heavy additional Government burden of tax and national insurance contributions in that part of the labour market which has inhibited employment there. That is not at all the same as saying that it is part of a deliberate plan to stimulate low-paid employment. The hon. Member for Birkenhead made that point particularly well in an intervention.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) asked me about the position of people with two part-time jobs. They will each be dealt with separately to determine the initial liability, but when all annual contributions are received in Newcastle the enhancement which we intend as part of the other arrangements to which I referred will be applied if appropriate. I can assure the hon. Lady that people with two or more jobs will not be in any way disadvantaged in comparison with those earning the same amount in a single job.

The hon. Lady asked about earnings factors. As I hope I said, we intend to use a formula to boost earnings which will ensure that the earnings factor broadly reflects actual earnings. If it errs at all, it is likely to err on the side of generosity to the beneficiary. The only people who might lose a small amount of additional component will be those with a few weeks of lower rate contributions where their normal earnings were generally considerably higher. Even they would receive additional component commensurate with the contributions paid. I hope that that gives her some reassurance on the points that were causing her concern.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) referred to his new clause 23 and the consequences of the changes in the limits in the middle of the year. As he explained, his new clause is aimed at company directors whose annual earnings period would straddle any change in contribution liability arising from a mid-year change in the employers' upper earnings limits. Because of that, the actual contributions required from them could be significantly affected by the precise method chosen for applying a mid-year change in liability. We are not yet in a position to say what that method will be, although I know that directors and others similarly placed will want to know soon how they will be placed personally. The Institute of Directors, as is well known to those who read newspapers, wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State last week. He has agreed to meet the institute to discuss this and wider points arising from the Budget changes in national insurance contributions. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be encouraged generally that that meeting it to take place and at which some of the points they raised will be discussed.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton that it will not be necessary to amend the Bill to implement whatever solution is reached in consultation with those affected on the issue that is the subject of new clause 23. There are already sufficient powers to make the necessary changes to regulations, both in the existing primary legislation and in the transitional provisions in the Bill. I hope that that response to his constructive remarks will reassure him.

Much has been said about the contributory system. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) raised the matter first, and it was echoed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and my hon.

Friends the Members for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) and for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams), who dealt with the matter in his own inimitable wide-ranging style. Many of the issues raised about the contributory system, especially by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington, such as the inter-relationship with taxation and the future of the social security benefit and taxation systems, range too wide for me to hope to respond to them in such a debate. Indeed, it would not be appropriate for me to seek to respond to them while the Government are considering the conclusions of the social security review, and as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget speech proposals to introduce a Green Paper on personal taxation. However, I shall ensure that my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Chancellor have their attention drawn to the remarks made during the debate.

Exaggeration was displayed in suggestions that the changes in the new clause would result in a dramatic erosion of the contributory system and suddenly change the world overnight. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made it clear in the Budget that the essential features of the contributory principle would be preserved. We have certainly sought to do that regarding people's benefit rights through our amendments and my assurances to the hon. Member for Derby, South.

Mr. Higgins: What are the essential features of the contributory system?

Mr. Newton: I am thinking of the fact that people acquire benefit rights by the payment of contributions, especially employees' contributions. I have read what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said to the Treasury Select Committee when he gave evidence to it about this matter. I would not want to pretend that the argument can be presented completely in black and white. However, the present system already involves redistribution from the better paid to the lower paid, for example, by giving 100 per cent. pension return on earnings up to the lower earnings limit, but only 25 per cent. pension return on earnings between the lower and upper earnings limits. Our proposal merely extends the redistribution which already takes place within the national insurance system.

My right hon. and hon. Friends may not regard that as good, and that is a matter for argument. I think that the move is sensible as part of our package. However, it is straining the point to suggest that there has been a dramatic change compared with the structure of the national insurance system which has existed since the move to earnings-related contributions nearly 10 years ago which suddenly calls into question the basis of the contributory principle in an entirely new way. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will reflect a little on that before they suggest that the change is as great as they implied in their speeches.

Mr. Higgins: I am sorry to interrupt again, but my hon. Friend has not answered my question. What are the essential features of the contributory principle for employers' contributions?

6.15 pm

Mr. Newton: I hoped that I had at least answered my right hon. Friend's question by implication, but I shall now seek to answer it more explicitly. There has been no clear contributory principle for employers' contributions for a considerable time. I do not believe that the proposals in the new clause dramatically change that. I have the greatest respect for my right hon. Friend and hope that he will not think that I seek to dodge his question. I am not sure whether he has said before — many of my hon. Friends on many previous occasions have done — that the contributory principle is now virtually meaningless. If they hold that view, I hope that they will accept that the proposals make no great difference.

The nature and extent of the contributory principle, the weight placed on it in the past, and the extent to which it was changed in the mid-1970s are matters of argument. However, as a matter of record, I wish to state that the Government did not propose, and do not see these changes as marking, a dramatic departure from previous principles.

Mr. Michael Morris: I am listening carefully and understanding my hon. Friend, but does he accept that this is the first time that an upper limit has been removed, and that that is a significant change? We are the only member of the European Community to have removed an upper limit. That is surely a significant change.

Mr. Newton: I do not wish to make heavy weather of this matter. I am not suggesting that this is not a significant change. The Government have placed a proposal before the House, which is significant for various reasons, including those that I made clear in my initial speech. However, I question whether it is a significant change in the basic principles of the national insurance system as it has been operating since the move to earnings-related contributions nearly 10 years ago. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax that contracting-out rebates will remain as at present, that is, 2·15 per cent. of earnings between the lower and upper earnings limits for employees, and 4·1 per cent. for employers. To have extended the rebates above the upper earnings limit would have been to change the contracting-out agreement when the present pension scheme was put in place.

I am anxious not to delay the House unnecessarily but to deal with as many specific points as I can. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton that the amount of additional administrative burden for employers will not be as significant as he suggests because we shall provide them with tables designed to make their task little or no more difficult than the existing system.

Some of my hon. Friends expressed reservations about the effects on higher paid employment. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) in explicitly recognising that this is a package. My right hon. and hon. Friends would rightly think me foolish if I were to attempt to meet all their points by dismissing them or pretending that they had no validity. Obviously there will be problems about some aspects of the new margins between the different bands of earnings. However, they must be considered against the significant problems of the existing huge cliff edge that arises at the existing lower earnings limit.

Some firms with heavy concentrations of highly paid employees may not be happy and may suffer some difficult consequences from the rise in national insurance contributions. However, I am certain that many more firms which employ millions more people and must also compete in foreign markets — often in even more competitive markets where sheer skill and ability are not as much part of the sales package — will gain a significant advantage through reductions in labour costs as part of the package. I do not run away from saying that there are disadvantages, but they must be weighed against the advantages in the package as a whole.

Within that perspective, the measures deserve the support of the House. They will help to create new employment, especially in areas where opportunities have been most difficult to find, and they will improve the health and strength of the British economy while at the same time bringing important additional social help to those in lower-paid employment who have an especially strong claim on our help. I hope that we shall have the support of the House in carrying through the proposals.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time.

Question proposed, That the clause be added to the Bill.

Mr. Higgins: I must express some doubts as to whether we should take the step that the Question suggests. Before we decide to add the clause to the Bill, may I ask my hon. Friend, in relation to his statement that tables will be provided to show that the changes in this new clause will be easy to administer, whether that will take account of the point about people working overtime. How will the tables cope with that?

Another point about which I have grave doubts relates to the position of employers who are contracted in or contracted out of the scheme. Is it the case that those who have been contracted out will effectively be paying at the contracted-in rate? If that is so, what will my hon. Friend do about it?

Mr. Newton: It is entirely right that my right hon. Friend should have pressed me about the tables, since I acknowledged in my remarks that there was some validity in his comments about the effect of having several cliff edges at points on the incomes scale, which I believe is what he has in mind when referring to overtime. I thought I had acknowledged that I do not dismiss the point, but that it must be put in the context of the substantial disadvantages of the existing lower earnings limit, with the especially acute cliff-edge effect that it has on people earning small amounts of additional money.

The tables with which we shall provide employers to operate the new proposals will be related, as the existing tables are, to what employers should pay on the given amount of earnings in one week. That will necessarily be the amount of contributions due on the total earnings, including overtime. That is how the present system works. The employer looks at the tables to determine from the earnings of his employee in any week what the contribution should be, and I envisage no change in the method of operation.

Mr. Higgins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for clarifying that point. Is it true, as has been asserted in evidence and elsewhere, that those who work overtime may discover that, under this scheme, they receive less as a result of working overtime than if they do not?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I hope that the Minister will reply briefly, because in no way must this be an extension of the debate on the Question, That the clause be read a Second time. We are talking about adding the clause to the Bill; we must not discuss the principle of the new clause.

Mr. Newton: I should be grateful for your indulgence for a moment or two, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I would not wish to end the debate in a way that denied my right hon. Friend the opportunity to press me on the points that he wished to raise. I must acknowledge—I thought I had already done so twice—that I do not dismiss my right hon. Friend's point, but I wish to place it in context. Just as it is acutely the case, in relation to the present lower earnings limit, that a small increase in earnings can precipitate a large increase in deductions, so to a lesser extent that must necessarily be the case with the other steps being introduced into the system. But at each of those steps, the effect will be less than it is at the existing lower earnings limit. Therefore, to some extent, it will have the effect that my right hon. Friend mentioned. Clearly, that cannot be denied, and I have no intention of trying to deny it.

Nevertheless, taking account of the large anomaly in the present system, what we are doing to reduce that anomaly, together with the other advantages of the broad reduction in national insurance contributions for the lower paid in the package as a whole, means that the disadvantage to which my right hon. Friend drew attention is worth having. It will also be true that, whatever may be the effect at those margins, the national insurance contributions being paid will still be lower than those which would be paid at the same levels of earnings at present because of the overall reduction in national insurance contributions.

I hope that I have answered my right hon. Friend's query on that point, but whether I have satisfied him is another matter altogether.

Mr. Frank Field rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What I feared is about to happen, and we are having an extension of the debate on the Second Reading of the clause.

Mr. Newton: It sounds as though I have exhausted your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am grateful for it, in that it helped me to assist my right hon. Friend. I continue to believe, as I have said on several occasions, that, taking the advantages and disadvantages together, there is a strong case for what the Government propose in the new clause, and I hope that the House will accept it.

Clause added to the Bill.

New clause 7

MEDICAL EVIDENCE

"In section 17 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 (provision of information: general) — the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (2),

"(2A) The Secretary of State may by regulations direct

(a) that medical information required under subsection (2) above shall, in such cases as may be prescribed, be provided in a prescribed form;

(b) that an employee shall not be required under subsection (2) above to provide medical information in respect of such days as may be prescribed in a period of incapacity for work.".'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 22.

Mr. Newton: The purpose of this clause is to introduce a new subsection into section 17 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 so that rules can be made about medical evidence for statutory sick pay purposes.

To be entitled to statutory sick pay an employee has to be incapable of doing work which he can be reasonably expected to do under his contract of service by reason of illness or disablement. This requirement is similar in many respects to the incapacity condition which applies to state benefits such as invalidity benefit and severe disablement allowance. To establish entitlement to these state benefits the sick person is required by regulations made under the Social Security Act 1975 to produce medical evidence of incapacity for work. A standard form of doctor's statement is specified by regulations for use by general medical practitioners and rules about its completion are set down.

There are at present no parallel provisions applying to statutory sick pay. An employer is required to decide whether an employee is entitled to receive statutory sick pay and can ask him to provide any reasonable evidence in support of that entitlement. The nature of that evidence is not specified. The employer can decide what evidence he will accept. This is only proper in relation to a scheme which employers have the prime responsibility for administering.

In practice, many employers ask an employee who is ill and away from work for any length of time to provide medical evidence. The Department supplies doctors with a standard form of statement, known in the trade as form Med 3, to issue free of charge for social security and statutory sick pay purposes. The clause is intended to enable the form's use for statutory sick pay purposes to be based on prescribed enforceable rules instead of the informal administrative arrangements that have existed until now.

We intend that the regulations to be made under the powers being sought in the clause will be similar to the regulations about medical evidence for social security benefit purposes. We have consulted the British Medical Association about our proposal and we have its concurrence.

Amendment No. 22 is simply a technical amendment providing that this provision and the statutory sick pay entitlement provisions will come into force together on 6 April 1986.

6.30 pm

Mrs. Beckett: In the light of the extension of statutory sick pay, about which, as the Minister knows, we have expressed some reservations, it seems logical that, instead of employers just deciding ad lib what evidence they require, there should be some standard procedure and forms. In that sense, we are prepared to accept this clause.

New Clause 7

POWER TO EXTEND PNEUMOCONIOSIS ETC. (WORKER'S COMPENSATION) ACT 1979

'In the Pneumoconiosis etc. (Workers' Compensation) Act 1979—

(a) in section 1—

(i) at the end of subsection (3) there shall be added the words "and any other disease which is specified by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this Act by order made by statutory instrument"; and

(ii) the following subsection shall be added after subsection (4)—

"(5) No order shall be made under this section unless a draft of the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament."; and

(b) in section 4(4)—

(i) the words "other than a disease specified in an order under section 1 above," shall be inserted after "applies," in paragraphs (a) and (b); and

(ii) the following paragraphs shall be added after paragraph (b)—

"(c) in the case of a person disabled by a disease specified in an order under section 1 above, means the date on which disablement benefit first became payable to him in respect of the disease or the date of the coming into force of the order, whichever is the later;

(d) in the case of the dependant of a person who, immediately before he died, was disabled by a disease specified in an order under section 1 above, means the date of the deceased's death or the date of the coming into force of the order, whichever is the later.".'—[Mr. Peter Bottomley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 139 and 107.

Mr. Bottomley: We seek to be able to extend, by order, the list of diseases in the Pneumoconiosis etc. (Workers' Compensation) Act 1979.

In March 1984 the Secretary of State for Social Services accepted a recommendation of the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council that two additional asbestos-related diseases should be covered by the industrial injuries scheme.

We acknowledge that the Pneumoconiosis etc. (Workers' Compensation) Act 1979 should also be extended. The Act does not at present provide for adding to the list of diseases. The purpose of this amendment is to put that right.

The amendment will not itself add these two further diseases to the list given in the Act. It will enable the Secretary of State to extend the list by making an order under the Act after it has been laid in draft and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Mrs. Beckett: We do indeed welcome the provision that the Government are making. It seems sensible to allow additions of this kind to be made as medical reactions change.

New Clause 8

HOUSING BENEFITS—SUBSIDY

'(1) In section 32 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 (subsidy)—

(a) the following paragraphs shall be substituted for paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2)—

"(a) in the case of an authority granting rebates or allowances under the statutory scheme during that year or any part of it, the rebates or allowances so granted, subject to any prescribed deductions;

(b) in the case of an authority granting rebates or allowances under a local scheme during that year or any part of it, the rebates or allowances which, if the local scheme had not been in force, would have been granted by the authority under the statutory scheme during that year or that part of it, subject to any prescribed deductions; and";

(b) at the end of that subsection there shall be added (but not as part of paragraph (c) the words 'but shall be subject, in so far as it falls to be calculated in accordance with paragraph (a) or (b) above, to deduction of any amount which the Secretary of State considers it unreasonable to meet out of money provided by way of subsidy under subsection (1) above'; and

(c) at the end of subsection (3) there shall be added (but not as part of paragraph (c)) the words "after any deduction has been made by virtue of subsection (2) above or an order under that subsection".

(2)The amendments made by subsection (1)(b) and (c) above shall be deemed to have come into force on 1st April 1985.'. —[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 138.

Mr. Whitney: The reason for this new clause is very simple: the Secretary of State needs the power to prevent exploitation of the arrangements for and the legislation governing the housing benefit subsidy scheme. It is, of course, regrettable that we should find it necessary to introduce this new clause.

A concerted effort has been made by one local authority, Sheffield, to increase its revenue at the expense of the housing benefit subsidy system. I will not delay the House with the sorry details of the various schemes which the council has devised or the steps the Department has taken to prevent this abuse. But the House will recall from its consideration of the 1984 subsidy order and the subsequent amendment that we had to make to it that Sheffield's various schemes have involved charging higher rents to tenants on housing benefit than are charged to tenants not receiving the benefit. The subsidy implications are obvious. I do not want to comment further on Sheffield's current scheme, because my Department's refusal under the terms of the 1984 subsidy order to pay the additional subsidy claimed by the council is now the subject of legal proceedings.

However, we made it clear when last year's subsidy order was discussed that we are not prepared to tolerate this kind of ploy. I am afraid that the efforts that Sheffield has continued to make to exploit the subsidy system have forced us to conclude that the Secretary of State needs the power to refuse to pay part of a subsidy claim in these circumstances. We really cannot put up with a time-wasting cat-and-mouse game in which an authority tries to find loopholes in the subsidy arrangements in order to exploit them. Nor do we intend to waste the House's time in making and amending subsidy provisions to close each possible loophole.

The new clause will not alter the existing arrangements whereby the Secretary of State will pay benefit subsidy on the basis of rebates and allowances granted by authorities under the housing benefit scheme. We shall continue to list the items that will always be excluded from benefit subsidy—such as rent-free weeks awarded to tenants—in the subsidy order, so that authorities know where they stand. We have, in fact, taken the opportunity to enable the subsidy order to be drafted in a much more straightforward way, so far as these exclusions are concerned, than at present. Although the new power to make an order will have exactly the same effect as the existing power, it should mean that the subsidy order will be more comprehensible. That is certainly to be hoped. However, the amendment will also give the Secretary of State a new power to exclude items which it is clearly not reasonable to meet out of the money voted by Parliament for the housing benefit scheme. I assure the House that this power will not be used lightly, but it will be used to prevent blatant attempts at exploitation of the subsidy arrangements from succeeding.

Amendment No. 138 is consequential.

Mrs. Beckett: I listened with interest to what the Minister had to say. We recognise that the Government have been upset by the activities of, in particular, Sheffield. If one wanted to be unkind, one could say that, as in the previous debate, part of what the Minister was suggesting was that it was convenient to be able to do things without the inconvenience of having to keep bringing orders and Bills before the House of Commons.

Although the Minister identified correctly the fact that there has been a need over the past couple of years to make changes in subsidy orders because of changes which local authorities have made in their schemes, there was, if I heard his remarks correctly, one important omission, and I hope that it was an inadvertent one.

At present, because the changes to which the Minister referred have to be made by subsidy order, the Government are under a statutory duty to consult local authority associations about the ways in which they propose to meet any changes that they might decide needed to be made. But this does not always operate in quite the way that we might hope, to put it mildly.

To take one recent example, when the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 4) Regulations were brought before the House, the local authority associations were given five days to respond to the regulations without even being sent a draft of them, which might be thought to have made the situation even more difficult. Indeed, they have taken the Government to court about the matter. It is an interesting comparison that the Government were given seven days by the court to respond to the complaint and were unable to do so within that time. Indeed, I understand that they have not responded to it so far and have on a number of occasions sought to have the matter adjourned on the ground that they cannot possibly respond within less than a few weeks to the sort of arguments that they expect local authority associations to respond to within five days.

The point I am making is that, even with the statutory duty to consult the local authority associations written into the legislation, the Government manage to honour it more in the breach than in the observance. If it is the case—as it appears to be from this new clause—that, because we are no longer discussing orders but powers which the Secretary of State will have in perpetuity, the associations will not have the benefit even of that statutory duty, ineffective though it may be, that is a matter of very considerable concern to those associations and indeed to the Opposition.

I therefore ask the Minister to give an assurance that it was an inadvertent error on the part of the Government that they omitted from the Bill the statutory duty to consult local authority associations, and that they will seek to amend it at a later stage.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Lady has sought to take the debate a good deal further than it should go. Of course we have followed and will always follow the provisions laid down in the housing benefits regulations and other appropriate regulations relating to consultation with local authorities. I shall certainly not be drawn into the issues that the hon. Lady has sought to raise regarding the Housing Benefits Amendment (No. 4) Regulations, which as she says, have been the subject of judicial action. I emphasise the essential requirement of this measure and I hope that the hon. Lady will feel able to agree that it is in the interest of the House that the housing benefits regulations, as agreed by the House, should not be the subject of the sort of time-wasting cat-and-mouse game which has been inflicted on the taxpayer by the Sheffield council.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Mrs. Beckett: With the leave of the House Mr. Deputy Speaker, I may say that this is completely unsatisfactory, and I am quite certain that the local authority associations will not only be dissatisfied but will not let the matter rest there. It would have served the Minister better if he had been prepared to acknowledge that the local authority associations should be consulted about these matters. If consultations were not necessary, we should not be debating the 50 sets of Government amendments and new clauses that we are debating today.

New Clause 9

PENSIONS AND GRATUITIES FOR MEMBERS OF CERTAIN BOARDS

'(1) The following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (3) of section 12 of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 (Horserace Totalisator Board)—

"(3A) The Board may pay such pension or gratuity to or in respect of any member of the Board as the Board may, with the approval of the Secretary of State, determine.".

(2) The following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (6) of section 24 of that Act (Horserace Betting Levy Board)—

"(6A) The Levy Board may pay such pension or gratuity as the Board may, with the approval of the Secretary of State, determine, to or in respect of the chairman and any other members appointed by the Secretary of State.".

(3) The following paragraph shall be inserted after paragraph 5 of Schedule 1 to the Gaming Act 1968 (provisions as to Gaming Board for Great Britain)—

"5A. The Secretary of State may pay such pension or gratuity to or in respect of any member of the Board as the Secretary of State may, with the consent of the Treasury, determine.".'—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 140 and 108.

Mr. Whitney: The Bill makes important improvements in various aspects of the pensions provisions. The purpose of the new clause is to fulfil a clear commitment to provide occupational pensions for the chairmen of three boards — the Horserace Betting Levy Board, the Horserace Totalisator Board and the Gaming Board for Great Britain — for which my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is accountable. Successive Governments, since at least 1978, have agreed that it is unfair to ask people to take on the chairmanship of these boards without any prospect of receiving a pension. The Bill provides an opportunity to put this straight. I hope that the House will agree that the opportunity should be taken, and will approve the new clause.

The position at present is that the relevant statutes—the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963 and the Gaming Act 1968—provide for the members of the tote board, the levy board and the gaming board to receive remuneration, but they say nothing about pensions for members. The same statutes provide for employees of these boards to receive pay and pensions. We believe—and I do not think there can be much quibble about this—that the important obligations which are attached to the chairmanship of these boards, together with the heavy commitment of time which these jobs demand, make it inappropriate for the legislation to preclude the payment of a pension. The task of running the tote's pool betting and bookmaker business demands a full-time commitment. The chairmanship of the levy board and of the gaming board each calls for three days a week.

Another consideration which points to the unfairness of the present position is the long service which the office holders are likely to give. All three posts require a close knowledge of the way betting or gaming operates on the ground in this country. So experience is particularly valuable, and tends to lead to people being asked to continue in office for more than one term of appointment. The present chairmen of these boards have already served a total of about 20 years. I hope that the House will agree that with posts calling for this sort of commitment, it is only reasonable that the post should be pensionable. I should perhaps make it clear that, although the new clause provides for the possibility of pensions being paid to board members other than chairmen, it is not envisaged at present that pensions would be paid to other board members, as their commitment is far less than that required of the chairmen.

Under the new clause, the arrangements for determining the pension, and paying for it, would be the same as apply now for the salaries of the members of the boards concerned. It will be for the tote and levy boards to determine what, if any, pension they believe is appropriate for the chairmen of the respective boards, but their determination must be approved by the Secretary of State. There will be no call upon the public purse because the funds will be found, as with all the other expenses connected with these boards, from the boards' own resources. With the chairmanship of the gaming board, it will be for the Secretary of State, with Treasury consent, to decide upon pension, and public funds would be involved in the payment of any pension appropriate for this post.

We believe that these provisions remove an unfair and inapt restriction on the terms and conditions of the chairmen of three significant boards while retaining an appropriate mechanism of control, and I ask the House to support the new clause.

Mrs. Beckett: This is an extraordinary clause to find in a Bill of this nature, and it is perhaps a little offensive. I understand from the Minister of State, Home Office, that he, rather than the Under-Secretary, is to blame for this being included in the Bill, and that any strictures that we wish to hear should be heaped upon his head. I think that they should be so heaped.

At a later stage—I do not wish to go out of order but it is appropriate to mention this—we shall be depriving 1,100 people with invalidity pensions of £7·50 a week because of the changes that the Government are making which will affect some people who are receiving the maximum amount of invalidity allowance. For the Government to choose, with a remarkable sense of priorities, in the same Bill to give pensions to these three gentleman is astonishing. The three gentlemen are respectively Lord Allen, a former permanent secretary at the Home Office, Sir Ian Trethowan, whose name may be familiar to the House, and Sir Woodrow Wyatt, who is no doubt receving a pension for his services to the Labour party.

It is extraordinary that the Government should bother to introduce this provision. It is wholly inconsistent with the many remarks that the Prime Minister has made recently about how people should be encouraged to make their own provision for pensions. I assume that Lord Allen has some pension provision as a former permanent secretary at the Home Office, and that Sir Ian Trethowan has a pension from his public service. Sir Woodrow Wyatt was never short of a penny or two, even before he started to write columns in the newspapers. All these gentlemen can more than afford to provide a pension for their retirement.

The Minister said that some of these gentlemen had been in the service for nearly 20 years. Will this clause have any retrospective effect, and is it therefore intended to provide a more substantial pension on top of those that two at least already enjoy? It has been suggested in the press today that the Government intend to abolish the state earnings-related pension scheme, thereby setting people free to provide their own pension. Providing pensions for these three persons is extraordinary timing by the Government.

Mr. Whitney: I repeat that this measure has been agreed for some time, and certainly from 1978, when the Labour Government were in office. This measure will make significant improvements in many pensions. Therefore, it is not totally inappropriate that the new clause should be part of this Bill. The details and arrangements for the pensions will be the responsibility of the boards.

New Clause 10

MANAGERS OF SCHEMES

'(1) The Secretary of State may by regulations provide who is to be treated as a manager of an occupational pension scheme for any of the purposes—

(a) of the Social Security Acts 1975 to 1985; or

(b) of the Social Security Act 1973.

(2) Section 166 of the Social Security Act 1975 shall apply to the power to make regulations under subsection (1) above as it applies to powers to make regulations under that Act.

(3) Regulations made under this section shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.

(4) In this section "occupational pension scheme" has the meaning assigned to it by section 66 of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975.'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 100 and 101.

Mr. Whitney: This is essentially a technical and clarifying clause that gives power to prescribe who the managers are in a pension scheme which is not set up under trust law. Various duties under this Bill and earlier Acts fall to the trustees of a pension scheme or, in the case of a scheme not set up under trust and therefore having no trusteeism, to its managers. Almost all private sector schemes are set up as trusts—they need to do so to gain tax approved status — but the statutory schemes for public service employees, and a few others, are not. In these cases, it will not always be clear who should be treated as the manager and this would be particularly important if, for example, such a scheme did not comply with requirements to disclose information to its members and the members wished to enforce these requirements.

The amendments are consequential on the new clause.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I accept what my hon. Friend says, but there has been a proliferation of pension schemes, and many are written under somewhat odd trustees, particularly smaller schemes. Many of us hope that that proliferation of schemes will be greatly increased by legislation to be introduced at a later date. Therefore, should not my hon. Friend take the power, at the same time as he is taking the power to define who are managers of these schemes, to define who are the trustees of these schemes? Sometimes this is not entirely clear. No amendment is called for at this stage, but I hope that my hon. Friend will bear this point in mind in case an amendment needs to be introduced at a later date.

Mr. Whitney: I shall consider carefully my hon. Friend's point, because I know that he has great knowledge of these matters. My instinctive reaction is to go carefully. As he will recognise, while we need appropriate safeguards, we also need to avoid over-burdening schemes and pension trusts unnecessarily.

New Clause 11

MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS RELATING TO STATUTORY SICK PAY

'The enactments specified in Schedule [Miscellaneous amendments relating to statutory sick pay] shall have effect subject to the amendments there specified.'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this new clause it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 24, 105 and 106.

Mr. Whitney: This new clause gives effect to the new schedule on miscellaneous amendments relating to statutory sick pay. If it is for the convenience of the House, I will refer briefly to the proposals in the new schedule, but, if the House wishes, I will go into more detail. The proposals are no more than a tidying-up operation to correct defects or ambiguities which have been identified in the existing legislation.

Paragraph 1 of the proposed schedule provides for an amendment to be made to the Attachment of Earnings Act 1971 so that payments of statutory sick pay are treated as earnings for the purpose of that Act. Paragraph 2 closes a technical loophole whereby we might have been unable properly to determine the date of maternity allowance claims. Paragraph 3 brings severe disablement allowance into line with contributory sickness and invalidity benefit by providing that the allowance cannot be paid at the same time as statutory sick pay.

Paragraph 4 relates to a possible ambiguity in section 3(6) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 relating to the linking period. As presently drafted, it creates the possibility of uncertainty about the liability of a new employer to pay for any period of sickness before the effective date of employment. Our proposal puts beyond doubt that in these circumstances the period of entitlement begins with the first day of incapacity in the currency of that employment contract.

Paragraph 5 relates to the repeal of provisions regarding overpayments. When we introduced the statutory sick pay scheme it was intended that regulations would be laid to enable overpaid state incapacity benefits to be recovered from statutory sick pay, and vice versa, if payments under one scheme were erroneously paid because entitlement was properly due under the other scheme. However, legislating for that concept proved too complicated and in the event it was decided that employers would be responsible for recovering the statutory sick pay they had overpaid, and that the Department would apply existing rights of recovery of state benefits if incapacity benefit had been paid when statutory sick pay was payable instead. The provisions in the 1982 Act have, therefore, been made redundant and it is desirable that they should be repealed.

Paragraph 6 relates to the definition of an employer. One consequence of the present definition is that it has brought into SSP people who come to work in Great Britain but who technically remain non-residents either in Great Britain or in a member state of the EC. There is no liability for national insurance contributions by or in respect of such employees for the first 52 weeks of their stay in Britain. It was never intended that such people would be entitled to SSP. Amendment No. 24 will restore what was intended.

The other two amendments are consequential. As I have said, this is a tidying-up operation to correct defects and ambiguities in the current legislation.

Mrs. Beckett: I wish to make only one brief comment since we recognise that these are technical and tidying-up amendments. I note with interest that the Minister is dealing with the recovery of overpayment of statutory sick pay, but I note with sorrow that it has still not proved possible for the Government to do anything about people whose SSP has been underpaid and who have to take their own cases to court if they want to get the money.

New Clause 13

ENTITLEMENT OF MARRIED WOMEN TO CATEGORY A RETIREMENT PENSIONS

'(1) Paragraph 11 of Schedule 1 to the Social Security Act 1979 (by virtue of which the additional conditions for the entitlement of a married woman to a Category A retirement pension imposed by section 28(2) of the Social Security Act 1975 continue to apply in relation to any woman who attained pensionable age before 6th April 1979, notwithstanding the repeal of that subsection) is hereby repealed.

Subsection (1) above shall be deemed to have come into force on 22nd December 1984.'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this new clause it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 21, 99 and 103.

Mr. Newton: I hope we can take it that the strictures of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) about an earlier clause, whose purpose was to extend pension rights to certain individuals, will not be repeated in relation to this new clause which extends pension rights to an estimated 25,000 married women who were previously disadvantaged by the residual effects of something, which I shall not attempt to explain in too much detail, known as the married women's half test — namely, an additional contribution condition which married women had to fulfil over and above the normal national insurance conditions before they could enjoy a pension in their own right. That additional condition entailed them having paid the relevant amount of national insurance contribution, or having received the relevant amount of credits, for half the years between the time at which they were married and the time at which they reached age 60.

To a significant extent that rule was abolished in 1979 for all women reaching age 60 after 6 April 1979, but it has continued, and will continue, to apply, unless the amendments are passed, to women who reached age 60 before that date. In practice, the vast majority of such women will not now be suffering any financial disadvantage, because they will have picked up what are known as category B retirement pensions on their husbands' insurance when their husbands retired, but there are still some who may be disadvantaged. Most of them, because their husbands have not yet reached age 65, can receive neither a pension on his insurance nor the pension to which they would otherwise be entitled on their own insurance.

[Mr. Newton]

As I said, we estimate that there are 25,000 women in that category, together with some minor categories that I shall not attempt to cover in detail. Having reviewed the matter, and considered again the European Community's equal treatment directive and its possible application, we have decided that it is proper to seek to abolish the half test for all those women to whom it still applies, with effect from the date on which the directive came into effect —22 December 1984.

As soon as the legislation is passed, we shall undertake an exercise to identify and contact all the married women who might gain, with a view to inviting claims from them and paying to them the pension to which they would be entitled. We estimate that in benefit terms that exercise will cost about £25 million in the current financial year, but the cost should fall to nil by the end of the decade.

I hope that the House will regard this as unequivocally good news. I merely ask that those who have any influence in these matters should seek to encourage the married women who think they may gain not to contact us in a flood, but to rest on the assurance that we shall be getting in touch with them as soon as we can under the proposals that I am putting forward. If they all write to us, it will make it even more difficult to deal with this in an orderly fashion and to get the pensions into payment as soon as possible.

With those relatively few words, I warmly commend the proposals to the House in the happy spirit of a Minister for Social Security who, for once, is able to stand at the Dispatch Box and propose something which everyone in the House will regard as well deserved and generous.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): I warmly welcome the acceptance by the Government of the need to make this change in the legislation. It is right for the Minister to smile and to feel self-congratulatory. However—and I am not being niggardly—the 25,000 women who have been on the half test, many of whom have contacted hon. Members on both sides of the House with great resentment over the years, may feel that it is a little tardy. Nevertheless, the change will be most welcome. I take this as further evidence that the Government are complying, generally speaking, with all the conditions, implicit and explicit, in the EC directive on equal treatment of both sexes in regard to social security.

I shall try to ensure that people in my area do not all pound the Minister's door down at the same time, although it will be difficult to stop them. I am not sure whether I heard the Minister aright, but I think he said that he would be advertising or making it known that this change would be made. I hope that he will ensure, for example, that citizens advice bureaux as well as DHSS offices have ample supplies of leaflets. I have had many queries on this subject from CABs, and I know that they would welcome that. It might help if the Minister explained to them that they should ask women to wait until they are contacted. I only hope that it is not too long before they get the money.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I speak briefly as I have raised one or two of these cases for my constituents. I warmly welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister.

The abolition of the half test is extremely welcome. It caused great misunderstanding and resentment on the part of older women who are married to slightly younger men. They could not see why they should not be able to claim pensions in their own right, much as their sisters and sisters-in-law have done. Only married women were affected, and women were discriminated against. Indeed, I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House now feel quite strongly about that. But married women were discriminated against, since I understand that the test did not apply if the lady was living with a man and was not married to him. I doubt whether many ladies of that generation went in for that sort of thing, but it still was not right or fair.

Abolition, presumably at the cost of a comparatively small amount, will not show up much in the social security accounts where we shall spend some £40 billion this year. I warmly welcome the measure, and I look forward to similar statements on other parts of the Bill on other discriminatory elements involving married women.

Mr. Galley: My hon. Friend the Minister is to be warmly congratulated on getting rid of an injustice that has lasted for some time. It must be a unique experience for him, as the Minister for Social Security in this Government, to be congratulated by the Opposition. I should like to raise one point. If I am well off beam my hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt put me right in his normal polite fashion.

Having dealt with the half test anomaly, it seems appropriate to mention the difficulties that are now coming to the fore of the one quarter test whereby on a putative working life of 44 years so many women must have paid contributions for a quarter of their working lives. I understand that in many cases married women worked perhaps during the war years and paid a full stamp, and then married and worked only sporadically thereafter, paying half a stamp. I understand that they will not be helped by these proposals, and that the financial effects of helping those caught in the one quarter test are considerably greater. But, as things stand, there are injustices about the operation of the one quarter test.

Mr. Kirkwood: For the sake of completeness, and as I do not wish to be left out, I wish to speak briefly on what must be a unique occasion, because the Minister has introduced a welcome proposal. We also give our support and congratulations to the Minister—[Interruption.] I speak for the alliance, and have not forgotten my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy).

The half test was a pernicious piece of legislation which we have been labouring under for a long time. We will be well rid of it, and I congratulate the Government on the step that they have taken.

Mr. Newton: What can I say except "Thank you very much." However, I should like to resist the idea that this is a unique occasion and that it is the first time that I have done any good work. Nevertheless, I am grateful to hon. Members on both sides of the House, even if I suspect that some of them have half an eye on the women's vote. I certainly do not want to draw a dividing line between the two halves of the alliance in their appeal. Nor do I want to give my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) the impression that I have been frightened into action by my desire not to discriminate against her. I have certainly taken note of her representations in the past, and I thank her for her remarks.

Before coming to the more serious point raised by the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson), I should say that I will consider further the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) about the so-called quarter test. The point is that a minimum pension is 25 per cent., and anything less than that does not qualify. But with home responsibilities protection being available to married women in certain circumstances, 25 per cent. does not seem to be too unreasonable. However, I shall consider my hon. Friend's remarks.

On the question of publicity, I should point out to the hon. Member for Barking that I have a feeling that the mere announcement has done a good deal. This morning my officials told me that the first inquiry came in seven minutes after I had answered a parliamentary question on Tuesday. We have already had inquiries from citizens' advice bureaux and other quarters. This morning I did an interview, which I presume will be used, with the BBC's "Money Box" programme. It will no doubt give more publicity to that point. We shall be writing to all those —it will be most of them—whom we can identify from the computers. I do not want to promise a very elaborate publicity campaign beyond that at this stage, but we shall want to engage in further general publicity once we have contacted all those whom we can identify, with a view then to contacting those whom we have not been able to identify.

We shall certainly do everything possible to ensure that those who can claim successfully under the new clause are made aware of their entitlement, and that they are dealt with as soon as possible.

New Clause 17

Dock Workers

'(1) In section 4(7) of the Social Security Act 1975 (power to make regulations providing for reducing secondary Class 1 contributions in respect of persons to whom section 81 (redundancy payments) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 does not apply) after the word "reducing" there shall be inserted the words "primary or".

(2) In regulation 133 of the Social Security (Contributions) Regulations 1979 (reduction of primary Class 1 contributions of dock workers) for "0·35" there shall be substituted "0·25".

(3) Subsection (2) above shall be deemed to have come

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 136.

Mr. Whitney: New clause 17 takes us into rather different territory and brings us to the question of contributions by dock workers. The new clause repairs a recently discovered defect in the powers of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to vary by regulation the special rate of national insurance contributions paid by registered dock workers.

Both mariners and dock workers have their own redundancy schemes. The mariners in question pay a special rate of national insurance contributions because it is abated by that amount which other earners pay through their national insurance contributions into the state redundancy scheme. We have recently discovered that the detailed powers to alter the contributions paid by mariners and dock workers are not the same. I shall not go into the details unless the House wishes me to do so. However, subsection (1) of the new clause repairs the defect, and subsections (2) and (3) make the necessary changes to the existing regulations to reflect what has happened since April 1984, with dock workers paying the same rate as similarly placed mariners.

As I have said, the new clause, while repairing a defect in the law by removing a discrepancy in the legal provisions affecting similarly placed mariners and dock workers, will not in practice affect the amounts now being paid by dock workers; nor will it require any action by their employers.

New Clause 18

Special Hardship Allowance

'In section 60 of the Social Security Act 1975 (increase of disablement benefit for special hardship)—

(a) the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (1)—

"(1A) The Secretary of State may by regulations provide that in prescribed circumstances employed earner's employment in which a claimant was engaged when the relevant accident took place but which was not his regular occupation is to be treated as if it had been his regular occupation.";

(b) in subection (2)(a), for the words "of his" there shall be substituted the words ", except to the extent that it falls to be treated as including such an occupation by virtue of regulations under subsection (1A) above,";

(c) in subsection (6)—

(i) after the word "above", in the first place where it occurs, there shall be inserted the words "and to subsection (6A) below,"; and

(ii) for the words "his regular occupation within the meaning of subsection (1) above" there shall be substituted the words "the relevant occupation"; and

(d) the following subsections shall be inserted after that subsection—

"(6A) A person who is entitled to an increase of pension under this section by virtue of regulations under subsection (1A) above shall not be paid such an increase for any period during which he would not normally be engaged in full-time employed earner's employment.

(6B) In subsection (6) above "the relevant occupation" means—

(a) in relation to a person who is entitled to an increase of pension under this section by virtue of regulations under subsection (1A) above, the occupation in which he was engaged when the relevant accident took place; and

(b) in relation to any other person who is entitled to an increase of pension under this section, his regular occupation within the meaning of subsection (1) above.".'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I hope that this new clause will be regarded as my second bit of good work for the evening. However, the real credit for it belongs to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). I hope that she will get her reward, and that this new clause will become known as the Beckett amendment. It arises from some correspondence that I have had with the hon. Lady. I am afraid that it was accompanied by one or two hiccups, but I am glad to say that it has had a happy outcome in the appearance of this new clause.

The hon. Lady drew my attention, over a particular case, to the undesirable consequence of one aspect of the provisions governing the payment of special hardship allowance. That allowance compensates people who have suffered a reduction in earnings as a result of an accident at work. The rate of the allowance is based on the difference between present earnings and earnings in the claimant's regular occupation before the accident. An unfortunate effect of that condition is that people without a regular occupation, such as students doing vacation work, cannot qualify for the allowance.

The new clause allows us to make regulations that will enable certain types of pre-accident work to be prescribed and treated as though they had been regular occupations. Part-time and vacation jobs done by students or school children are examples of what we intend to cover.

The result will be an increase in benefit of up to £23·36 a week for the small number of disabled people who were injured at work before they had a chance to establish themselves in regular occupation. We shall be concerned primarily with those in full-time work, whatever occupation it may be.

I am very grateful to the hon. Lady for raising the matter. It is great credit to her that she pursued it in the way that she did. I hope that she is pleased that the Government have been able to respond in this way.

Mrs. Beckett: I feel that I ought almost to declare an interest in this new clause. I am extremely grateful to the Minister, in particlar for what he has done for the young man to whose case I drew his attention. I also thank him for his kind observations on the case. Fortunately, it is the kind of case which happens infrequently. In this case a schoolboy was properly working on a farm. When he left school he intended to be a full-time farmworker and the farmer had every intention of employing him. That was agreed at his appeal by the commissioner. Only the phraseology of the legislation prevented him from being given what everybody agreed was the compensation that he deserved for an unforeseen accident.

I am extremely grateful to the Minister for making this change. I am also sure that the young man involved, whose name is Timothy Pallister, will be grateful. So, indeed, will my union, the Transport and General Workers Union. To receive its thanks may be an even more rare event for the Minister.

New Clause 19

AMENDMENTS RELATING TO PROTECTION OF PENSIONS

'(1) In subsection (1) of section 41A of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 (protection of earners' pensions), the following words shall be substituted for the words from "than" to the end—

"(i) in a case where by virtue of paragraph 9(2)(b) of Schedule 16 to the Social Security Act 1973 a pension is provided by way of complete substitute for short service benefit, than the weekly rate of that pension; and

(ii) in other case, than the relevant aggregate.".

(2) The following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (1B) of that section—

"(1C) In subsection (1) above "the relevant aggregate" means the aggregate of the following—

(a) the relevant sum;

(b) the excess mentioned in subsection (1)(c) above; and

(c) any amount which is an appropriate addition at the time in question.".

(3) In subsection (1) of section 41B of that Act (protection of widows' pensions), the following words shall be substituted for the words from "than" to the end—

"(i) in a case where by virtue of paragraph 9(2)(b) of Schedule 16 to the Social Security Act 1973 a pension is provided by way of complete substitute for a widow's pension, than the weekly rate of the pension so provided; and

(ii) in any other case, than the relevant aggregate.".

(4) The following subsection shall be inserted after that subsection—

"(1A) In subsection (1) above "the relevant aggregate" means the aggregate of the following—

(a) the relevant sum;

(b) the excess mentioned in subsection (1)(c) above; and

(c) any amount which is an appropriate addition at the time in question.".

(5) In subsection (3) of that section, for the words "assumption specified in subsection (4) below" there shall be substituted the words "prescribed assumptions".

(6) Regulations under that subsection may be framed so as to have effect as from 1st January 1985.'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 129, 130, 131, 134 and 135.

Mr. Whitney: With this new clause we enter the mysterious world of franking. Anybody who takes a regular interest in occupational pension matters will recall just how complicated these provisions were in the legislation that was passed in 1984. We found that there were certain defects in the provisions. This caused us to try to remedy those defects. Inevitably they are of a technical and complicated nature, but I shall be as brief and clear as possible about what is inevitably a very complex subject.

Sections 41A to E of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 were inserted by last year's Health and Social Security Act. That legislation overrode scheme rules, which means that it had a direct effect upon schemes. Certain scheme rules were not overridden. These are known as protected provisions. Included in these was the rule that early leavers could be provided with an alternative to what is described as short-term benefit, by which is meant the preserved pension entitlement due to the early leaver under section 9(2) of the 1973 Act.

The intention was that in these cases schemes would give the alternative and not have to provide any extra anti-franking benefit at state pension age. Beneficiaries would be able to ensure that any increased value in their benefit rights was reflected in the alternative, because generally these alternatives can be given only with the member's consent. We now find that where the alternative is a pension in the same scheme — for example, a smaller pension paid earlier — there is still a requirement to provide at state pension age an anti-franking increase. That was never our intention.

The new clause will ensure that in these cases no anti-franking increase need be paid when the member reaches state pensionable age. Our intention is that the increased value required to give protection against franking should be reflected in the amount of pension put into payment in the first place.

Further minor problems are dealt with in the new clause. Section 41B of the 1975 Act requires the schemes to make an assumption to enable them to calculate the amount of widow's pension due, but it is drafted in a restrictive manner to prevent other assumptions being made. The new proposal allows for a relaxation of that restriction so that other assumptions can be made in the calculation of the benefit. I commend the new clause to the House.

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that we are back to our usual slightly less charitable mood. I noted with interest the Minister's remarks that those who follow our debates will get regular doses of anti-franking. That is not quite how he put it, but that is what is involved.

These proposals were first discussed in Committee on the Health and Social Security Bill of 1984. They were amended on Report. They were amended during the proceedings in Committee on the present Social Security Bill. They are being amended again on Report, and no doubt they will be amended again in another place as the Government seek to get their legislation right. However, we are becoming inured to the fact that these proposals are perpetually to be found in Social Security Bills.

I make only one other observation. If I understand correctly the clause and the amendments that go with it, the Government are at least being consistent about their proposals for personal portable pensions in removing the protection of a guaranteed minimum pension and encouraging people to stand on their own feet. The alternative formula gives them freedom, but it conveys the idea that they are being given the freedom to lose rather than to gain benefits. However, it is obviously quite consistent for this to be part of the anti-franking measures. From that point of view, we do not question it.

New Clause 20

ENTITLEMENT TO BENEFIT DEPENDENT ON CLAIM

'The following section shall be inserted immediately before section 166 of the Social Security Act 1975—

"General provision as to necessity of claim for entitlement to benefit

165A.—(1) Except in such cases as may be prescribed, no person shall be entitled to any benefit unless, in addition to any other conditions relating to that benefit being satisfied—

(a) he makes a claim for it—

(i) in the prescribed manner; and

(ii) subject to subsection (2) below, within the prescribed time; or

(b) by virtue of a provision of Chapter VI of Part II of this Act or of regulations made under such a provision he is treated as making a claim for it.

(2) Regulations shall provide for extending, subject to any prescribed conditions, the time within which a claim may be made in cases where it is not made within the prescribed time but good cause is shown for the delay.

(3) Notwithstanding any regulations made under this section, no person shall be entitled—

(a) to a maternity grant in respect of a confinement occurring more than 12 months before the date on which the claim is made;

(b) to a death grant in respect of a death occurring more than 12 months before the date on which the claim is made;

(c) to any other benefit (except disablement benefit or industrial death benefit) in respect of any period more than 12 months before the date on which the claim is made.".'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 161, 162, 163, 164, 165 and 166.

Mr. Newton: This new clause and the associated amendments amend various provisions of the 1975 Act to provide that, generally speaking, a person shall not be regarded as entitled to benefit unless a claim has been made within the prescribed time limit. Until a recent judgment of the House of Lords on 22 November 1984, it had always been our understanding—not simply that of the present Government but that of all Governments for many years past—that that was precisely what the law meant. But in the case in question which concerned a claim for non-contributory invalidity pension from a Miss Margaret McCaffrey, their Lordships held that entitlement to benefit would exist even where no claim had in fact been made.

Although the McCaffrey judgment referred specifically to non-contributory invalidity pension, the decision has wider social security implications. The object of this new clause is therefore to restore the law on entitlement to what we always thought it to be before their Lordships' judgment—an understanding which, as I have already said, had existed among Administrations of both complexions at least back to the start of the national insurance scheme in 1948.

Mrs. Beckett: I noted everything that the Minister said about the McCaffrey judgment, but am I not right in thinking that in putting forward this new clause the Government have taken the opportunity to reduce from 18 to 12 months the period during which death grant can be claimed?

Mr. Newton: Certainly that was not done intentionally or as an act of ministerial decision. The hon. Lady, with her characteristic scalpel-like precision, has asked me a question that I had not even thought of. Unless inspiration comes quickly—I see that my officials are looking just as mystified as I am—all I can say is that, if by chance the Government have inadvertently brought about the effect suggested by the hon. Lady, I shall consider what can be done about it. I have now been told what I had already guessed — that my officials need to check.

[Mr. Newton]

However, if by inadvertence we have brought about the effect suggested by the hon. Lady, I shall metaphorically take my hat off to her and see what can be done about it. I cannot say anything else to help the hon. Lady now and I hope that she will not hold up the proceedings for too long on the acute point that she has made.

New clause 21

OTHER REGULATIONS

'(1) Section 141(2) of the Social Security Act 1975 (reference of regulations to Industrial Injuries Advisory Council) and section 10(1) of the Social Security Act 1980 (reference of regulations to Social Security Advisory Committee) shall not apply—

(a) to regulations made under any of sections 45(2A), 45A(3), 46(4), 47(1A), 49 and 66(3) and (4) of the Social Security Act 1975 before the expiry of the period of 6 months beginning with the commencement of section 7 above;

(b) subject to subsection (5) below, to regulations made under section 84(4) of that Act, before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the passing of this Act; or

(c) to regulations made under section 16 below before the expiry of the period of 6 months beginning with the commencement of any relevant provision of this Act.

(2) The reference in subsection (1)(a) above to the commencement of section 7 above is a reference, in relation to any regulations, to the commencement of that section so far as it relates to the provision under which the regulations are made.

(3) Section 167(3) of the Social Security Act 1975 (negative procedure for regulations) shall not apply to the first regulations under any of the provisions of that Act mentioned in subsection (1)(a) above.

(4) The Secretary of State shall not make any such regulations unless a draft of the regulations has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(5) Subsection (1)(b) above does not apply to regulations made under section 84(4) of the Social Security Act 1975 which could have been made if that subsection had not been amended by section 7 above.

(6) The reference in subsection (1)(c) above to a relevant provision of this Act is a reference to a provision of this Act which the statutory instrument containing the regulations states is a provision—

(a) in connection with the coming into force of which the Secretary of State considers it necessary or expedient to make the regulations; or

(b) which repeals or amends an enactment in connection with the operation of which the Secretary of State considers it necessary or expedient to make the regulations.

(7) Section 141(2) of the Social Security Act 1975 shall not apply to regulations—

(a) made under section 60(1A) of the Social Security Act 1975 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Special hardship allowance] above; or

(b) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Special hardship allowance] above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on that section or such provisions and regulations made under section 60(1A) of the Social Security Act 1975.

(8) Section 10(1) of the Social Security Act 1980 shall not apply to regulations—

(a) made under section 4(6A) or (6D) or 13(5A) of the Social Security Act 1975 or section 6(5A) of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Calculation of contributions] above;

(b) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Calculation of contributions] above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on that section or such provisions and regulations made under section 4(6A) or (6D) or 13(5A) of the Social Security Act 1975 or section 6(5A) of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975;

(c) made under section 15A of the Social Security Act 1975 or section 2(3A) or 3(4A) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section 9 above;

(d) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section 9 above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on that section or such provisions and regulations made under any provision inserted by it in the Social Security Act 1975 or the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982;

(e) made under section 9(1A) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section 10 above;

(f) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section 10 above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on subsection (1) of that section or such provisions and regulations made under section 9(1A) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982;

(g) made under section 22(8) of the Social Security Act 1975 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of paragraph 2 of Schedule [Miscellaneous amendments relating to statutory sick pay] to this Act;

(h) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of paragraph 2 of Schedule [Miscellaneous amendments relating to statutory sick pay] to this Act and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on the exercise of the power conferred by virtue of that paragraph or such provisions and regulations made under section 22(8) of the Social Security Act 1975;

(j) made under section 165A(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Entitlement to benefit dependent on claim] above;

(k) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Entitled to benefit dependent on claim] above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on that section or such provisions and regulations made under section 165A(1) of the Social Security Act 1975;

(l) made under section 17(2A) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Medical evidence] above;

(m) made under any enactment before the expiry of the period of six months beginning with the commencement of section [Medical evidence] above and contained in a statutory instrument which states that it contains only provisions consequential on the exercise of the power conferred by virtue of that section or such provisions and regulations made under section 17(2A) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982.' — [Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 142.

Mr. Newton: The new clause simply provides that regulations made under powers taken in the Bill are not to be referred to the Social Security Advisory Committee or to the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council if made within six months of Royal Assent or of the operative date of the relevant clause. If that sounds in any way disturbing, I should point out that, as I am sure the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) is aware, this is normal procedure when the basic purposes of the proposals are set out in the primary legislation and discussed by the House. In those circumstances, it is normal for the subsequent regulations not to be referred to the SSAC or the IIAC.

I should state specifically, however, that the first set of regulations about dependency increases will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. In the ordinary way they would be subject to the negative procedure, but as the House has not had the opportunity to discuss the details in this instance it will have that opportunity to do so when we bring forward the proposals.

New clause 1

DEFINITION OF THE TERM 'PRESCRIBED'

'Where in any provision of this Act (including provisions amending other Acts) the Secretary of State is empowered to prescribe any thing he shall do so by regulations made by statutory instrument; and no such instrument may be made unless a draft of it has been laid before, and approved by resolution of, both Houses of Parliament.'.—[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I have already made a number of fairly strong observations about the way in which the Bill is being handled by the Department and I need not repeat them now. We alluded several times in Committee to the complexity of the matters covered by the Bill and to the wide-ranging effects of many of the provisions in the Bill or clearly in prospect.

In this complex field, it would be quite wrong for the House to abdicate responsibility for supervising what the Department is doing, especially in relation to occupational pensions. I have campaigned for many years for reform of the law in this area, but the Department has not made any strong response to the arguments advanced by me and by others far better qualified to do so. That being so, I am not satisfied that the Department's intentions and the pace of reform are in line with public opinion. I therefore regret that throughout the Bill powers are taken to allow the Department to take charge of the legislation when, in practical terms, Parliament will have withdrawn from the scene.

The newspapers today confidently predict that the state earnings-related pensions scheme is to be abolished. I do not disagree with such a policy, but if the state scheme is abolished private sector schemes will bear the whole burden of earnings-related provision. In those circumstances, it is even more important that the law relating to such schemes should be thoroughly satisfactory. I do not believe that the law will be satisfactory unless Parliament — or at any rate those Members who are seriously interested in the subject, which may not be very many—has the opportunity to scrutinise and comment upon the Department's activities in this respect.

The present state of the law is most unsatisfactory. Many contributors pay good money in over a lifetime of work but get bad money out because of currency depreciation. Pension funds could protect contributors to a far greater extent, but they are not called upon to do so and the Department has shown itself to be quite satisfied with that very disappointing situation. In many cases, early leavers are obliged to sacrifice a large part of their entitlement because the rules of the scheme of their employer in the first instance have not been amended. The fact that early leavers do not get a fair deal under present legislation has been talked about for years, but nothing of substance has been done to put things right and the Bill only begins to deal with it with effect from the present year.

On the other hand, the people who remain in occupational schemes are obliged very often to participate in final salary schemes which have the effect of transferring resources from lower-paid to higher-paid members of the scheme. That is intrinsically wrong and should not be countenanced by Parliament. I appreciate that in many schemes, and in public sector schemes, the employer's contribution is so generous that the employees have no cause for complaint, whether the calculations are made on a final salary basis or on the personal build-up of entitlement; but in far too many schemes the low paid subsidise the higher paid, and that should not be allowed to continue.

If the Bill goes through as drafted, I am not confident that all the references it contains to the Department having power to take responsibility will lead to any significant improvement in the near future.

Our economy rests on the belief that saving is worthwhile. Parliament must not allow a general belief to grow up to the effect that there is no point in saving because one either loses one's resources through depreciation or people who are cleverer than oneself will use them to suit themselves and not give one a fair deal. It is quite wrong for Parliament to allow such an inadequate and unfair situation to continue.

I should not like it to be thought that I regard all occupational pension schemes as inadequate and unfair. Many employers make handsome contributions to their employees' retirement pensions. Nevertheless, a very large number of schemes are entirely inadequate and the rules protecting the rights of employees are utterly insufficient. Somebody must protest if Parliament is asked to hand over power to deal with that situation to a Department which lacks the drive and the energy to put matters right. Parliament must not leave such matters to the Department without having a proper opportunity to supervise and discuss what the Department has it in mind to do.

Mr. Newton: I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) will not take it amiss if I say that I am in some difficulty as to whether to reply to what the new clause says or to the rather broader thrust of his arguments about occupational pensions generally. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will forgive me if I comment briefly on the broader issue. I think that it is a little unfair to accuse the Department of being essentially inert and not to take account of the substantial changes that have taken place in occupational pensions legislation—not least those in the Bill—many of which are in the direction urged by my hon. Friend for some time and reflect considerable credit on his effort and application in this area over many years.

It is not for me to predict in this debate, any more than in earlier debates, the outcome of the Government's current review of social security provision and financial provision for retirement generally, but my hon. Friend may rest assured that his views do not go unremarked in our consideration of these matters. I hope that he will understand if I cannot say much more about the general issues.

The new clause essentially concerns whether the regulations required to implement the proposals in the Bill — the primary legislation — should be subject to the affirmative rather than the negative resolution procedure. Knowing my hon. Friend's views on this and having listened carefully to him in Committee, I considered the possibilities open to us to move in that direction on Report, and it is with some reluctance that I find myself unable to move towards him—not because I believe that he has made an overwhelming case, but because my natural inclination is to try to please him, and indeed all hon. Members, if I possibly can. I regret, however, that in this instance I cannot do so.

I have before me several passages reproduced from the report of the Joint Committee on Delegated Legislation in the 1972-73 Session. I shall not weary the House by reading them out, unless I am pressed further, but those passages, with other precedents that I have examined, persuade me that we are acting entirely properly and in line with precedents over a long period in proposing that the regulations should be subject to the negative rather than to the affirmative procedure and that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington is being somewhat unfair in suggesting that this in some way overrides the normal way in which the Government should deal with Parliament. Nevertheless, in acknowledgement of my hon. Friend's strength of feeling, I should like to tell him that, whenever I am able to meet him on this issue, I shall try to do so. I am afraid that I cannot do that today for a variety of reasons, most of which are practical.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. He was conciliatory and, because I am confident that his mind is moving in the right direction in regard to occupational pensions, I do not wish to say more. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 4

POWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE TO AWARD INCREMENTS TO SMALL FIRMS

The Secretary of State may award additional adjustable payments to firms with less than 20 employees for the purpose of financing their statutory sick pay schemes. — [Mr. Kennedy.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.30 pm

Mr. Kennedy: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Although this issue is not insignificant, I appreciate the practical limitations within which Ministers must work and I merely wish to draw attention to a problem which was highlighted by a recent report entitled "Burdens on Business." Any relief from the administrative complexities facing small businesses is welcome.

The Secretary of State's original announcement came as a bolt from the blue for many small business men and the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses. It was proposed to extend statutory sick pay to 28 days. Having had discussions with those affected, the Secretary of State was able to announce relief from national insurance contributions for 12 months from the passing of this legislation. That was in recognition of the extra burdens—[Interruption.] I do not know whether the ringing of Division bells indicates a split in the alliance. I do not know whether the bell tolls for me or for the Minister. We shall see. It is a more musical accompaniment than we are used to.

The relief that the Government announced was welcome. I am now seeking additional relief for small businesses. I am the first to admit that my definition is arbitrary.

In January 1984, my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) wrote to the then Minister for Social Security inquiring whether the Government planned to extend statutory sick pay from eight weeks to 13 weeks. The Minister replied that he could give an assurance that there were no plans to extend the period covered. I realise that one Minister cannot bind another, but when my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) wrote to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in February this year about the extension which had by then been announced and which ran contrary to what the Government said one year earlier, the Minister replied:

"the DHSS maintain that the extension has several advantages. They consider that it will further reduce the overlap of some employers' contributory sick pay schemes with State sickness benefit; further reduce the effect of the anomaly whereby State sickness benefit is not taxable; and finally, produce valuable public expenditure savings together with some savings in DHSS staff. As you will know, a major element of our economic strategy is to control the size of the public sector in order to free resources to the private sector."

The difficulty for small businesses, especially self-employed small businesses, is that the statutory sick pay scheme involves considerable extra paperwork. I have in mind the type of business which is prevalent in my constituency. The absence of a member of staff can leave just one person with all the additional work and the administrative work for statutory sick pay. The arrangements can create a bad cash flow in winter, there can be bureaucratic complications, and they can work against the interests of the chronically sick.

I am aware that the Minister might not be able to accept the wording of my new clause. As I said, I would not go to the wall about the level being set at 20 employees. I am merely raising a genuine problem and trying to decrease the administrative burden on small businesses. I suggest reimbursement for the paperwork involved as more than 90 per cent. of small businesses probably have 10 or fewer employees and are run by self-employed employers. Such people would benefit from the new clause.

Two other means of highlighting the problem were suggested to me. One was to draw up bands of exemptions for those who would not have to do the administrative work. Such a system immediately creates anomalies. The other was to exempt all self-employed employers from the statutory sick pay scheme. There are problems with both suggestions, and I do not pretend that mine is perfect. I hope that the Minister will be constructive and express his thinking on this matter.

Mr. Whitney: I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), not least through the problems of the bell. As he asked the question, I remind him:

"never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

I cannot accept the new clause. The Government are deeply conscious of the importance of not putting extra and unnecessary burdens and controls on employers. The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to refer to the report which has recently been published entitled "Burdens on Business," which makes several important recommendations about removing burdens on businesses, especially small businesses.

This is an area that has been pursued with great vigour by the Government—a campaign in the charge of my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio, who is leading a co-ordinated initiative that the Government will follow up. That examination will include the operation of the SSP scheme. No decisions have been taken at this stage, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall be consulting employers' representatives and others in due course on the matters affecting SSP in that report.

I hope that the House will understand, therefore, that we are not unsympathetic to the case that the hon. Gentleman has advanced. However, some problems arise from the hon. Gentleman's proposition. He set the limit at those firms with fewer than 20 employees. That would cover 80 per cent. of employers, which would be a burden.

Mr. Kennedy: They are voters.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Gentleman may need votes, but our intention is to take a sensible decision about lightening the burden on businesses and getting the balance right.

An employer's major expenditure on SSP is, of course, the amount that he actually pays out. But, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the whole of that is recoverable. The employer simply deducts any SSP he has paid from the total payment of national insurance contributions, or, if necessary, PAYE tax, which he makes to the collector of taxes each month. It is a very simple system, which I believe has worked extremely well.

I founded a small business and operated it before I joined the Government. Therefore, I can confirm that the scheme did not cause anything like the problems that we expected. I believe that that has been the reaction of most businesses, large and small, throughout the country.

We believe that the impact of the extension from eight to 28 weeks will not be anything like as great as some people have suggested. Almost 90 per cent. of all sickness spells last for less than eight weeks and are already covered by the present scheme. The average amount of sickness per employee is only about 10 days per year, so the additional work for most employers will not be extensive.

However, in recognition of the extension of the burden on employers we propose to compensate them for the cost of the secondary insurance contributions that they pay on SSP. That will apply not only to the extended part of SSP, but to the whole period for which SSP is paid. The calculation is that that will be worth up to £60 million a year to employers. That is a very significant concession, and we do not believe that there is a justification for making additional payments to selected employers, depending on their size, who may or may not experience some extra cost as a result of the extension. The proposal is that the compensation payment will operate retrospectively from this month — a full year ahead of the extension. That will help all employers with their costs and it is the fairest course to take.

We believe that the burden has not been as great as was originally feared. The majority of employers have got down to operating the SSP scheme and have found it a great deal simpler than they expected.

While sharing the spirit in which the hon. Gentleman moved his new clause—that we must do all we can to maintain the lightest possible burden on employers, great and small, for the employment benefits of which we are all conscious — I do not believe that there is any justification for going further than the Government have proposed.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Minister for his constructive response. I was interested to learn that he started out as a small business man who is now in very big business.

In view of his comments and assurances about the Government recognising the burdens on small businesses and the administrative and financial burdens that can result from operating the SSP scheme, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 5

EXCEPTIONALLY SEVERE WEATHER PAYMENTS

'(1) The Supplementary Benefit Commission, in exercise of their power under section 3(1) of the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976, shall pay single payments to meet the fuel costs of any assessment unit where they are greater than the amount which has been put aside to pay for them because a period of exceptionally severe weather has resulted in consumption greater than normal; having regard to any available information in previous levels of consumption.

(2) The amount payable under subsection (1) above shall be the cost of the amount of excess over normal consumption.

(3) Single payments paid under subsection (1) above shall be calculated for all regions of England, Scotland and Wales on a common trigger-point established with reference to the data compiled by the meteorological office for the weather station at Plymouth.—[Mr. Kirkwood.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

7.45 pm

The Minister, having studied the new clause for two or three months, will realise that some of the points of the clause have disappeared since the weather has changed. Indeed, in politics we are often accused of changing our policies with the weather. I understood that the Bill would be reported to the House some weeks ago. Indeed, I expected it to be reported just at the time when there was the stramash about the trigger point being reached in the southern and western parts of the country for exceptionally severe weather payments.

I tabled the new clause because I wish to draw attention to the absurdity that has caused a tremendous amount of heartache and distress in the northern reaches of the country about the perceived injustice of certain parts of the country being paid different levels of grant and having different trigger points for exceptionally severe weather payments, depending on the ambient temperatures.

People in the north and in Scotland felt that the fact that they were expected to endure much lower consistent annual ambient temperatures than people in the south was entirely unfair. The Minister knows that that has been referred to frequently in the House in Adjournment debates, questions to the Prime Minister and questions to the Minister who is to reply to this debate. I wish to take this opportunity to reinforce the antipathy that was expressed when the trigger points for exceptionally severe weather payments were reached. I accept that there are deficiencies in the new clause, and I shall be happy to ask leave to withdraw it when I have heard the Minister's reply.

The position has been compounded by the Prime Minister saying that the Government are spending more than ever on heating additions. Many figures have been bandied about. People in the north and in Scotland are well aware that more money has been spent on heating additions, but the reason for that has been that more people than ever before have qualified for them. That has put salt in the wound.

In addition, some weeks ago it became clear that the electricity and gas industries, because of the external financing limit policy being imposed by the Government, were paying more than necessary for the energy required to heat homes. That produced a great deal of bad feeling in the north and in Scotland. I hope that the Government recognise that and will take the opportunity this evening to say so.

I recognise that there are many difficulties in trying to achieve a sensible and equitable exceptionally severe weather payment scheme — such as humidities, wind forces and seaboard as opposed to inland locations. I am certain that that is fiendishly difficult. However, I hope that the Minister will accept the principle that low temperatures are low temperatures wherever they are. If the scheme is to continue, it must recognise that.

I hope that the Minister will say a few words about the position when such schemes as this are buried not only in the detail of secondary legislation but in the S manual procedures. When I began to study what was happening with these payments, I found myself among the pages of the S manual. It is difficult when primary legislation produces secondary legislation which spawns regulations buried in the S manual. I hope that there will be no need in future schemes for anything of that sort.

Will the Minister say, albeit retrospectively, how the exceptionally severe weather payments scheme has worked in practice? He may not be able to say how much was given in, say, the west country and the home counties and how many applicants overall received payments, but it would be helpful to have information of that type so as to know whether the scheme could be salvaged.

I am sure that the Minister will have studied the terms of the Social Security (Cold Climate Allowance) Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). I was happy to be a sponsor of that measure, which was designed to deal with the cold climate situation in the north and in Scotland.

The new clause was designed to highlight a discrepancy that existed at the time when I thought Report and Third Reading would take place, before the Chancellor of the Exchequer put the Bill in cold storage, so to speak, until he could include the national insurance contributions aspect. Nevertheless, it has been useful to rehearse some of the arguments on the subject. I hope that the Minister will comment on any proposals he may have to change the arrangements for the exceptionally severe weather payments scheme.

Mr. Kennedy: Given the geographical location of my constituency, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without speaking in full support of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

I agree with my hon. Friend that if the Government were not aware of the fact when they embarked on the scheme of trigger payments, it must have come home to them by now that few issues could have caused such massive nationalistic—I use the word in its best sense rather than in any political way—sentiment across the political spectrum in Scotland. The odd exception may have been the moving of football matches at short notice, but that is not this Minister's problem.

It has been nothing short of scandalous the way in which severe weather payments have been made available in some parts of the country and not in others. A Conservative Member, who had better remain nameless, told me of a classic case that occurred in his constituency, which is also towards the north of Scotland. An elderly lady went to the south of England to spend a few weeks with her married daughter. Her pension was transferred so that she could collect it during the weeks of her holidays on the south-east coast of England.

When the weather turned severe, she arrived at the post office to collect her pension, and was also given a severe weather allowance. She was given that allowance in the south of England, where it was about 10 degrees warmer than in her home town, where—had she been there—she would not have received a penny. That was crazy. The Government have accepted that it was a bizarre situation and needs review.

I endorse what my hon. Friend said about the scheme's review. We hope that in trying to improve it, the rumours that have been circulating—one suspects at the behest of the Treasury—to the effect that a change will merely mean the scheme being scrapped or suffering a considerable clawback will prove to be unfounded. I hope that our fears about that can be allayed.

The Minister has said on several occasions that there is a difference between an exceptionally severe weather payment and a cold climate allowance. As my hon. Friend and I have been sponsors of the Social Security (Cold Climate Allowance) Bill on the two occasions when it has been introduced—I was also a member of the delegation which saw the Minister on the subject—I hope that, while I appreciate that a distinction exists, the Minister will have some encouraging words to say tonight.

The fact that the meteorological office for the weather station at Plymouth has been chosen for this proposal is, I am sure, pure coincidence and is not an example of organised politics at work.

Mrs. Beckett: We, too, are concerned about the many problems that exist for people who need recompense for their heating bills. The operation of the exceptionally severe weather payments scheme has been the most recent, most inexplicable and perhaps most scandalous example of such problems.

It is clear that more and more people are having difficulty meeting their fuel bills. As the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) pointed out, the problem has been exacerbated by the deliberate policy, both before and since the last election, of forcing up gas and electricity charges, despite Conservative assurances that that would not happen.

Reference has been made to the anger that has been caused, particularly in areas such as Scotland, by the operation of the severe weather allowance. The hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will agree that just as much anger has been felt by pensioners over the operation of the available scale margin deduction, under which many pensioners became entitled to heating allowance, only to discover that, having managed to satisfy the conditions to receive allowance, some of it was removed from them.

In recent weeks there has been a reduction in the standing charge concession which had been given to pensioners and small users of gas and electricity. Wherever we look we seem to see a retrenchment, rather than an expansion, in the help that people are given to meet their heating costs at times when their needs increase.

I echo the hope of the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye that rumours that the social security review will simplify the procedure essentially by abolishing most of the help that has been available will prove to be unfounded and that, when the review is published, we shall be able to welcome the action that the Government are taking.

Mr. Whitney: I note with interest that this is one occasion when hon. Members speaking on behalf of the Liberal party and the SDP are in agreement, and on this issue they are in agreement with the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), speaking for the Labour party.

I agree with the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) that this has been a matter of great concern in Scotland. It would be an insensitive Sassenach — certainly an insensitive Minister in my Department — who was not aware of that. I am glad, therefore, to put yet again the facts of the case, and I hope that they will be noted, especially by the people of Scotland.

The first point to get into perspective is that the major help for those on low incomes to cover their day-to-day expenses, including fuel expenses, is given through the supplementary benefits system. I remind the House that the scale rates for that benefit increased in real terms by about 6 per cent. between November 1978 and November 1984. In other words, for pensioners and others on supplementary benefit, there has been that increase, of which the Government are justifiably proud.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) spoke of the heating addition. We take pride in the fact that there have been increases in the heating addition payments. Those payments have reached £400 million a year, representing an increase in real terms of £140 million above that spent in the last year of the Labour Administration, of which the hon. Member for Derby, South was a member.

Reference has been made to fuel charges. I agree that they have increased, but those increases pale into insignificance compared with the increases in fuel charges that we suffered under the last Labour Government. Against the increases in fuel prices that have taken place during the period of this Government, increases in heating additions in real terms have amounted to 20 per cent. It is important to set the exceptionally severe weather payment system against the background of the important and real increases in support to low-income families that the Government have provided.

8 pm

The exceptionally severe weather payment system was an attempt to even out the exceptional budget problems of those on low incomes and tight budgets and was not related directly to actual temperatures. That was the objective system that we sought to establish. Earlier systems had been subjective and complicated and it was thought that something that established objective criteria would be more easily understood and more easily accepted. Of course there are differences in average ambient outside temperatures throughout the country. I believe that I am right in saying that for the purposes of the exceptionally severe weather payment system Birmingham or Suffolk has to be colder than Glasgow. There is no victimisation against Scotland. We have attempted to use objectively the scientific data available.

The Government have accepted that the system has not been understood and we accept that it is not satisfactory. As I said to the House on 12 March, we have decided that changes should be made before next winter. It is too early for me to say what those changes will be, but I repeat that assurance to the House.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 14

INVALID CARE ALLOWANCE FOR MARRIED WOMEN

"In the Social Security Act 1975, in section 37(3), leave out "and a woman shall not be entitled to any such allowance if—

(a) she is married and either—

(i) she is residing with her husband or

(ii) he is contributing to her maintenance at a weekly rate not less than the weekly rate of such an allowance; or

(b) she and a man to whom she is not married are living together as husband and wife.".'.—[Mrs. Beckett.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The Opposition decided to table the new clause before we were aware of the new clause that the Government intended to introduce on the same issue. However, the two new clauses on the half test go neatly side by side. As I understand it, the Government were not obliged by the European directive to take the action that they did on the test. Both the half test and the invalid care allowance test are discriminatory against women generally and married women especially. We hope that the precedent that the Government have set will be one which they will be eager to follow.

The Minister sought to argue in Committee that the invalid care allowance was not covered by the directive in the same way as the half test. He may have been mistaken in saying that. He argued that looking after an invalid was a risk which was not covered by the directive because it was only one's own direct invalidity to which the directive could possibly apply. If invalidity is incurred by someone other than the potential recipient of the invalid care allowance, the directive does not state that invalid care allowance is thereby excluded or that carers should not be covered. That is the conclusion which the Minister drew from the way in which the directive had been drafted.

The basis of the directive and of the judgment which we feel that the Government should make is that invalidity interrupts capacity to work. That applies to the person who is made an invalid and to the person who is in the position of having to draw the invalid care allowance.

I draw the Minister's attention to an appeal which was upheld on 1 March. I understand that the tribunal was chaired by the new president of the social security tribunal. The Minister commended him to us as a man of sound judgment when we were in Committee last year, so I am sure that he will be only too happy to accept his judgment. Under the president's chairmanship the tribunal ruled that the equal opportunity directive covers the invalid care allowance. It awarded the benefit to the lady who brought the case, Mrs. Drake.

I believe that the chief social security commissioner has chosen to refer the hearing to the European Court. I want to know what the implications are for Government policy and what the Government now have in mind. How many women are now thought to be eligible for the invalid care allowance? I should like the Minister to give us the latest figures that are available to him. What does he anticipate will be the cost of extending the allowance to those who are now barred from claiming it? It has been suggested since the Drake case—we believe that this should be publicised — that women should make a claim in anticipation of a decision from the European Court. Of those women who are eligible to make a claim, how many have done so? That is relevant in the light of an earlier new clause in which reference was made to the McCaffrey case, in which it was made clear that the date of the claim was crucial in determining entitlement. The Government are taking steps to ensure that people are not able to claim the allowance merely because they are entitled to it. We advise anyone who thinks that he or she might be eligible to claim the allowance now.

Caring for an invalid involves substantial cost. It is suggested that it costs about £4,000 a year to care for a mentally handicapped child. It was suggested even five years ago that it cost £6,000 a year to care for a demented elderly person. That does not take account of the fact that such individuals often lose state benefits to which they might have been entitled if they had to move in with members of their family because of invalidity.

Against the background of these costs and pressures on families, we ask the Government to tell us what action they propose to take if, as seems likely, the European Court's judgment goes against them.

Mr. Galley: Concern about the invalid care allowance is shared by many of my right and hon. Friends. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security is aware of this, but it seems appropriate to reiterate the fact in the hope that he will seek to tackle the anomalies in the spirit of reform in which he has approached his job.

One of the most startling injustices remaining in our social security system is that the invalid care allowance is not available to married women regardless of for whom they care while it is available to all other carers. This places an unfair burden on a dedicated group. There is an increasing unfairness because more and more married women are working. It is essentially an earnings replacement allowance.

My right hon. Friend might reasonably say that that would not be an applicable argument in every case, but it is right that many married women who care for invalid spouses or others are forgoing earnings and should be entitled to the allowance.

We are trying to develop initiatives for caring in the community. Care involves a wide variety of options and one of them is care at home. It is right that many of those who are mentally ill or mentally handicapped, or invalids for other reasons, are much better off by staying at home and receiving care than by being in an institution. We must seek to make it easier for these people who stay at home if that is at all possible. The fact that the invalid care allowance is not available to married women causes more people to go into institutions. I do not wish to advance my main argument on a financial stance, but the economic considerations must be considered. It may cost the Health Service less if more money is put into invalid care and extended to married women.

I understand that the latest estimate of the cost of extending the invalid care allowance to married women is £85 million. This week my hon. Friend the Minister has found a fairly substantial sum of money to deal with the half test. Last year he found a reasonably substantial sum of money to deal with anomalies in the housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension scheme and improved that by the severe disablement allowance. Therefore, he has a good record of reform and I hope that he will give this matter some considerable priority as his next step.

We all have our favourite shopping list within the social security budget for change and reform. I should like to see this reform accepted by my hon. Friend as being pretty well near the top of the list. He might consider it when he looks at the whole matter of social security and the making of savings in other areas. To right that injustice should be a priority when new resources become available as a result of reviews.

Mr. Kennedy: In the same spirit of all-party support that greeted some of the announcements made by the Minister this evening, may I complete the all-party pressure on the Minister to come forward with further good news? If he cannot do that tonight, I hope that he will at least give us a sign that he is moving in that direction.

I fully agree with the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and with her new clause and with the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). Surely the case now is overwhelming for the extension of invalid care allowance to married women. It is worth emphasising that all too often we take for granted within the welfare state the fact that, without the informal network of care, often free from institutions or direct institutional production or support mechanisms, we would indeed be talking about a crisis in the welfare state of a proportion that no hon. Member would suggest exists at the moment. Heaven knows, we argue enough about the welfare state and about the dangers and problems that it faces. The last part of that informal network clearly comes from the role of married women in caring for dependent, elderly, partly disabled or handicapped relatives, and so on.

I remember speaking last year at a meeting of a careers organisation at which the Department was represented by the Earl of Caithness. He explained on that occasion why, mainly because of revenue implications, the Department could not come forward with the extension of the allowance at that point. None the less, I hope that, now that we are a bit further down the track, the Minister will be able to be a bit more forthcoming tonight, particularly as a review of social security has just been completed. It would be extremely encouraging to think that one of the things that was reviewed and decided in that process was that this anomaly should be rectified and that that benefit should be, and will be, made available. If the Minister can give us any hints or otherwise in that direction, they will be gratefully received with the same all-party welcome that other contributions have been received.

Mr. Newton: In view of the warmth with which the House greeted some of my earlier remarks, I knew that my luck had to run out sooner or later, and I think that it just has. I fear that I am unable to answer on the invalid care allowance for married women in as forthcoming a fashion as I was able to on earlier matters, in particular, on the married women's half test.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) asked her questions in a reasonable way. She asked for the current estimate of the number of married women who would stand to benefit from the extension of invalid care allowance, were such to occur. Our best estimate at present is about 70,000. She asked what it would cost and the up-to-date answer has already been given by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). The up-to-date estimate of the net cost, after allowing for savings in supplementary benefit and so on, would be around £85 million.

The hon. Lady asked how many married women had claimed since the judgment in the case of Mrs. Drake. About 300 claims from married women have been received since the Drake case was published. That is about four times the number of such claims usually received in the same period. Those claims are being put on ice. They are being acknowledged, but adjudication will await the judgment of the European Court and the subsequent decision of the social security commissioners.

8.15 pm

I can confirm, as the hon. Lady said, that in early January the Drake case was put to the independent adjudicating authorities with the ultimate aim of securing a judgment from the European Court on the application or otherwise of the directive to invalid care allowance. As I have said on previous occasions, our legal advice was and remains that the directive does not cover invalid care allowance. I understand that the Commission shares that view but, as I have also said on a number of occasions, ultimately it is clearly a matter for the European Court, and, as the hon. Lady said, the social security commissioners have referred the case to the court and a judgment will be made in due course at which time the judgment will have to be considered by the Government.

There is not a great deal more than I can usefully add to the views that I have already expressed in Committee and on a number of other occasions on the Floor of the House on the issue. It will come as no surprise to hon. Members to know that, were resources not a problem, I should like to see this change. But resources are a problem. Even were this amount of money to become available there would be a real issue as to its ranking order alongside a number of other social security claims, and, not least, the claims of other disabled people. I spent part of yesterday afternoon at the annual general meeting of the Middlesex Association of the Blind where I was once again fairly heavily lobbied on the issue of a blindness allowance. We can all think of extensions of benefit that would be attractive to many people.

There is the other problem of whether money would not in some circumstances be at least as well spent in supporting disabled people and their carers by additional expenditure on home helps and other forms of care in the community. I do not want to labour any of those points. I have put them before the House and the Committee before as reasons for my hesitation in responding in the way that hon. Members would wish.

Ms. Richardson: I know how difficult it is, given all the competing claims, when there is only so much money, but is there not a double disadvantage in the case of the invalid care allowance? It is not only that the carers need the money but the present position is discriminatory in the sense that married women cannot claim while single women and men can. Should not that aspect be taken into account?

Mr. Newton: It cannot be denied that it is discriminatory in the sense that there are manifestly special rules for married women in relation to the claiming of invalid care allowance. The hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Derby, South and other hon. Members have been kind enough to refer to the record that we have acquired in making progress towards equal treatment over the past two or three years. That is certainly something in which I take pride but a problem remains here because it is our legal advice that this matter is not within the terms of the directive. Clearly, that can only be decided ultimately by the European Court and I am simply not in a position to say to the House tonight that I can suddenly make £85 million available for the extension of benefit now.

It sounded from what the hon. Member for Derby, South said that I might conceivably have misled her. She referred to the fact that our action on the married women's half test had been taken without regard to the directive. I wish to make it clear that our advice had become that the residual effects of the married women's half test were probably in contravention of the EC directive. Rather than argue further about that, we felt that it would be appropriate to introduce the change of which I spoke earlier and to backdate it to 22 December 1984—the date on which the directive finally took effect. That is not quite on all fours with invalid care allowance, either regarding the amount of money or our present legal advice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax referred to the money involved in the half test. I admit that it is fairly significant although it is only about one third of the sum involved in ICA. The one significant difference is that the money in the half test will rapidly decline to nil because the effects have already been working out as a result of its abolition for all those who became 60 after 1979. It was a diminishing problem. The same could not be true of ICA in view of its association with attendance allowance, the demand for and take-up of which has been rising sharply. Therefore, there is not a complete parallel between the two, even in financial terms.

I am genuinely sorry not to be able to say something more to the taste of hon. Members who have spoken, but I hope that I have made the present position reasonably clear.

Mrs. Beckett: I wish to make only two further brief comments on the issue. First, the Minister suggested that the Commission accepted that the invalid care allowance was outside the scope of the directive. Although I recognise that some remarks have been made about the fact that usually one is referring to the person who is made an invalid, and although it has been admitted that there is no directly comparable benefit in Europe to ICA, the directive states that "it would be desirable . . . not to exclude the benefit in question from the scope of the Directive."

That appears to suggest that the matter does come, or should come, within the scope of the directive.

I shall leave the Minister with one final thought to consider about the European Court's decision. I wish to press him on the date when people will be given the allowance, if the Government decide to do this, or are forced to do so. I noted with interest that when the Government introduced their new clause to abolish the half test, they made it retrospective to the date of implementation of the directive. Therefore, it would clearly be desirable, logical and would follow precedent to implement ICA from the date of the directive. If ICA is introduced, it should at least be from the date of the judgment on the Drake case rather than from the date on which people make individual claims, as it is at present. If it is right to abolish the half test from a consistent date, it is right to do so in abolishing the discrimination in ICA, should that happy day come. We all hope that it will, perhaps even in the next year. Tonight we have sought to clarify the Government's intentions and, therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 16

REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATION IN OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

'The Social Security Pensions Act 1975 and the Social Security (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1977 shall be amended to provide that all references to widows in these Acts shall now read "male and female spouses".'.—[Ms. Richardson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms Richardson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I do not wish to detain the House long with this probing new clause. The House will know that in 1983 the European Community produced a draft directive on equal treatment in occupational pension schemes. It provided for equal treatment in access to schemes, entry ages, benefits, reimbursement of contributions, retirement ages, contribution rate, transfers, preserved benefits, and so on. However, there was a significant exclusion clause in the draft directive, which recognised the link with the provision of statutory state schemes. It permits the deferment of compulsory application of the principle of equal treatment in retirement ages and benefit to a surviving spouse, until they are equalised at state level.

Last year an amendment was tabled in the European Parliament, which was carried, to delete that clause. That has now gone to the Commission for consideration. I understand that the matter is still with the Commission, and I should be interested to hear from the Minister, who may have been involved, what progress has been made within the Commission about that. I hope that the Government are not dragging their feet. Although I have heard rumours about that, I await the Minister's reply.

We seek to help the Government consider the amendment from the European Parliament. We have decided to table this new clause to the Social Security Pensions Act 1975—I am not sure whether the new clause is defective or whether it achieves my aim—to equalise benefits in the state scheme and, therefore, to pave the way for equalising treatment in occupational pension schemes in general.

There is a genuine difference in the treatment of widows and widowers in pension schemes. In pension schemes in both the private and public sectors, the number of pensions provided for widows of male members rose sharply in the 1970s, but the provision of pensions for widowers did not rise so sharply. A recent study commissioned by the Equal Opportunities Commission showed that by 1979 89 per cent. of male members had such an entitlement to benefits for their spouses, but that the provision for female members' spouses was less universal. By 1983 only 33 per cent. of schemes automatically provided a widower's pension on death in service, and 55 per cent. did so only when the widower showed that he had been dependent on his wife. As society has traditionally viewed the wife as being dependent on her husband, it must be difficult for many men to feel that they are regarded as dependent on their wives. They should not have to do that.

In many cases the widow of a male member receives not only a widow's pension, but a lump sum benefit. Therefore, it is extremely discriminatory in both the private and public sectors of pension schemes. Throughout the schemes in both sectors is the issue that widowers shall qualify only if they can show themselves to have been dependent on their late wives.

We live in a different age, and it is time that we came to grips with the question of differentiation and discrimination in pension schemes, which, curiously, causes great resentment in both males and females. Female members of pensions schemes resent paying into a scheme and not being able to nominate their spouse, and their spouses feel resentful that they cannot qualify.

8.30 pm

The main argument for many years has been one of cost and of the difficulty of equalising schemes in the non-state sector. However, I am sure that the Minister will have seen a document published last month by the Equal Opportunities Commission called "Model of Equality." It was prepared for the Commission by Duncan C. Fraser and Co., Actuaries, and it is,

"A Consulting Actuary's Report on the methods and costs of equalising the treatment of men and women in occupational pension schemes."

The final comment is:

"We have also shown that equality of treatment in the provision of surviving spouses' pensions can be provided at relatively low cost."

I hope that the Minister, who must have seen and studied the document, will consider carefully—although perhaps not through the new clause, which is probably not the right way to do it—how he can ensure in discussions with the Commission, or in any other way, that occupational pension schemes make equal provision for both sexes.

Mr. Whitney: I can add little to the information that the hon. Lady has already given to the House. As she said, the equal treatment of women and men in occupational pension schemes continues to be under active consideration, and the European draft directive which aims at preventing discrimination in occupational pension schemes — not just contracted-out schemes — is being discussed in Brussels and in the House. She referred to the decision of the European Assembly to change the provision on the relationship between state schemes and occupational pension schemes. The matter is still being discussed at an official level committee in Brussels. It is too early for me to say what the outcome of those discussions will be.

The Occupational Pensions Board believes — the Government agree with its view—that, although there are differences between survivors' benefits, mainly for widows and widowers in the state scheme, occupational pension schemes should not be required to introduce equality in those areas. Of course, there is nothing to prevent those responsible for occupational pension schemes from introducing equal treatment for men and women, and some schemes already make such provision.

We recognise that there is a long way to go, but it must be accepted that all occupational pension schemes are set up voluntarily by employers. That point applies to many other matters that we have discussed during our consideration of the Bill. The voluntary element of the establishment of such schemes is important. The employer must decide whether new arrangements can be introduced and bear in mind all considerations, including possible additional expenditure. I recognise the hon. Lady's quotation from the report that there would be relatively low costs, but costs there would be.

As my hon. Friend the Minister said, the Government support in principle the idea of equal treatment in all areas, including this one, so we have welcomed in principle the draft European directive. But at this stage it is more appropriate to pursue that objective by voluntary action than by legislation. I hope that, in the light of those remarks, the hon. Lady will accept that it would be premature to take action now.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I rise to support the new clause, and I apologise to the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) for not being here at the beginning of her speech. I thought that she would make an extremely competent case and indeed she did. She does not need my support, but I wish to express some disappointment at what I just heard my hon. Friend the Minister say. Once again, the Department seems to be falling over backwards to emphasise the fact that employers introduce occupational pension schemes on a voluntary basis and, therefore, can be allowed to run them in a way that is contrary to the general movement of public opinion.

One of the irreversible changes of the 20th century—it is certainly irreversible in the time scale that we can contemplate — is the emancipation of women and the desire that they should be treated on an equal basis with men. That should certainly be the case, if possible, in their cash relationships with their employers. An occupational pension scheme should treat male and female contributors on a precisely unisex basis. As I said in Committee, it would be possible for that to be done, without distorting actuarial principles, if a little ingenuity were applied. It does not even require a tremendous extension of the cost of the scheme to treat male and female contributors on the same basis. Matters can be balanced in ways which I mentioned in Committee and which I shall not repeat now.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to realise that, if the Government are to rely wholly on private occupational pension schemes to look after the earnings-related element of pension provision, these schemes must be in line with public opinion. If they continue to defy public opinion on the equal treatment of the sexes, that will be a nail in the coffin of the private occupational pensions movement. Women have votes and they should have justice in relation to their pensions.

Ms. Richardson: I could hardly have replied to the Minister better. I welcome the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) to the feminist movement. I hope that in areas other than occupational pensions, in which he is a renowned expert, he will add his voice to complaints against discrimination.

I am not happy with what the Minister said, because it seems that this will be one of those areas which are always hushed back. We are talking about unfairness and injustice, and I hope that the Minister realises that we do not intend to leave the matter there. There will be opportunities, now that the matter is with the Commission, for us to press the Government to find out what is happening and at least to ask the Government to take a positive stance in the Commission. The Minister did not say that they were doing so, but I hope that at least they will do that.

On the understanding that we shall not let this matter go until the Government change their mind, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 5

ABATEMENT OF INVALIDITY ALLOWANCE, ETC., WHERE BENEFICIARY ENTITLED TO ADDITIONAL COMPONENT IN PENSION OR TO GUARANTEED MINIMUM PENSION

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 2, line 24, after '(2B)', insert

'Provided that nothing in this subsection shall empower an additional component to widow's pension to be deducted from the rate of invalidity allowance;'.

I should say at once that if this amendment is not defective I shall be greatly astonished. All that we are doing here is trying to cast a little more light on what the Government are doing in this part of the Bill. When we debated these matters in Committee, the Government argued that it was legitimate to offset invalidity allowance against an earnings-related invalidity pension because the two were basically the same thing, and were granted on the same basis and for the same reason. We disputed that. We argued that the invalidity allowance was in place of earnings ability lost, whereas the earnings-related component was for money that had been earned before disability occurred.

It has been drawn to my attention since our debates in Committee that the people who will be most harshly and immediately affected by the change are widows. Although it is not likely, for the reason that I gave in Committee, that invalidity allowance and the earnings-related component are related to two different matters, that makes it all the more likely that no individual would have substantial sums on both, which militates against the effect of the change. However, a widow might have the maximum invalidity allowance on her own account and a substantial additional component on her husband's earnings. In that case, we are dealing with two completely different people and two completely different circumstances.

The case that has been drawn to my attention is of a lady who receives £4·61 on her husband's earnings, which she will lose under the terms of the Bill. It has been put to me that other widows may lose more.

The Government have a simple and logical choice here. They can say that our argument and the logic of our argument stand, that they really believe that these two things are the same and represent the same problem and therefore it is right to offset them against each other, and that they accept the case raised in this amendment and will not do anything to widows and will bring forward legislation accordingly; or they can say that, irrespective of the logic of the case, because what they are trying to do is to save money—as we on the Opposition Benches suspect—they will continue with the Bill as drafted, with its effect on widows.

Mr. Newton: I certainly would not dream of accusing the hon. Lady of tabling technically defective amendments and, even if I had been advised that her amendment was technically defective, I would not seek to use that as an argument.

I am in some uncertainty about the precise point that the hon. Lady has raised. It is not possible for a recipient of a widow's pension to have title to invalidity allowance unless she also has title to invalidity benefit or, if over retirement age, has elected to retain widow's pension rather than receive retirement pension. We certainly do not see any reason for treating widows in a way different from other people if they are in receipt of invalidity allowance and additional components, as there would be no material difference in the circumstances as between a widow and any other person who happened to be in receipt of both invalidity allowance and additional component.

If I have understood the hon. Lady's remarks correctly, she is postulating a case in which the widow may be in receipt of additional component earned not by herself, as it were, directly, but by her husband and may in some way have at the same time retained entitlement to invalidity benefit on her own contribution and the result of her own work record. Moreover, that must have happened at such an early stage as to have entitled her to some significant amount of invalidity allowance, bearing in mind that the higher rates of invalidity allowance entail being disabled substantially at a very early age.

I think that what I can most sensibly say is that I will look further at this point in the light of what the hon. Lady has said. I am not persuaded immediately that there is something we ought to do to change the proposals here, but, since it is not a matter which I have had the opportunity to consider carefully, I should like to look at it, without commitment but in the spirit in which I always look at any point which the hon. Lady raises.

Mrs. Beckett: I think it would be helpful if I sought further details of the case that was raised with me and passed them on to the Minister, and I will do that. In the light of what the hon. Gentleman said, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amedment No. 5, in page 3, line 15, after 'component', insert

'after any increase under section 9(3) of the Pensions Act but'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 6.

Mr. Newton: Essentially this is a technical amendment accompanied by a consequential drafting amendment. I shall say more if hon. Members wish, but otherwise not.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 6, in page 3, line 17, leave out 'the Pensions' and insert 'that'.

8.45 pm

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 109, in page 6, line 4, leave out from 'Where' to end of line 17 and insert

'a person—

(a) is entitled immediately before the commencement of a provision contained in this section ("the amending provision") to a benefit specified in subsection (8) below ("the relevant benefit"); and

(b) continues to be entitled to the relevant benefit after the commencement of the amending provision, until the relevant date the amending provision shall not operate in relation to him, so long as he continues to be entitled to the relevant benefit, in such a way as to reduce the total weekly rate of any benefits specified in subsection (8) below to which he is for the time being entitled to a rate lower than the total weekly rate of such benefits immediately before the commencement of the amending provision.

(7) Where—

(a) the conditions mentioned in subsection (6)(a) and (b) above are satisfied in relation to a person; and

(b) he ceases to be entitled to the relevant benefit after the commencement of the amending provision; and

(c) he subsequently becomes entitled to it again; and

(d) the interval between the date of his ceasing to be entitled to it and the date of his becoming entitled to it again is eight weeks or less; and

(e) the date of his becoming entitled to it again is earlier than the date in 1985 on which an order under sections 124 and 126A below comes into force, until the relevant date the amending provision shall not operate in relation to him, during any periods for which he is entitled to the relevant benefit in such a way as to reduce the total weekly rate of benefits specified in subsection (8) below to which he is for the time being entitled to a rate lower than the total weekly rate of such benefits immediately before the commencement of the amending provision.

(8) The benefits mentioned in subsections (6) and (7) above are—

(a) invalidity benefit;

(b) Category A and Category B retirement pension; and

(c) unemployability supplement, including any increase in respect of a dependant.

(9) In this section "the relevant date" means, in relation to any person, the first date on which there comes into force an order under sections 124 and 126A below whose effect, taken with the effect of the amending provision, is more beneficial to him than the effect of subsections (6) and (7) above

This is a little more than a technical amendment, but it is not quite as horrifying as it looks from its length. It is concerned with tidying up the provisions which we debated in Committee at least as much as with changing them. There are two changes. One is the result of an undertaking that I gave in Committee, and one is the result of an awkwardness which we identified and wished to prevent.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) will recall that when we discussed this in Committee I told her that if we were to introduce the overlap provisions at any time other than an uprating I would wish to respond to her suggestion to consider the arrangements for the period between introduction and the date of the first uprating. Although the Bill does not lay down a precise date of commencement for clause 5, there is certainly a possibility, perhaps even a likelihood, that we shall decide to implement this change a month or two in advance of the uprating. In those circumstances, I have thought it right to extend the transitional protection to include people who were in receipt of benefit at the date of introduction, who subsequently ceased to be so entitled but then became sick again before the date of the uprating and within eight weeks of the previous spell's ending. I think that is the point which the hon. Lady was concerned with in Committee, and subsection (7) of the amendment brings this into effect.

The other change since Committee stage relates to the occasions when we shall operate the overlapping provisions for existing beneficiaries. As I have made clear, this will occur only when a person's total weekly benefit rate is due to be increased. This would normally be at an uprating, but there could be other occasions when a beneficiary receives an increase—notably when he or she became entitled to a dependency increase. Our original intention was to take account of the overlap on other occasions as well, but we concluded that this could lead to some difficulties, which again I will explain if need be, and we have decided to restrict the operation of the overlap provision for existing beneficiaries to uprating times only. That is achieved by various changes in subsections (6) and (7) as defined in subsection (9).

Mrs. Beckett: I welcome what the Minister has said about seeking to give effect to discussions which we had in Committee. I take the opportunity of the tabling of this amendment to comment, mainly because our amendment which sought to delete the clause was not selected, although I do not criticise that decision, that it is worth drawing again to the attention of the House the fact that because of the operation of this clause, even with the improvements which the Minister has outlined, we shall be making a net saving on invalidity pensioners. Apart from the net saving that we make because we offset the increase given to them in one part of the Bill with the money removed in this part of the Bill, there will be a further net saving because of the delay which the Government intend to impose in paying the benefit by paying it in arrears. It would not be right to allow this part of the Bill to pass without pointing out again how strongly we disagree with such moves.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 7

PENSION INCREASES IN RESPECT OF ADULT DEPENDANTS —EQUAL TREATMENT FOR MALES AND FEMALES ETC.

Amendment proposed: No. 7, in page 7, leave out lines 4 to 9 and insert—

'(a) in subsection (1)(b), for the words "conditions specified in" there shall be substituted the words "requirements of either paragraph (a) or (b) of"; and

(b) the following subsections shall be substituted for subsection (2)—

"(2) The requirements referred to in subsection (1)(b) above are—

(a) that the pensioner is residing with her husband;

(b) that the pensioner is contributing to the maintenance of her husband at a weekly rate not less than the specified amount, and her husband is not engaged in any one or more employments from which his weekly earnings exceed that amount.

(3) Regulations may provide that, for any period during which the pensioner is residing with her husband and her husband is engaged in any one or more employments from which he has earnings—".'—[Mr. Newton.]

Mrs. Beckett: I should like to take this opportunity to ask the Minister whether the Government have yet made up their mind what they propose to do about equal treatment of earnings, what level the rule will operate at, whether it will be a cliff-edge rule or a graduated rule, and so on.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry; obviously I ought to have sent the hon. Lady a copy of the answer to the parliamentary question which I answered earlier this week in which I said that our intention is to introduce the equal treatment earnings rule in this field at what seems to me to be the appropriate level—that is, the level of unemployment benefit, £28·45 per week, which the person in question would receive if he had been in work and became entitled to national insurance benefit in his own right. That is somewhat more generous than the existing rule applying to the husbands of invalidity benefit wives, but somewhat less generous than the rule currently applying to wives of invalidity benefit husbands. It is our intention, in the interests of simplicity, that it should be a cliff-edge rule.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

INVALIDITY PENSION

Amendment made, No. 8, in page 9, line 6, leave out 'that Act or the Social Security Pensions Act 1975' and insert 'this Act or the Pensions Act'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Clause 9

PERIOD OF ENTITLEMENT

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 9, line 37, leave out 'any' and insert 'all'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 10 and amendment No. 11, in page 9, leave out from line 41 to line 7 on page 10.

Mrs. Beckett: Amendments Nos. 9 and 11 make slightly different points. Amendment 9 is another of these amendments where one bungs down any old thing to raise an issue. Through it, I am seeking to clarify the assurance given to me in Committee at various stages by both the Under-Secretary and the Minister for Social Security. It was to the effect that, although statutory sick pay is not payable over the same number of individual days as sickness benefit used to be, nevertheless the same period of time that would be involved in the 168 days of sickness benefit would be covered by days of statutory sick pay. That would be a smaller number of days although they would cover the same period of weeks, because there would be no difference in the period of time that enabled one to draw invalidity benefit as between sickness benefit and statutory sick pay. I hope that I have not made that too confusing. Both Ministers assured me that it was the Government's intention that there should be no such differences, and that the Bill would allow that.

On a number of occasions, and from a number of different quarters, I have had representations from organisations, trade unions, charities and people who deal with this sector to say that, whatever the Government's intention, the Bill does not allow that. Once again, I ask the Minister and the Department, which, in all charity, has sometimes, as one can see from all these amendments, not got the drafting right, to look at this issue again because, while the Government may be convinced of what the Bill says, nobody else is.

Amendment No. 11 raises a different point, but one that we wish to raise again with the Minister. It concerns the way in which the statutory sick pay is treated. Here again, there is some difficulty. The argument that the Minister puts against deleting this clause, as we wish to do because that would remove a number of anomalies, is twofold. First, it is because people should arrive at invalidity benefit in the same way, and second it is to do with whether statutory sick pay should be treated as earnings or benefit.

It is possible and logical to make a case for treating statutory sick pay as earnings, or to make a case for treating it wholly as a benefit. Moreover, it is not possible and logical to treat it as earnings on one occasion, when it is advantageous for the Government to do so and disadvantageous to the claimant, and to treat it as benefits on another occasion when it is advantageous for the Government to do so and disadvantageous to the claimant. The Government consistently do that.

We wish to press the point and to ask the Minister to look again at deleting this clause. We dealt with the attachment of earnings earlier in the debate, and the Under-Secretary advised me that it was not right or proper to make changes in the Law Reform Act. The Department in that case advised that statutory sick pay should be treated as earnings. We are anxious to help the Government to achieve consistency in their treatment of this payment.

The Minister also argued that it is a matter of equal treatment that people should arrive at the invalidity benefit under the same circumstances, whatever the circumstances of their previous illness. However, they are not in the same circumstances necessarily as those who are on statutory sick pay and then, having been ill for 28 weeks, become entitled to invalidity benefit. Throughout that period, they have continued to pay national insurance contributions and perhaps tax. As they have made extra payments, it is not wholly unjust that they should have extra entitlement at the end.

We accept the Minister's argument that young people starting work may not be as effective as we thought at first, but we still believe that married women who return to work, particularly those who paid reduced contributions at one time and who have now gone back to work and are paying full stamp, will be affected. The Minister accepts that the other anomalies that we raised in Committee exist, but he does not think that they are serious enough to make it worthwhile to do anything about them. We do not accept that.

Once again, we ask the Minister to look at the principle that we raise throughout the amendments and to make sure that the anomalies that we identified in Committee are removed. That is more important than being able to say that we are treating people in exactly the same way for invalidity benefit, when they are not under the same circumstances.

Mr. Newton: Amendment No. 9 may have resulted from some misunderstanding of why the Government have tabled amendment No. 10. Our amendment is a drafting amendment, designed to avoid possible ambiguity in the existing wording. It does not affect the aim of the provision as drafted. However, we think that the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) would, taken with the provisions of section 15A(2), have the effect of disadvantaging certain young people and other recent entrants to the national insurance scheme by preventing them from qualifying for invalidity benefit. I am sure that that is not what the hon. Lady intends. I can perhaps best explain why amendment No. 9 has that undesirable effect by setting out what led us to table amendment No. 10.

Section 15A(1) enables regulations to be made to provide that days of entitlement to statutory sick pay may be deemed to be days of entitlement to sickness benefit and thus count towards the 168-day qualifying period for invalidity benefit. The regulations will spell out precisely which days of SSP can be treated in this way. The intention will be to ensure that an employee who has been sick for 28 weeks in the same period of entitlement will become eligible for invalidity benefit, subject to the requirement in the following section 15A(2) that he satisfies the contribution tests for sickness benefit.

Our advice is that the existing wording of "any days" might be construed as meaning precisely what the hon. Lady's amendment provides, that is that all the days on which there was entitlement to SSP will automatically be deemed under the regulation as days of entitlement to sickness benefit. We do not intend or want this to happen. Although in most cases all days of SSP entitlement will be deemed in this way, there will be occasions when regulations will need to provide that only part of the period on SSP will be so deemed. This is to cater for young people and recent entrants into national insurance who may only satisfy the first contribution test for sickness benefit as a result of the national insurance contribution conditions they have paid on the SSP itself. Hon. Members who have served on the Standing Committee will recall that we gave the assurance that these people would not be excluded from invalidity benefit and would be eligible for the special credits to get them on to state sickness benefit in the same way as at present. I am happy to repeat this assurance. This will be provided for in regulations.

If the hon. Lady's amendments were accepted, it would mean that some of these new entrants would not be covered for invalidity benefit because they would fall foul of the provision contained in section 15A(2) that the employee must have satisfied the contribution conditions for sickness benefit on the first of the days deemed to be days of entitlement to that benefit. He might not have satisfied that test on the first day of SSP entitlement but would do so during the course of such entitlement.

9 pm

I hope that I have said enough on this extremely complex matter at the very least to persuade the hon. Lady that it is not not quite as clear-cut as she sought to suggest and to make it clear also that the Government are acting with good will and with intended generosity in the prosposals which they have put forward. I think I have now spoken to amendment No. 10 as much as I need to in the course of speaking to amendment No. 9.

In regard to amendment No. 11, I considered carefully the extremely well set out and argued letter that the hon. Lady sent me recently and to which I responded as fully as I could two or three days ago. There is some difference of opinion between us about the importance of different considerations. She has raised a number of possible difficulties on one side of the balance. I have emphasised our concern to ensure fair play between those in receipt of sickness benefit and those in receipt of statutory sick pay on the other side of the account.

I am not at the moment persuaded any more than I was when I read the hon. Lady's letter that we should change the legislation, but I would not rule out considering a change at some time in the future if she can persuade me that she is right and I am wrong. As she has come close to doing so on at least one issue that we discussed earlier this evening, she should not lose all hope. I am afraid I cannot more completely fulfil those hopes at this point in our discussion.

Mrs. Beckett: I may not have made myself completely clear. Amendment No. 9 was tabled before I had the opportunity to see amendment No. 10. In my opening remarks I suggested that amendment No. 9 might be defective but that I simply wanted to use it as an opportunity to raise the issue of whether the Bill was correctly drafted with regard to the way in which SSP days would be considered. I hope that the Minister is right. No doubt if people still think that the Bill is not adequately drafted they will come back to both of us on that point. Having said that, and recognising that on amendment No. 11 we continue to differ, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 9, line 37, leave out 'any days' and insert

'such days as may be prescribed'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 10, line 12, leave out 'larger'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this amendment it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 13, in page 10, line 12, after 'weeks', insert 'not less than 13'.

Mrs. Beckett: These are simple amendments by which we hope to extend the linking period in statutory sick pay. Even if the Minister cannot accept the amendments, which we believe have merit in that they would restore the original linking period of 13 weeks which was in force before the Social Security Act 1980, I hope that he will at least be able to tell us what the current position is with regard to the Department's proposals. So far as I recall, the Department in its consultation paper believed that we should retain the existing eight week linking rule, but it had not put that in the Bill in case it received representations that the period should be reduced.

We sought in Committee, and we do so again now, to encourage the Government to retain the period of eight weeks and preferably to consider restoring the 13-week period. Certainly they should not reduce the period, as I believe some people might have been urging them to do.

Over the period that the Government have been in office they have made a substantial number of reductions and cuts in sickness and invalidity benefit entitlement. I can think of the abolition of earnings-related supplements, the cuts in industrial injury and sickness benefit, the abatement of 5 per cent. in sickness benefit and the phasing out of additions for children. None of those has been restored.

To go back to the 13-week linking period, which was of assistance to people in linking separate periods of sickness, would mean that people would less often have to serve fresh waiting days. There would be a substantially shorter period before people who have frequent spells of sickness would become entitled to qualify for invalidity benefit.

This would be a beneficial change. The Government have made so many disadvantageous changes that they could well make at least one beneficial change. We hope that they will use this opportunity to tell us that they do not intend to make a further reduction in the period in the legislation.

Mr. Whitney: I am sorry that the hon. Lady referred to the disadvantageous changes that she alleges the Government have made when she seems to have spent quite a lot of time this evening congratulating my hon. Friend the Minister of State on the generosity shown by the Government on some matters.

We accept that there is a strong case for extending the linking period from the present two weeks. We do not think a 13-week period would be justified. As the hon. Lady knows and as my hon. Friend the Minister of State said in Committee, the Government have a strong preference for eight weeks. It is important to consult carefully. The consultations which are continuing should not pre-empted. I am not in a position to say more at present than that we are still in consultation with the appropriate parties. We certainly believe that the 13-week period proposed in the amendment would not be justified.

Mrs. Beckett: I must, of course, accept that the Minister was unlikely to accept the restoration of the 13-week period. But I am sorry that he still cannot tell us whether the Government intend to stick to eight weeks. I hope that they will do so. However, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 10, line 14, at end insert—

'(4A) The following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (4) of section 3 of that Act (period of entitlement)—

"(4A) The Secretary of State may by regulations—

(a) specify circumstances in which, for the purpose of determining whether an employee's maximum entitlement to statutory sick pay has been reached in a period of entitlement as between him and an employer of his, days falling within a previous period of entitlement as between the employee and any person who is or has in the past been an employer of his are to be counted; and

(b) direct that in prescribed circumstances an employer shall provide a person who is about to leave his employment, or who has been employed by him in the past, with a statement in the prescribed form containing such information as may be prescribed in relation to any entitlement of the employee to statutory sick pay.".'.

The amendment arises out of one of the proposals contained in the consultation paper that the Department issued to employers in employees' interests at the end of last year. It enables regulations to be made to define the circumstances in which periods of entitlement to SSP with different employers are to count as one in calculating the employee's maximum entitlement of 28 weeks. It also enables the regulations to lay down the circumstances in which the employer is required to issue to his employee, at the time he leaves, a statement about the period for which he had entitlement to SSP.

I commend the amendment to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 10, line 26, at end insert—

'(6) Leave out section 7(1) to that Act and insert—

"(1) Statutory Sick Pay shall be payable by an employer at the weekly rate of—

(a) £54·80, in a case where the employee's normal weekly earnings under his contract of service with that employer are not less than £68;

(b) £46 in a case where those earnings are less than £68, but not less than £50·50;

(c) £37 in any other case.".'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 16 in, page 10, line 26, at end insert—

'(7) In section 26(2) of the Act leave out "in the relevant period" and insert "over the 24 weeks prior to the beginning of the period of illness or the eight weeks so prior, whichever gives the higher sum.".'

Mrs. Beckett: In these amendments we seek to improve the rates of statutory sick pay and to find out whether it is possible to get the Government to agree to changes in the way that normal weekly earnings are assessed.

I have already mentioned the disadvantageous changes. I am sorry if I hurt the Under-Secretary of State's feelings, but the Government's record is there for all to see. The Government have made disadvatageous changes in sickness and invalidity provision. As a result of those changes, people have lost quite substantially in the recompense available to them when sick. Therefore, we thought that we now had a good opportunity to raise the issue of the inadequacy of rates of statutory sick pay. We recognise that there are people who are low paid or who are single and who might, in some circumstances, be better off under SSP than under sickness benefit. But unfortunately those who are likely to be worse off are those who are most vulnerable, or those with families.

In our amendment we suggest that the top rate of SSP should be raised to the married rate of invalidity pension, and we have made similar adjustments in the proposal for the other levels of statutory sick pay. Amendment No. 16 refers to the assessment of normal weekly earnings. Although I do not expect much change from the Minister over amendment No. 15, I hope that he will agree to consider the issues raised in amendment No. 16. What was perhaps not wholly desirable but liveable with in terms of statutory sick pay extending over eight weeks becomes much more difficult and an injustice when dealing with statutory sick pay paid over 28 weeks. As things stand, the level of statutory sick pay to which one becomes entitled is governed by normal weekly earnings. They are worked out according to what someone receives in the eight weeks before he becomes ill. At any time there will be occupations that involve people being on retainers. For example, dinner ladies in the school meals service may spend a substantial period of time on retainers, when their earnings are not only nowhere near their normal level, but very low indeed. As we move more and more towards short-time and part-time working, there will be greater variations in the level of earnings that someone might receive immediately before becoming ill. The situation is not very good at the best of times, but given that we are talking about someone who might be receiving this level of statutory sick pay for six months or for the full period before he becomes entitled, say, to invalidity benefit, it is a serious matter.

I understand that the TUC has put forward a proposal involving a perhaps more sensible period of 24 weeks that would provide a fairer basis for calculating normal weekly earnings. But we thought it right to put forward either eight or 24 weeks, depending on which is the more beneficial figure for the claimant. That would make a change from the way that most things work under the Government, and it would be a beneficial change too. I hope that the Minister will look seriously at this issue because it is causing problems now and the Bill will cause much more serious problems.

Mr. Whitney: Amendment No. 15 proposes that there should be an increase in the statutory sick pay rates from April 1986 of over 23 per cent. The rates set out in section 7(1) of the 1982 Act were carefully selected so as to ensure that at the start of the scheme employees as a group would receive broadly the same extra income from the SSP scheme after the deduction of tax and national insurance contributions as they would have received by way of sickness benefit had that been taxed. I estimate that the hon. Lady's proposals would result in an additional cost of about £100 million in a full year. These changes in the rates would disrupt the financial relationship between statutory sick pay and sickness benefit and would mean that we were treating differently people in much the same situation when sick for short periods.

As for the second amendment, I believe that it would have unfortunate effects that were not intended. We believe that eight weeks is a reasonable period. It is long enough to give a fair indication of what average earnings are but it is not so long as to put any further and onerous problem of accounting on to the employer. If employers are to stand a chance of operating the scheme correctly and if employees are to get the right amount of money, it is a consideration that has to be borne in mind. I believe that the eight week period is entirely justified. The 24-week period would have undesirable effects, including the imposition of an unnecessary burden upon employers.

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot accept the Minister's argument. He cannot properly have considered the effect on these groups of workers. Although there may not be many of them, the effect upon them will be serious when they find themselves in circumstances in which they are given a retainer for a period of weeks. However, since we are unlikely to make any headway with the Minister on this point, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 10

RIGHT OF EMPLOYERS TO AMOUNTS IN RESPECT OF CONTRIBUTIONS

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 10, line 27, leave out clause 10.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 18, and No. 19, in page 11, line 11, leave out subsection (2).

Mrs. Beckett: By proposing the deletion of this clause we are seeking to draw attention to the Government's proposal to recompense employers by the rebate of a whole year's contribution for the burden that they say they are putting upon employers by increasing statutory sick pay to 28 weeks. A remarkable feature of the Bill is that on the one hand the Government argue that it is no trouble at all to employers to extend SSP to 28 weeks; they are all highly efficient and are managing very well. On the other hand, out of the kindness and generosity of their heart, the Government have decided to give to employers a year's worth of rebate.

We do not wish to speak against employers having the rebate, but we wish to speak very much aginst the different treatment of employers and employees. While employers will receive a rebate, employees will continue to have to pay the full amount and will get no benefit whatsoever. I would remind the Minister of what was said by his predecessor, the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), in 1982 about the payments due from employers and employees:

"The earnings related contribution schemes are geared to the basic concept of employers and employees both paying contributions on all assessable earnings. It is alien to the scheme's structure to expect employees but not their employers to contribute on one type of assessable earnings."

We agree entirely with that judgment. We think that it still stands and that the Government are making a mistake.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Lady makes a very unconvincing case in seeking to compare what is happening to employers and to employees. There is no damage whatever to the interests of employees. Those interests are very well preserved. Like hon. Members in all parts of the House, we recognise that the extension and operation of the SSP scheme will place burdens on employers, and we are taking cognisance of that burden by offering compensation. I therefore reject amendment No. 17. For the same reasons, I reject amendment No. 19 which would preclude retrospective application of the compensation arrangements from 6 April 1985.

9.15 pm

Government amendment No. 18 is purely technical to take account of the fact that reimbursement to the employer of the cost of secondary national insurance contributions on SST may in practice be carried out by the Inland Revenue on behalf of the DHSS rather than by the DHSS itself.

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 18, in page 10, line 44, after 'State', insert

'or by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on behalf of the Secretary of State'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Clause 15

EXTENT

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 13, line 3, after 'paragraphs', insert '0,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 65, amendment No. 66, in schedule 2, page 31, line 26, leave out from 'at' to end of line 27 and insert and Government amendments Nos. 73, 90 and 91.

'the offices of the Inland Revenue Superannuation Funds Office'.

Mr. Whitney: Amendment No. 65 substitutes a new version of section 56B in schedule 2 which provides for the establishment of a register of occupational pension schemes. In particular, the new version provides that the registrar may be a body corporate rather than an individual and that some of the work may be privatised. The other amendments are consequential in various degrees of detail.

We are listening very carefully to the points raised about the proposed register. As it is such an important issue, I must detain the House for a few moments on it. There is fairly general support for the aims behind the proposal, but there is widespread doubt as to whether a full-blown public registry is justified or needed to achieve the aims which are generally recognised. We told the Committee that we should be considering all the options with an open mind, and that is what we are doing. If, for example, rather than setting up a new institution we can develop the role of one or more existing bodies to encompass the required functions, we shall consider that. Again, if a registry can be provided economically on our behalf by the private sector, that would also be considered. The amendments give us full flexibility, once the decision has been taken, as to how to operate any register that is to be run. The nature and extent of its functions are also left open to subsequent decision in the light of more detailed consideration of the options.

We have set up an official steering group to make proposals about the way in which the register would work. The detailed task of identifying and evaluating options has been given to a small project team under the joint leadership of an independent management consultant, Thornton Baker Associates, and an official of the Department. The terms of reference for the project team emphasise, among other things, the need for economy in the use of staff and the need to avoid placing unreasonable burdens on schemes. We shall examine very carefully the possible problems of confidentiality which a public register might encounter.

At this stage, we have no preconceptions about how our aims, which are very clear, may best be achieved. The decisions can be made only in the light of the detailed evaluation of the various options which is now in progress. Our overriding concern is to identify an efficient and cost-effective solution which does not put undue costs and problems on the pensions industry which, as we all agree and as my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) emphasised, is an important part of our activities.

Mrs. Beckett: I am more than a little astonished at what the Minister has said. I had understood from the amendment that this was probably yet another attempt to privatise something from which somebody could make a profit. I was more than a little amazed to hear the Minister say that it might be good for the registrar to have agents rather than there to be a fully public register in the interests of confidentiality. I thought that the whole point of having a register was that it would be public and readily available. I note that the Government are deleting some of the original and detailed descriptions in the Bill.

We are deeply unhappy about the suggestion that the registrar's functions might be privatised and have grave doubts about the registrar appointing agents. That seems to suggest that information might be scattered all over the place, thus making it difficult for the Government, let alone anyone else, to use it. As it seems from the Minister's comments that that is the whole idea, I wonder why the Government are bothering to go ahead with rules for the registrar.

I do not wish to nit pick, but I have read amendment No. 73 at least eight times. It is utterly meaningless and perhaps should not exist. It suggests that we leave out subsection (2) and insert subsection (10), and yet the amendment is in subsection (10) and refers to subsection (2). There might be an error there. It might be me, but I think it might be the Department.

Mr. Galley: The redrafting is to be greatly welcomed. In Committee, I mentioned the possibility of the register being operated by the Occupational Pensions Board or by the superannuation funds office of the Inland Revenue, or a combination of both as they operate from the same building and apparently have all the knowledge and expertise needed to run a register. Is that option still open to consideration? Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government have set themselves firmly against a new Department with about 100 civil servants?

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) should not get too excited. The amendments give my right hon. Friend the greatest flexibility when considering carefully the outcome of the consultations which we are convinced are important because of their inevitably long-standing nature which is inherent in the pension scheme. I understand that the word "privatisation" sends bad vibes down the spines of Opposition Members. No decisions have been made. The research and consultations are continuing. I must extend the same reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). None of the options is closed.

The essence of these provisions is to secure safeguards for pension scheme members. The hon. Lady must understand that considerations of confidentiality are important to those who operate pension funds. I understand that the drafting problem to which she referred is a correction of a cross-reference in section 56C back section 56B, but if there is any remaining confusion I shall be happy to write to the hon. Lady.

New Schedule

Miscellaneous Amendments Relating to Statutory Sick Pay

Attachment of Earnings Act 1971 (c.32)

1. In section 24(1) of the Attachment of Earnings Act 1971 (meaning of "earnings"), the following paragraph shall be inserted after paragraph (b)—

"(c) by way of statutory sick pay.".

Social Security Act 1975 (c. 14)

2. In subsection (8) of section 22 of the Social Security Act 1975 (maternity allowances) after the word "above" there shall be inserted the words "and Schedule 3, Part I, paragraph 3".

3. In section 36 of that Act (severe disablement allowance), the following subsection shall be inserted after subsection (4)—

'(4A) A person shall not be entitled to a severe disablement allowance for any day which as between him and his employer falls within a period of entitlement for the purposes of statutory sick pay.

Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 (c. 24)

4. The following subsections shall be inserted after subsection (6) of section 3 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982 (periods of entitlement)—

"(6A) In a case where the employee's contract of service first takes effect between two periods of incapacity for work which by virtue of section 2(3) of this Act are treated as one, the period of entitlement begins with the first day of the second of those periods.

(6B) In any case where, otherwise than by virtue of section 4(2)(b) of the principal Act (exclusion of liability where earnings are below the lower earnings limit), an employee's earnings under a contract of service in respect of the day on which the contract takes effect do not attract a liability to pay secondary Class 1 contributions subsections (6) and (6A) above shall have effect as if for any reference to the contract first taking effect there were substituted a reference to the first day in respect of which the employee's earnings attract such a liability.".

5. The following provisions of that Act (which relate to certain payments wrongly made)—

(a) section 24; and

(b) paragraphs 7 to 11 of Schedule 2,

shall cease to have effect.

6.—(1) In subsection (1) of section 26 of that Act (interpretation) the following definition shall be substituted for the definition of "employer"—

"'employer', in relation to an employee and a contract of service of his, means a person who under section 4 of the principal Act (liability to pay Class 1 contributions) is, or but for subsection (2)(b) of that section (exclusion of liability where earnings are below lower earnings limit) would be, liable to pay secondary Class 1 contributions in relation to any earnings (within the meaning of that Act) of the employee under the contract;".

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) above shall not have effect in relation to periods of entitlement (within the meaning of section 3 of that Act) beginning before the commencement of this paragraph.

7. In section 26(2) of that Act for the words "his average weekly earnings in the relevant period" there shall be substituted the words "the average weekly earnings which in the relevant period have been paid to him or paid for his benefit".'.

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Schedule 1

Transfer and Revaluation

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 15, line 13, leave out 'ceases' and insert

'has ceased, whether before or after the commencement of this section,'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss Government amendments Nos. 26 and 27.

Mr. Whitney: These amendments are technical. We want a transfer premium to be payable even if either or both of the events mentioned in subsections (1)(a) or (b) took place before section 44A comes into operation. That is not achieved at present; these amendments will ensure that it is.

Amendment agreed to Amendments made: No. 26, in page 15, line 16, leave out 'is' and insert 'has been'.

No. 27, in page 15, line 28, leave out from 'person' end of line 29 and insert

'within a prescribed time after the prescribed event'.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 15, line 34, leave out from 'under' to end of line 38 and insert

'section 44 above, except that—

(a) subsection (6) shall be disregarded; and

(b) the Secretary of State shall apply the actuarial table prescribed for the purpose of calculating the amount of an accrued rights premium in such manner as may be prescribed.'.

This is a technical amendment. It is intended that transfer premiums should be calculated in the same way as accrued rights premiums except that section 44(6) should be disregarded. There is, though, a difference. Transfer premiums can fall due many years after contracted-out employment has ended. We therefore need to be able to relate the premium to the date the application to pay it is made. This means that the amount of the premium will be related to the time the member exercises his transfer option and not to when his pensionable service ended.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 34, in page 18, line 2, leave out 'to provide the amount' and insert

'so far as what they were liable to provide is'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we will discuss Government amendments Nos. 36 and 37.

Amendment No. 40, in page 19, leave out from beginning of line 11 to end of line 10 on page 20, and Government amendments Nos. 41, 42 and 43.

Mr. Whitney: This is another technical amendment because the Life Offices Association pointed out the differences between the words "benefit" and "amounts". I shall give further details should the House wish that.

Amendment No. 37 results from a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). We propose to make a regulation giving the power to deal with the problems that he raised. One of them is that the sums paid under policies can be paid only to people for whom the scheme provided for payment. The problem arises when the proceeds of the policy exceed the maximum benefit levels permitted by the Inland Revenue for tax approval. At present any excess can be used to provide benefits for other people or returned to the scheme. The Bill as drafted would not permit that, which means that the insurance company would retain any excess. I congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing that point to my attention.

Amendment No. 40 has the effect that new section 52D provides that people who choose or consent to a buy-out should, in the event of the insurance company failing to bear any resulting loss — I am sorry, this is an Opposition amendment.

Amendments Nos. 41, 42 and 43 are technical amendments.

9.30 pm

Mrs. Beckett: The Minister has already half moved or half replied to our amendment. We wished to draw attention again to the fact that in certain cases a member of a scheme will not have his or her shortfall in guaranteed minimum pension underwritten by the Department; when, as the Minister said, the member has consented to a buy-out and the insurance company has failed. Then, a portion of the guaranteed minimum pension might not be covered by the Policyholders Protection Act or by the Department. We recognise that such cases will be rare and that the amounts of benefit involved will be small. For that very reason we hope that the Government can do something about such cases.

Mr. Whitney: We recognise that people should be given as much choice as possible. However, part of that principle is that they should take some of the consequences of their own decisions. The amounts concerned in the shortfall to which the hon. Lady referred are small, as she said. The Policyholders Protection Act will safeguard 90 per cent. of the guaranteed minimum pension, so that we are talking about a maximum of 10 per cent. of the guaranteed minimum pension rights. We believe, therefore, that the Opposition amendment should be rejected.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No: 36, in page 18, line 3 leave out from beginning to 'secured' in line 4 and insert—

'(3) In this section "appropriately secured" means'.

No. 37, in page 18, line 22 after 'that', insert

'except in such cases as may be prescribed,'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 39, in page 18, line 38, after 'widow', insert

'and of any other contingent beneficiary who can be identified at the time the policy is effected.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It will be convenient for the House to consider at the same time Government amendments Nos. 154 to 160.

Mrs. Beckett: We raised this issue in Committee, when we asked for cover for contingent beneficiaries and not just for widows and widowers. We wanted them to have their interests taken into account when somebody was deciding to make changes in their pension provision. It was said in Committee that the Department would look into the matter to see whether something could be done. We are now providing the Minister with an opportunity to say on what grounds it was decided not to take any action.

Mr. Whitney: As the hon. Lady said, we promised in Committee to look at the whole subject, and we have done that. We have some sympathy with the points that the hon. Lady made, but our purpose in this provision is to ensure that the legal position on buy-out is clear. It does not make radical changes to what is a permissible buy-out. We are concerned, I emphasise, only with benefits above the guaranteed minimum pension level.

Guaranteed minimum pensions are already adequately protected on buy-out. To impose the requirement suggested by the amendment would involve administrative expense for the schemes, even if the whereabouts of existing beneficiaries were known. The need to obtain consent could, moreover, prevent buy-outs, even if the same contingency benefits were provided by the policy.

Buy-out usually means that benefit rights change, and it would be unreasonable to prevent a buy-out simply because a contingent beneficiary preferred one benefit to another. We have considered the proposition but, for the reasons I have given, I urge the House to reject it.

I come to amendments Nos. 155 to 160. At present, the Bill requires the revaluation of widow's benefit when the member dies after pension age. This group of amendments extends the requirement to include dependants' benefits provided by the scheme. This means that all benefits which must be preserved in accordance with the Social Security Act 1973 are also covered by the revaluation requirements in the Bill.

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 41, in page 19, line 12, after 'pensions', insert

'provided for a member or his widow'.

No. 42, in page 19, line 13, after 'been', insert 'wholly or partly'.

No. 43, in page 19, line 32, leave out 'guaranteed minimum pensions' and insert 'amount secured'.

No. 154, in page 20, line 37, leave out 'his widow' and insert

'any other person in respect of the member'.

No. 155, in page 21, line 5, leave out 'his widow' and insert

'any other person in respect of him'.

No. 156, in page 21, line 27, leave out

'any widow he may leave'

and insert

'to any other person in respect of him'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Amendments made: No. 110, in page 21, line 37, leave out from beginning to 'and' in line 44 and insert

'any notional pensionable service which is credited to the member by the scheme;'.

Amendments made:.

No. 111, in page 21, line 47, at end insert

"(3A) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (2)(b) and (c) above, any notional pensionable service which is credited to a member by a scheme shall be taken to have ended immediately before the member's actual pensionable service began.'. — [Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 112, in page 22, line 4, leave out from 'any' to 'calculated' in line 6 and insert

'benefit the rate or amount of which is'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 113 to 116, 119 to 123, 132, 125, 126 and 128.

Mr. Whitney: These amendments are the result of suggestions by my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts) as a result of representations from the Institute of Acturies. I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend and the institute for their help. The amendments are all of a technical nature and I shall not delay the House by going through them unless that is the wish of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 113, in line 8, leave out 'scheme' and insert 'benefit'.

No. 114, in line 9, leave out 'scheme' and insert 'benefit'.

No. 157, in line 13, leave out 'his widow' and insert 'to any other person in respect of him'.

No. 116, in line 19, leave out 'member's retirement benefits are' and insert 'benefit is'.

No. 158, in line 27, leave out 'his widow' and insert 'to any other person in respect of him'.

No. 117, in line 29, after 'include' insert—'(a)'.

No. 118, in line 31, at end insert 'and

(b) any amount which is for any reason credited to the member by way of salary notionally earned.

(6) For the purposes of the application of this paragraph to a case where a member is credited with an amount by reference to salary notionally earned over a period of time of a particular length that period shall be taken to have ended immediately before the member's actual pensionable service began.'.

No. 119, in line 31, at end insert—

'3A.—(1) This paragraph applies to any benefit the rate or amount of which is calculated by reference solely to the member's length of service.

(2) A benefit to which this paragraph applies is referred to in this Schedule as a "flat rate benefit".

(3) Subject to the following provisions of this Schedule, if the revaluation condition is satisfied, any flat rate benefit payable to the member or his widow is to be revalued —

(a) by revaluing the benefits which have accrued to him during the period mentioned in paragraph 1(2)(a) above in any way in which they would have been revalued during it if he had remained in the same pensionable service; or

(4) The method by which a benefit is to be revalued under this paragraph is whichever of the methods mentioned in sub-paragraph (3) above appears to the trustees or managers of the scheme to be appropriate.'.

No. 120, in line 32, leave out from 'any' to end of line 36 and insert

'benefit the rate or amount of which is calculated by reference to payments made from time to time by the member, or by any other person in respect of him.'.

No. 121, in line 37, leave out 'scheme' and insert 'benefit'.

No. 122, in line 38, leave out 'scheme' and insert 'benefit'.

No. 123, in line 39, leave out 'scheme' and insert 'benefit'.

No. 124, in line 41, leave out 'contributions paid' and insert 'payments made'.

No. 159, in line 44, leave out 'his widow' and insert 'any other person in respect of him'.

No. 132, in page 23, line 3, at end insert—

'4A. Nothing in paragraph 2, 3, 3A or 4 above is to be construed as requiring the revaluation of any pension or other benefit provided by virtue of paragraph 9(2)(b) of Schedule 16 to the Social Security Act 1973 by way of complete substitute for another pension or benefit.'.

No. 133, in line 15, leave out from 'if' to end of line 21 and insert—

'(a) there were omitted—

(i) from paragraph (a), sub-paragraph (ii) and the word "or" immediately preceding it;

(ii) from paragraph (b), the word "and"; and

(iii) from paragraph (c), the words from "authorised" to the end; and

(b) there were added at the end of paragraph (c), the words "and

(d) any provision of a scheme whereby—

(i) no pension, or a pension at a reduced rate, is payable to a widow whom the earner married not more than six months before his death;

(ii) the whole or any part of a pension is not paid to a widow, but instead comparable benefits are provided for one or more dependants of the deceased earner; or

(iii) no pension, or a pension at a reduced rate, is payable to a widow (or, where a provision such as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (ii) above operates, to another dependant of the deceased) who was more than ten years younger than he was".'.

No. 160, in page 23, line 24, leave out 'his widow' and insert

'for any other person in respect of him'.

No. 125, in line 23, leave out

'other than a member of a money purchase scheme'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 145, in page 24, line 25, after 'equivalent', insert 'at the relevant date'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 146 to 148.

Mr. Whitney: As drafted, the Bill bases the transfer value on the cash equivalent of accrued benefit at the time that service ends. We now think that it should be related to the value of accrued benefits either when service ends or when the application for transfer is made. Application could be made some years after service ends. We believe that it is important to ensure that the value reflects the current worth of the member's accrued rights.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 146, in page 24, line 30, leave out 'terminated' and insert 'terminates'.

No. 147, in page 24, line 31, leave out 'sub-paragraph (1) above' and insert 'this paragraph'.

No. 148, in page 24, line 42, at end insert—

'"the relevant date" means the date when the member's pensionable service terminates or the date of the relevant application, whichever is the later; and

"the relevant application" means any application which the member has made under paragraph 15 below and which he has not withdrawn.'.

No. 126, in page 25, leave out lines 14 to 22.

No. 48, in page 25, leave out lines 33 and 34 and insert 'another scheme'.

No. 49, in page 25, line 36, at end insert 'and which satisfies prescribed requirements'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 149 in page 26, line 7, leave out 'In any case where' and insert 'Where—(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 150 and 1[illegible]1.

Mr. Whitney: The amendment results from arguments advanced in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). He suggested that when a scheme buys out guaranteed minimum pensions with an insurance company after other benefits have been transferred under the provisions in part II of the schedule, members should be able to choose the company. We have not been able to go quite that far. There could, for example, be difficulties if there was insufficient money to provide guaranteed minimum pension rights with the company of the members' choice. We think that when there is a transfer to a scheme that is not contracted out the member should be able to decide that his guaranteed minimum pension right should be secured with a company of his choice. This is a small but desirable increase in freedom of choice. I am grateful to my hon. Friend, with whom my hon. Friend the Minister and I had some differences earlier this evening, for pointing the way.

[Mr. Whitney]

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 150 in page 26, line 9, leave out 'only to have transferred to that scheme' and insert 'to have transferred to it only'.

No. 151, in page 26, line 11, after 'pensions', insert 'and

(b) the member has not required them to use the portion of his cash equivalent that represents guaranteed minimum pensions in either of the ways specified in sub-paragraph (2)(b) and (c) above,'. — [Mr. Whitney.]

Mrs. Beckett: I beg to move amendment No. 50, in page 26, line 20, at end insert—

'(7) A member who has exercised an option as in sub-paragraph 2*(b)* above can subsequently require the insurance company or friendly society to provide the then cash equivalent of the annuity purchased to be reapplied as in sub-paragraph (1) above.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 51, in page 26, line 20, at end insert—

'(8) A member who acquires a right to a cash equivalent, as in sub-paragraph (2) above, will have a subsequent right within 6 months to reverse his decision.'.

Mrs. Beckett: We wish to raise here two important issues. In Committee we talked about the freedom that is being given to members of occupational pension schemes and we are anxious to extend those freedoms by means of these two amendments. First, we seek to allow members, once they have transfer value, not merely to move out of an existing occupational scheme and into perhaps some insurance-based scheme, but also, should they wish to do so, to move back out again. We see no reason why such burdens should be placed on occupational pension schemes in the interest of giving freedom to members, whereas insurance companies are allowed to continue without having to accept similar burdens.

We recall that in Committee the Minister argued that if those freedoms were desirable and necessary market forces would make insurance companies act in that way so that there was no need to put such a requirement in the Bill. It seemed to us then, and it seems to us now, that on that argument there is no need for almost all of this part of the Bill. If market forces will always force insurance companies and occupational pension schemes to do what is desirable and what their members want, there would never be any need for statutory compulsion. As there is such a need, there is a Bill and it would be better to be more even-handed between occupational pension schemes and insurance companies.

Amendment No. 51 seeks to raise the issue of a cooling-off period in explicit terms. We are not wedded to the period of six months suggested in the amendment but a specific cooling-off period should be allowed for three reasons. First, it was suggested that that would be a perfectly practicable proposal for portable pensions. Therefore, if it is practicable for portable pensions, why is it not practicable now? Secondly, it has been found to be practicable for life insurance policies, so why is it impracticable now?

Thirdly, although we recognise that the Goverment are in favour of some sort of cooling-off period and have taken steps elsewhere to deal with such a period, to put it mildly, theirs is a rather woolly proposal. They say that as long as a person has thought about what he proposes to do and as long as he has changed his mind before the transfer value has gone through and all the arrangements made, that is fine and he can withdraw. I understand what the Government are trying to do in that respect, but as the different occupational pension schemes in different companies are likely to move at different speeds the Government are really saying that a person will have to try to find out how quickly, given the particular circumstances, a transfer might go through and that that will tell a person how long a period he has in which to change his mind. That is not satisfactory. Cooling-off periods exist in other circumstances and the Secretary of State has commended them to the House and told us how possible they are for portable pensions. Obviously, we believe every word that the Secretary of State tells us and we are sure that the Minister will tell us tonight that the same can be done in these circumstances.

Mr. Whitney: I fear that the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) will not be surprised to hear me advise the House to reject the amendments. At the moment, annuities covering preserved pensions, including guaranteed minimum pensions, cannot be assigned or surrendered. We are proposing to allow assignment or surrender in prescribed circumstances. The appropriate powers are at paragraphs 3 and 11 of schedule 4. But we do not think that we should go further than that. We are confident that if there is a demand for policies which allow further transfer options, insurance companies will meet it. People will thus be able to shop around and buy the policy that they want and that best suits them.

As the hon. Lady will be the first to recognise, our view of the efficacy of market forces and their importance for pension scheme holders and applicants for insurance funds is much stronger than hers. She shows a complete lack of comprehension of the efficacy of market forces.

We have some sympathy with amendment No. 51. Indeed as she said, we promised in Committee to reconsider our position. As a result, we have brought forward amendment No. 64. That allows the application to make a transfer to be withdrawn at any time up until the scheme is committed to make payment to another scheme or insurance company. That will, in effect, provide a cooling-off period. Before deciding that they want a transfer, members will have to find out what the transfer value is. They will then need to shop around to decide how they wish to use it. Only then will they tell the scheme that they wish to have a transfer and how it is to be applied. So we have a built-in cooling-off period.

I recognise that that will not go as far as the hon. Lady might wish. We considered the road that she has invited us to take, but concluded that we could not reasonably require schemes to take back a transfer value after it had been paid. We could require schemes to delay making transfer payments, but that would be unfair to people who know what they want and had considered the position carefully before making their choice. We therefore believe that the best way to meet the point, which we agree is a good one, is by giving the right that we have already proposed under amendment No. 64.

Mrs. Beckett: We accept that the Government have to some extent moved on this matter, although perhaps not as far as we would have wished. In that light, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

9.45 pm

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 152, in page 26, line 24, at end insert—

'(1A) The power to make regulations conferred by sub-paragraph (1) above includes power to provide that cash equivalents are to be calculated and verified in such manner as may be approved in particular cases—

(a) by prescribed persons; or

(b) by persons with prescribed professional qualifications or experience; or

(c) by persons approved by the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 76 and 77.

Mr. Newton: We wish to have the power to provide that cash equivalents must be calculated and verified in a way that is approved by actuaries. In practice, that would normally happen without a statutory requirement. However, in this case we feel that the calculation of transfer value is too important a subject to leave any room for doubt. We have therefore tabled the amendment to remove the doubt.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I beg to move amendment No. 52, in page 27, line 8, at end insert—

'(4) Regulations shall provide that the cash equivalent mentioned in paragraph 10(1) shall not be less than the aggregate —

(a) of the contributions under the scheme paid by a member or on his behalf; and

(b) of any investment yield and bonuses which have arisen out of those contributions.'.

I make no apologies for raising again the question of the calculation of transfer values. I am glad to see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is present. He will recall that on Second Reading he gave a clear undertaking that, if progress was not made on the question of a formula for calculating transfer values, the Government would introduce a measure. We all know that that is second best, and I have not been encouraged by what I have read about the progress since Second Reading.

The fact that the Bill will leave the House in that state disappoints me. All the provisions on transfer values will be of little benefit to early leavers if there is not a clear formula. My amendment merely seeks to underpin whatever that formula may be. In paragraph 11 on page 25 there is a clear formula for a calculation of transfer values in relation to money purchase schemes. That is not the case for ordinary final salary schemes. My amendment merely seeks to introduce the same formula as a minimum for final salary schemes. That should be inserted into the Bill so that there is at least a guaranteed minimum.

At present there is nothing in the Bill about the formula for the calculation of transfer values, yet that goes to the heart of the entire objective of that part of the Bill.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith). I have given the matter of the valuation of the early leavers' rights in final salaries schemes a good deal of attention, and I have had the benefit of first-class advice. It is a difficult problem to solve. The most practical approach to it is to encourage occupational pension schemes to build up an earnings-related money-purchase entitlement in relation to each employee within the envelope, if necessary, of the final salary scheme. In that way, even if it is difficult to assess what the final salary scheme would give the early leaver, there is a concrete and substantial fall-back, which has been built up on conventional money-purchase lines, assisted by an appropriate measure of indexation.

On Budget day The Times published a letter which I submitted in which I recommended that in the requirements on which the Government propose to insist for the registration of all occupational schemes the element which is funded on behalf of individual beneficiaries should be identified separately from that element of the fund which is held by the trustees but which is not allocated to individuals. There is misuse of the tax provisions relating to occupational pension schemes by corporate treasurers who, when they have funds available, put them into the occupational pension fund so that they will increase without taxation.

Obviously, these funds cannot then be allocated to individual beneficiaries. If, however, the Government insisted that, in reporting to the registrar, the trustees or managers of schemes should separate that element of the fund which is identifiable as belonging to individuals from the other elements which are not allocated to individuals, the trustees could see the advantage in allocating the maximum, instead of the minimum, to individual beneficiaries. That would be a step in the right direction.

We had long discussions before the Budget on the taxation of occupational pension schemes. After taking first-class advice, I came to the conclusion that it would be entirely wrong to introduce taxation of the build-up of that element which is allocated to individuals; but I believe that the Government would be within their rights to introduce taxation of the income that arises from the unallocated fund. If they did that the trustees or managers of the schemes would choose to allocate the maximum to individuals because it would suit them to do so. When the individual's entitlement was valued because he chose to move to another scheme, he would get something much more like his real entitlement instead of, as now, a ridiculous and insulting pittance.

Mrs. Beckett: Like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), I wish to hear a comment from the Minister on the Government's reaction to the proposals that the actuaries have made, which, as I understand them, are more a statement of principles than anything that we could conceivably call a set of comparable tables. I, too, recall the assurance given by the Secretary of State that a satisfactory measure would be introduced. Although it has been suggested to me that the actuaries' proposals will do away with the grossest abuses, it is not certain that they would meet the argument that people should be given the transfer value for a given benefit, or something like it, which is what most hon. Members were expecting to get from the Bill.

Mr. Newton: There is little difference among us on this issue. I should make it clear to the House that the discussions to which my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred are making good progress, and that the actuarial profession is close to issuing its draft guidance. When it does, it will be followed as soon as possible by the Government's proposals for regulations, which will be subject to full consultation. I hope that that will give him some of the encouragement that he seeks. The matter has not been forgotten or ignored. On the contrary, we are as anxious as he is to make progress, because it is crucial to fulfilling the Government's intentions in respect of this part of the Bill.

I hope that my comments will also sound reasonably satisfactory to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) in view of the helpful attitude that she has displayed throughout the evening. Unless I am pressed further, that is probably as much as I can sensibly say now.

Mr. Tim Smith: What about my amendment?

Mr. Newton: I had hoped that my hon. Friend would enter into the spirit of happy co-operation that has pervaded our proceedings this evening—[Interruption.] I do not wish to be barracked from the alliance Benches, although I suppose I could not hope for much better.

Mr. Kennedy: I was getting at him.

Mr. Newton: As long as the hon. Gentleman is getting at my hon. Friend, not at me, I am prepared to put up with it.

My hon. Friend has fairly asked for a further explanation. The transfer provisions in the Bill will give early leavers the cash equivalent of their accrued rights under the scheme. That includes the value of any revaluation under the Bill and any increase due from the anti-franking provisions in last year's Act. Details of how the cash equivalent is to be calculated will be set out in regulations. Money purchase benefits will be treated largely on the lines suggested by my hon. Friend. What we intend here is that the transfer value should be the product of what the invested contributions are worth less any administrative expenses. Therefore, what we intend and what my hon. Friend proposes amount more or less to the same thing.

Where I differ from my hon. Friend is when we consider defined benefit schemes. Average and final salary benefits, as their name implies, are calculated in relation to salary and length of service. They do not directly reflect the individual value of contributions paid either by the employer or the employee. There is a considerable element of cross-subsidy in these schemes; for example, benefits for younger members cost less to provide than those for older members. While, notionally, employers make the same contribution for all members, what they are in fact doing is providing sufficient money, expressed as a percentage contribution for each member, to enable the scheme to meet its benefit promises. If we were to require these schemes to give transfer values based on contributions paid by employers and employees, we should in effect be destroying the cross-subsidy or pooled risk element inherent in them.

We believe that transfer values should reflect the value of preserved benefits in schemes. That is what the Bill seeks to do and we shall reinforce that in our proposals for regulations. I think that we have got the basic concept right and I hope that what I have said will be sufficient for my hon. Friend to accept the broad principle that we have followed.

Mr. Tim Smith: I do not want to get into a complicated debate now about cross-subsidies, so, in the light of what my hon. Friend said earlier about the good progress that has been made, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 127, in page 27, line 34, leave out from 'to' to end of line 38 and insert 'provide benefits to which the cash equivalent related'.

As drafted, when a member takes a transfer the Bill removes liability from schemes for guaranteed minimum pensions and benefits required by present legislation. This amendment goes further than that and removes liability for all benefits to which the transfer related. This is a point that was made in Committee and also by people outside the House. We have considered it and we accept that it is logical and are therefore implementing it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 53, in page 28, line 5, leave out from 'proceedings' to 'it' in line 8 and insert

'or proceedings before a court have been commenced against a member at any time before the expiry of the period of twelve months beginning with the date when his pensionable service terminates; and

(b)'

No. 54, in page 28, line 13, after 'duty', insert

No. 63, in page 28, line 34, at end insert

'or

(iv) the member has not take all such steps as the trustees or managers can reasonably expect him to take in order to satisfy them of any matter which falls to be established before they can properly carry out what he requires;

(b) in any case where the provisions of section 49 above apply; and

(c) in any case where a request for an extension has been made on a ground specified in paragraph (a) or (b) above, and the Board's consideration of the request cannot be completed before the end of that period.

(5A) A request under sub-paragraph (5) above may only be made by the trustees or managers.

(5B) The Board shall have power, if they are satisfied that there has been a relevant change of circumstances since they granted an extension, or that they granted an extension in ignorance of a material fact or on the basis of a mistake as to a material fact—

(a) to direct that the extension shall end on a date earlier than that on which it would otherwise have ended; or

(b) to revoke the grant of the extension.'.

No. 64, in page 28, line 38, at end insert—

'15A.—(1) Subject to sub-paragraph (2) below, a member of a scheme may withdraw an application under paragraph 15 above by giving the trustees or managers of the scheme notice in writing that he no longer wishes them to do what is needed to carry out what he previously required.

(2) Such a notice shall be of no effect if it is given to the trustees or managers at a time when, in order to comply with what the member previously required, they have already entered into an agreement with a third party to use the whole or part of the member's cash equivalent in a way specified in paragraph 12(2)(a), (b) or (c) above.

(3) A member who withdraws an application may make another.

(4) A notice to the trustees or managers of a scheme under this paragraph is to be taken to have been given if it is delivered to them personally, or sent by post in a registered letter or by the recorded delivery service.'.

No. 128, in page 29, leave out lines 24 and 25 and insert—

'(b) any benefit is an average salary benefit, a flat rate or a money purchase benefit.'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Schedule 2

Information about and Registration of Occupational Pension Schemes

Amendments made: No. 65, in page 31, leave out lines 25 to 36 and insert—

'The registrar of occupational pension schemes

56B.—(1) The Secretary of State may appoint a registrar of occupational pension schemes.

(2) The registrar may be a body corporate.

(3) The Secretary of State may set up such offices and appoint such staff as he thinks necessary for the registrar.

(4) The registrar may appoint an agent to perform functions on his behalf, other than excluded functions, and in this section "registration agent" means an agent appointed under this subsection.

(5) In subsection (4) above "excluded functions" means—

(a) functions under any of the following provisions of this Act—

(i) section 56D(5) to (7);

(ii) section 56H(2) and (3);

(iii) sections 56K to 56M;

(iv) section 56O;

(b) functions under any Northern Ireland enactment corresponding to a provision mentioned in paragraph (a) above.

(6) An appointment under subsection (4) above shall be on such terms as the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Treasury, may approve.

(7) The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit—

(a) remove the registrar from office; and

(b) direct that the appointment of a registration agent be terminated.

(8) The amount—

(a) of any salaries for the registrar and his staff; and

(b) of any sums to be paid in respect of expenses incurred by the registrar in performing his functions, shall be fixed by the Secretary of State with the concurrence of the Treasury.

(9) The expenses referred to in subsection (8) above include payments falling to be made to a registration agent.

(10) The Secretary of State may by regulations—

(a) give the registrar additional functions; and

(b) provide for the manner in which the registrar is to perform any of his functions.

(11) In relation to functions of the registrar that are being performed by a registration agent, references to the registrar in this Part of this Act or in any corresponding Northern Ireland enactment are references to the registration agent.

(12) If the registrar or a registration agent is a body corporate, this Part of this Act and any corresponding Northern Ireland enactment shall have effect in relation to that body subject to any necessary modifications.'.

No. 67 in page 31, line 42, leave out 'of any document comprising the scheme' and insert—

'(i) of the trust deed constituting the scheme, if it is constituted by such a deed; and

(ii) of any document constituting the scheme, if it is not constituted by a trust deed;'.

No. 68, in page 31, line 44, leave out 'such document' and insert

"trust deed or other document which falls to be lodged under sub-paragraph (i) or (ii) above'.

No. 69, in page 32, line 1, after 'amends', insert 'or supplements or wholly or partly supersedes'.

No. 70, in page 32, leave out lines 15 to 34.

No. 71, in page 33, line 11, after 'time' insert 'and in such manner'

No. 72, in page 33, line 13, leave out from 'scheme' to end of line 16.

No. 73, in page 33, line 18, leave out '(2)' and insert '(10)'.

No. 74, in page 34, line 27, leave out 'trustees and managers of occupational pension schemes' and insert 'the trustees of an occupational pension scheme or, if there are no trustees, the managers'.

No. 75, in page 34, line 33, at end insert 'not later than the end of such period as may be prescribed'.

No. 76, in page 34, line 44, leave out 'define' and insert 'prescribe'.

No. 77, in page 34, line 45, leave out 'and' and insert 'or

(b) provide that the persons who may so act shall be—

(i) persons with prescribed professional qualifications or experience; or

(ii) persons approved by the Secretary of State.

(3A) The Secretary of State may by regulations'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 78, in page 35, leave out lines 28 to 41.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 79, 86 and 89.

Mr. Newton: This is an amendment of which I am rather proud, as a simplication of our original proposals. For some unearthly reason we had tried to specify the paper, the colour of the paper and various other things in relation to documents lodged with the registrar. This seemed to me so absurd that we have taken it out.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 79, in page 35, line 44, leave out 'material other than a document' and insert 'other material'.—[Mr. Newton.]

Amendment proposed: No. 80, in page 36, leave out lines 41 to 44 and insert—

'(a) fees which, on performing a duty imposed'. — [Mr. Newton.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 81 and 82.

Mrs. Beckett: We do not see any reason why, under amendment No. 81, the trustees and managers of the scheme should pay the registrar out of the resources available for the purposes of the scheme. There are many circumstances in which employers would normally pay such fees rather than their coming out of the resources of such a scheme. I ask the Minister to consider this.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is right. The amendments make it clear that any registration fees will be payable by the scheme trustees or managers out of the scheme's resources and not out of their own pockets. We agree that they should not be expected to pay them out of their own pockets, and that it is reasonable that the charges necessary for the proper operation of the scheme in the public interest should be met by the scheme.

Amendment agreed to.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Social Security Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Neubert.]

As amended, again considered.

Amendments made: No. 81, in page 36, line 47, at end insert

'the trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme are to pay the registrar out of the resources available for the purposes of the scheme'.

No. 82, in page 37, line 1, leave out 'by any' and insert 'fees which are to be paid to the registrar by a'.

No. 83, in page 37, line 32, leave out from 'if' to 'shall' in line 36 and insert

'any of the requirements—

(a) of section 56C above or regulations under that section; or

(b) of regulations under section 56E(1)(c) above, is not complied with in relation to a scheme, every person who immediately before the end of the period for compliance was a person whose duty it was to comply with it'.

No. 84, in page 37, line 42, leave out

'their first conviction for it' and insert 'the conviction'.

No. 85, in page 37, line 43, leave out from beginning to end of line 3 on page 38 and insert—

'(2) Where a person is charged with an offence under subsection (1) above in respect of any requirement, subject to subsection (2A) below, it shall be a defence for him to prove--

(a) that the commission of the offence was due to a mistake or to reliance on information supplied to him or to the act or default of another person, an accident or some other cause beyond his control; and

(b) that he took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of such an offence by himself or any person under his control.

(2A) If in any such case the defence provided by subsection (2) above involves the allegation that the commission of the offence was due to the act or default of another person or to reliance on information supplied by another person, the person charged shall not, without leave of the court, be entitled to rely on that defence unless, within a period ending seven clear days before the hearing, he has served on the prosecutor a notice in writing giving such information identifying or assisting in the identification of that other person as was then in his possession.'.

No. 86, in page 38, leave out lines 4 to 19.

No. 87, in page 38, at end insert

'or regulations under that section'.

No. 88, in page 38, line 40, at end insert—

'(A) The Secretary of State may by regulations specify forms for notices under subsection (1) above.'.

No. 89, in page 39, leave out lines 19 to 21.—[Mr. Newton.]

Schedule 4

Minor and Consequential Amendments

Amendments made: No. 90, in page 42, line 25, at end insert—

'0. In subsection (1)(b) of section 66 of the Social Security Act 1973 (Occupational Pensions Board) after the word "advisory" there shall be inserted the words "or other."

No. 91, in page 42, line 26, leave out 'the Social Security Act 1973' and insert 'that Act'.

No. 92, in page 43, line 21, at end insert—

No. 93, in page 43, line 21, at end insert—

'3F. In section 122 of that Act (additional power to alter contributions), —

(a) in subsection (1), the following paragraphs shall be substituted for paragraph (a)—

"(a) the percentage rate for primary Class 1 contributions specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 3 in section 4(6B);

(aa) the percentage rate for secondary Class 1 contributions specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 4 in section 4(6E);" and

(b) in subsection (4), for the words from "4(6)" to the end there shall be substituted the words "4 of this Act by altering—

(a) the percentage rate for primary Class 1 contributions specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 3 in subsection (6B);

(b) the percentage rate for secondary Class 1 contributions specified as the appropriate rate for Bracket 4 in subsection (6E).".'.

No. 162, in page 43, line 21, at end insert—

'3C. The following subsection shall be added at the end of section 18 of that Act (duration of unemployment benefit)—

"(4) Regulations may provide for treating a person for the purposes of this section as having been entitled to unemployment benefit for any day if he would have been entitled to it but for—

(a) failure to make a claim; or

(b) failure to make a claim within the prescribed time;

but a person is not to be so treated where he shows that he did not intend, by so failing, to avoid the necessity of requalifying for benefit.".'.

No. 163, in page 43, line 21, at end insert—

Disqualifications disregarded for certain purposes

'3D. The following section shall be substituted for section 83 of that Act—

83. Regulations may provide for a person who would be entitled to any benefit but for the operation of any provision of this Act disentitling him to that benefit to be treated as if entitled to it for the purposes of any rights or obligations (whether his own or another's) under this Act which depend on his entitlement, other than the right to payment of the benefit.".'.

No. 167, in page 43, line 21, at end insert—

'3B. In section 13 of that Act—

(a) in paragraph (a) of subsection (5) (earnings factors), after the word "rise" there shall be inserted the words ", subject to subsection (5A) below," ; and

(b) the following subsection shall be inserted after that subsection—

"(5A) The Secretary of State may by regulations make such modifications of subsection (5)(a) above as appear to him to be appropriate in consequence of section 4(6B) above.".'.

No. 164, in page 43, line 23, leave out 'the Social Security Act 1975' and insert 'that Act'.

No. 94, in page 43, line 25, at end insert—

'4A. In section 134(4) of that Act (national health service and employment protection allocations)—

(a) for "determined", in each of the paragraphs defining "the appropriate national health service allocation" and "the appropriate employment protection allocation" there shall be substituted "estimated"; and

(b) for the words from "and in this subsection" to the end there shall be substituted the words "and in this subsection "estimated" means estimated by the Secretary of State in any manner which after consulting the Government Actuary he considers to be appropriate and which the Treasury has approved".

4B. In section 167 of that Act (parliamentary control of orders and regulations)—

(a) in subsection (2), for "120 or 122" there shall be substituted "4, 120, 122 or 123A"; and

(b) in subsection (3)—

(i) after "section" there shall be inserted "4,"; and

(ii) after "122" there shall be inserted ", 123A".

4C. In paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to that Act (Class 1 contributions where earner employed in more than one employment)—

(a) in sub-paragraph (1A), the following words shall be substituted for the words from "the amount" to the end—

"(a) the amount of the primary Class 1 contribution in respect of the aggregated earnings shall be determined in accordance with sub-paragraph (1B) below; and

(b) the amount of the secondary Class 1 contribution in respect of the aggregated earnings shall be determined in accordance with sub-paragraph (1D) below."; and

(b) the following sub-paragraphs shall be inserted after that sub-paragraph—

"(1B) The amount of the primary Class 1 contribution shall be the aggregate of the amounts obtained—

(a) by applying the rates of primary Class 1 contributions that would apply if the aggregated earnings were all attributable to contracted-out employments—

(i) to the part of the aggregated earnings attributable to any such employments, or

(ii) if that part exceeds the current upper earnings limit, to so much of that part as does not exceed that limit; and

(b) if that part is less than that limit, by applying the rate of primary Class 1 contributions that would apply if the aggregated earnings were all attributable to employments which are not contracted-out to so much of the remainder of the aggregated earnings as, when added to that part, does not exceed that limit.

(1C) In relation to earners paid otherwise than weekly, any reference in sub-paragraph (1A) or (1B) above to the lower or upper earnings limit shall be construed as a reference to the prescribed equivalent of that limit.

(1D) The amount of the secondary Class 1 contribution shall be the aggregate of the amounts obtained—

(a) by applying the rates of secondary Class 1 contributions that would apply if the aggregated earnings were all attributable to contracted-out employments to the part of the aggregated earnings attributable to any such employments; and

(b) by applying the rate of secondary Class 1 contributions that would apply if the aggregated earnings were all attributable to employments which are not contracted-out to the remainder of the aggregated earnings."."

No. 134, in page 44, line 13, at end insert—

8A.—(1) In section 41A of that Act (protection of earners' pensions)—

(a) in subsection (1), for "commencement of payment", in the third place where those words occur, there shall be substituted "relevant"; and

(b) the following subsections shall be inserted after that subsection—

"(1A) In subsection (1) above "the relevant date" means, subject to subsection (1B) below, the commencement of payment date.

(1B) In the application of subsection (1) above to a case where a scheme makes such provision as to any part of a pension as is mentioned in section 33(4) above, the reference to the relevant date is to be construed, in relation to the part of the pension as to which such provision is made, as a reference to the date on which by virtue of it that part of the pension commences to be paid.".

(2) Sub-paragraph (1) above shall be deemed to have come into force on 1st January 1985.

8B. The following further amendments of that section shall also be made—

(a) in subsection (2), "(1C)" shall be substituted for "(1)"; and

(b) in subsection (6), "subsections (1)(c) and (1C)(b)" shall be substituted for "subsection (1)(c) and (ii)".'

8C. In section 41B of that Act (protection of widows' pensions)—

(a) in subsection (2), "(1A)" shall be substituted for "(1)"; and

(b) in subsection (5), "subsections (1)(c) and (1A)(b)" shall be substituted for "subsection (1)(c) and (ii)".'.

No. 168, in page 44, line 13, at end insert—

'4H. The following subsection shall be inserted after section 43(1) of that Act (calculation of contributions equivalent premium)—

"(1A) Where an earner's earnings paid in any period—

(a) exceeded the lower earnings limit; but—

(b) were not such that primary Class 1 contributions within Bracket 3 fell to be paid in respect of them, it shall be assumed for the purposes of subsection (1) above that his earnings paid in that period were such that, taking the rate specified in Bracket 3 as the appropriate rate, the same amount of primary Class 1 contributions fell to be paid in respect of them as in fact fell to be paid in respect of them.".

No. 169, in page 44, line 31, at end insert—

'4J. In subsection (2) of section 44 of that Act (premium on termination of contracted-out scheme)—

(a) in paragraph (a), after the word "arrangements" there shall be inserted the words "and have not been disposed of so as to discharge the trustees or managers of the scheme under paragraph 15 of Schedule 1A to this Act"; and

(b) in paragraph (b), for the words "so subject" there shall be substituted the words "subject to approved arrangements."'

Order for Third Reading read—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, signified.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

10.4 pm

Mrs. Beckett: All I will say is that we have discussed tonight with remarkable good humour 47 sets of Government amendments. If the Bill comes back from another place with 47 sets of amendments there will be blood on the Floor.

Mr. Newton: All I want to know is whose blood it will be.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I abstained on the vote on Second Reading. Should there be a vote now, which seems unlikely, I would abstain again. This measure does not meet the needs of the early leaver and does not do what is required for the reform of national insurance. It does not make the changes in the law that have been called for for so long in relation to occupational pensions.

I believe that tonight we have marked another stage in the decline of Parliament, because we have abdicated from our responsibility to deal with matters that concern the entire population in terms of cash. It is not just small sums of money that are involved. One can only fall back on a famous poem of Arthur Hugh Clough and bear in mind that there is always another stage.

The protection of personal savings and the relationships between citizens in terms of cash are matters where clarity and moral principles are vitally necessary. In the provisions of the national insurance system and in the operation of occupational pension schemes we have neither. This places a burden on my right hon. and hon. Friends. I hope they recognise that, and that we shall not have to wait long for further measures from their Department which will put these vital matters right.

There is much that is useful in the Bill, but there is so much still to be done that one can only give it a very half-hearted welcome.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

SELECT COMMITTEES

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): If the House agrees, I shall put together the motions on behalf of the Committee of Selection.

Local Authority Contracts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lang.]

10.7 pm

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise this matter tonight. Historically there has always been a substantial degree of co-operation between central and local government, each respecting the contribution which the other has had to make. My hon. Friend knows better than most that that historic co-operation has broken down in recent years. In fact, he and his right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department have had to spend a disproportionate amount of their time trying to combat the influence of the political Left-wing in the country who have, apparently without compunction, been willing to undermine that historic co-operation for their own political ends.

Even more important, such people have showed a willingness to put their political ideology before the common law fiduciary duty which English courts have established that councillors have to their ratepayers and the recipients of their services. We all know that the Greater London Council has been one of the main offenders in this regard. That, or course, was one of the reasons for the Government introducing a measure to ensure the GLC's abolition.

So far, that Left-wing influence has been generally perceived to be confined to the large metropolitan areas. One reason for this debate is that I wish to make the House aware of the fact that that influence is now spreading to provincial cities, such as the one that I have the honour to represent, Peterborough. I assure the House that in the comments that I make tonight I have the strong and explicit support not only of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), who represents part of the city, but of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant). The reasons for that will soon become apparent.

Another reason for this debate is to ask my hon. Friend the Minister to take some action. Peterborough used to be a mecca of moderation. Indeed, it was just such a mecca until relatively recently, or more precisely, until the Left-wing of the Labour party obtained a majority in the Labour council group. That happened at the same time as a number of Left-wing so-called libertarians were elected as Liberal councillors.

We first noticed the change at the time of the miners' strike. A motion was presented to Peterborough city council congratulating the Cambridgeshire constabulary on its moderate, sensible and restrained behaviour. When the motion as put forward for debate, the mayor of the council, Councillor Palmer, a Socialist, got up and walked out of the council chamber taking the whole Labour group with him. That slur will long be remembered by my constituents. The Liberals, stressing their commitment to free speech, stayed and then voted against the motion. That slur will also be long remembered by my constituents.

Then some weeks ago, setting aside all the regular procedures, the Labour group made it possible for CND to acquire a headquarters for rent in my constituency so that it could advise those who wished to demonstrate at

[Dr. Brian Mawhinney]

Molesworth on how to evade and break the law. Again, that was done to the great dismay of the majority of my moderate constituents.

But the most serious decision took place at the council meeting held on 6 March. A Liberal councillor, Mrs. Day, not only on her own behalf but on behalf of the Labour group, introduced a motion that had the effect of instructing the council's general purposes committee to amend standing orders in order to permit the council

"to delete from the approved list of contractors"

any firm that had been, or intended to be, involved in preparatory or other work for the deployment of cruise missiles at Molesworth

"provided that the list thereafter includes a sufficient number of firms willing and able to carry out the type of work required by that section of the list."

Secondly, the motion had the effect of not adding to the approved contractors list any company known to be so involved.

Needless to say, that motion was opposed by the Conservative councillors but was carried by a combination of Labour and Liberal votes. In the motion it was made clear that that absurd and damaging decision would be purportedly taken in order to reduce the threat of nuclear war to Peterborough. That is so manifestly absurd that I am not at all surprised that my hon. Friend should laugh. Most people would laugh, if the matter was not so serious. It is quite clear that the motion's intent is to break the council's fiduciary duty to provide the most cost-effective service to my constituents. I do not treat that lightly. Thirdly, its effect will be to threaten the existence of firms and consequently the jobs of those who are employed by firms that depend upon council work for their existence. Fourthly, it quite clearly opens the door to any other extreme Left wing threat which the Labour sub-group which meets in secret, apart from the rest of the Labour group and before any meeting of that group, may even, as we speak, be dreaming up.

Having taken this foolish step, one might have expected the council to decide to rest on the gesture, but not so. It has written to 174 firms, and I understand that the firms which have received letters are greatly outraged. Complaints from such firms and, indeed, from colleagues have been made to me. Until a few days ago, only one firm had replied. The electricity board made it clear that it intended to supply electricity to Molesworth. It said effectively, "So what?" I suspect that even my council cannot face the prospect of 10,000 council houses without electricity. But the fact remains that we do not know what pressure the council will bring to bear on these firms and businesses in order to seek to force them, without any legal basis, to conform to the political prejudices of a few councillors.

As I have demonstrated that this insidious effect is spreading from the metropolitan to the provincial areas, I therefore ask my hon. Friend the Minister what the Government intend to do about it. I have received a letter from the Chief Executive of the city council in which he says:

"I know that my council is most unlikely to change its position until it is compelled to do so."

May I refer my hon. Friend to the consultative paper, with which undoubtedly he is familiar, entitled "Competition in the Provision of Local Authority Services." Paragraph 16 says:

"The Government therefore proposes to include in legislation provision the effect of which would

a. in relation to any local authority contract or invitation to tender for the supply of goods or services declare void any term or condition which is not directly related to the required performance by the contractor, his sub-contractors, or suppliers, in respect of the quality, timing or cost of the specified goods or services . . .

b. in relation to activities which are subject to statutory competition requirements enable the Secretary of State to take action against authorities which, in his view, unreasonably either set aside or negate the results of competition or act in such a way as is intended or likely to limit competition. This provision would apply both to activities covered by the existing DLO legislation and to the new proposals contained in this paper."

As I understand it, that paragraph covers precisely the point I am pressing on my hon. Friend. Therefore I welcome the consultative paper. Rather than write to my hon. Friend, let me tell him here and now that I am in favour of those proposals.

Secondly, I affirm the need for those proposals. It is the only way to stop this pernicious political cancer from spreading. I object not on political grounds, because we can win the political battle easily against such opponents, but on the ground that the ratepayers and constituents whom I represent need legal protection.

Thirdly, I welcome the proposal on behalf of moderate Labour and Liberal supporters in my constituency, and indeed a few councillors. I know that some Labour councillors, especially, are embarrassed and perhaps even ashamed at having voted for that motion. We understand why they did it. They were whipped into supporting it with the threat of deselection, as we see every day in the behaviour of Labour Members in this Chamber. The threat of deselection overcame their basic decent instincts.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister. He and his colleagues have worked tirelessly with skill and imagination to combat the problems posed by the political Left wing in local authorities throughout the land. My hon. Friend will speak for himself, but I suspect that he shares my distaste for what has happened in my constituency. The consultative paper makes clear his determination to tackle the problem at its roots.

I wish to make two simple requests to my hon. Friend the Minister. First, I ask him to condemn the decision of Peterborough city council and those Labour and Liberal councillors who, by passing it, displayed contempt for their constituents. Secondly, I ask him to commit the Government to introducing legislation based entirely on the paragraphs that I have quoted from his own consultative paper and to give a commitment that that legislation will be introduced in the next Session of Parliament.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the courteous and intense consideration that he has given to my comments.

10.21 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), with his customary force and eloquence, to which I have listened with respect on a number of occasions, has brought before us today a very telling example of what a recent pamphlet produced under the aegis of a number of people working in local government described as "The New Corruption" in local government.

The history of local government in this country does not go so far back into the mists of time as is claimed whenever we make any change. Modern local government in this country really dates from the early decades of the 19th century. The situation in the 1830s and 1840s, though different, was in some ways comparable with the situation today. In those days there was the turtle soup scandal. The old municipal boroughs — non-elected, or at any rate self-elected from small self-selecting bands — were accused, not without justice, of spending borough revenues on turtle soup which the councillors consumed for their own benefit. Today we have a perhaps even less attractive form of that scandal — what might be described as turtle soup ideological politics, the creation and consumption of private caucus-based extremist politics using the leverage and the all too weak accountability of local government, a fundamendal problem which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues have been trying to reach. Using those all too weak mechanisms of accountability, gangs of people can succeed in foisting on their electorates policies which I do not believe that the electors want for one moment.

The kind of practice to which my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough has rightly drawn attention is becoming all too common. He used the phrase "a cancer" and talked of it spreading from some of the metropolitan areas to places which all of us hoped and believed were immune from such things.

I know my hon. Friend's fine constituency town quite well, because I have to visit it on account of my other responsibilities, and I do so with great pleasure. Looking at the sensible citizens there, as I did recently when walking through the city on a fine day, I did not believe that they are behind such action. They are going about their ordinary daily business and cannot be expected, with the mechanisms available to them at the moment, to be full time on the qui vive to see that their councillors are not up to some nonsense. They trust in the system that Parliament provides for them and, in these matters, we have not provided enough protection.

In the 1830s and 1840s, Parliament had to invent the doctrine of ultra vires expenditure to put an end to the scandals of turtle soup and to tell those municipalities, "Look here, your ancient statutes might give you the right to spend money on turtle soup, but you have a greater duty, of which we are reminding you, to look to the benefits of your citizenry as a whole." We are now right to say that some of the mechanisms of accountability have become so weakened that we should step in from time to time to correct them.

Local authorities are a vital and ancient part of the plurality of decision-taking and we need them. Nobody is more committed to a decentralised and pluralistic system of decision-taking than I am, but local authorities are the creations of the statutes of Parliament and, if they have run a little out of control, it is right for Parliament to intervene.

The misuse of contractual power such as my hon. Friend described is becoming one of the standard ploys of these student-type — well, I shall not insult student politics by speaking about it in that way. Not all that long ago I was a student myself, and my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) was involved in such matters with me. I think that we conducted ourselves in a rather more dignified way. We certainly won our elections with a great deal of decision. Some of these caucuses are involved in juvenile politics. The London Labour party is the worst offender, but it is spreading. We have seen what has happened in Liverpool. The misuse of contractual power is one of the worst aspects of such politics.

The British people would be relatively grateful to local authorities if they ran their affairs with the commitment and efficiency which the best of them employ and did not take it upon themselves to stick their noses into all sorts of other organisations which might be serving the country rather better.

There is an arrogance in the type of performance that my hon. Friend described. It is unfortunate that Peterborough city council has said that it will lay down the law about the morality of defence policy. I suspect that that council was elected to keep the streets of Peterborough in good order, to provide decent housing and to provide the services that it is empowered and required to provide. It has quite enough to do in those respects without wasting money and causing unnecessary inconvenience to the inhabitants of Peterborough. That inconvenience will be much diminished if we can return a proper council under proper Conservative control, as I am sure we shall do in due course.

We have had some absurd examples from London. The recent Kit Kat snub is a good example. Greenwich council has produced lists of absurd requirements from all those who seek contracts with it. I shall not weary the House by reading it, but the list enables the council to call for all manner of papers and information concerning matters that are nothing to do with it. In today's The Times there was a wonderfully absurd example concerning an unfortunate supplier of sandwiches to a council who had been forever blacklisted by the council because he provided sandwiches to what was described as the occupying army of the police during the miners' strike.

Dr. Mawhinney: It was Chesterfield.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me. As my hon. Friend said when I laughed when he gave an account of Peterborough's behaviour, it would be funny if it was not sad. It is not funny for that small business man if he is prevented from providing a perfectly good catering service and, as a result of a childish decision, might be put out of business.

My hon. Friend asked me for some assurances, and I am happy to give them to him. He correctly quoted from the consultative paper. I assure him that the Government fully intend to take action, through legislation, to put a stop to the sort of action that he has brought to the attention of the House. The consultative paper contains two relevant proposals. This is against the background of a further drive to introduce into the provision of local authority services as a whole a further degree of competition, which I strongly believe is right. Other countries in Europe, even Socialist countries, do not assume that all services must be provided by local authorities, but that the duty of local authorities is to ensure that the services are provided at the best cost and efficiency. They must not all be done in-house. That is the drive of the Government's policy.

Within that consultative process we have made two proposals. The first is that we should include a provision to declare void any term or condition of a contract that is not directly related to the required performance by the contractor, his subcontractors or suppliers in respect of the quality, timing or cost of the specified goods or services. This is, of course, very widely drawn. However, it is not intended to undermine the contractor's duty to comply with any statutory requirements, for example, on health and safety or other employment legislation. However, it is certainly intended to cover what I call the Peterborough condition. Our intention is that that provision would apply to all local authority contracts, whether or not they were subject to the existing compulsory tendering provisions of the 1980 Act or the extended provisions that we are now proposing.

We also propose to take action to prevent, as far as we are able, action by local authorities that is quite clearly designed to distort or negate the results of fair competition under the 1980 Act. That is not directly relevant to what my hon. Friend said, but it is important because we know that they can make it impossible for competition to work properly if they bend the rules and do not give reasonable time for tenders.

On timing, my right hon. Friend has already indicated —and I confirm this tonight—in his reply to a question from my hon. Friend on 3 April that we propose to legislate in the next session. Subject to the will of this House and another place, we hope to have legislation on the statute book within the next 12 or 15 months.

I hope that what I have said tonight will demonstrate to my hon. Friend that we take these matters exceedingly seriously. It is a misuse — and corruption is not too strong a word — of the proper functions of local authorities. It is not a laughing matter — it is serious. Jobs are being lost unnecessarily and services are not as good as they should be and are more expensive because of that sort of behaviour. It would be quite wrong of the Government in 1985 to stand back from this, just as it would have been wrong for Governments in the 1840s to stand back from the turtle soup scandals.

I am very pleased to thank my hon. Friend for bringing this matter to the attention of the House and also pleased to give him the reassurances that he desires.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PETITION

9.35 am

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I have the honour to present a petition which may well be unique of its kind. It bears the common seal of the council of the city of Manchester, in pursuance of an order of the council, and thus expresses the opinion of a major city in petition form. Informed opinion has it that, if the petition is not unique, it is certainly a most unusual and important one.

The petition is about the Government's policies on buses and states that, if implemented, they could endanger concessionary fares for elderly, disabled and other people in special need, including schoolchildren and the young employed. At present these concessions are available to assist over 200,000 people in Manchester.

The policies will also mean, in the words of the petition, that transport services required for social needs will be threatened. Of all Manchester households, 60 per cent. do not have a car (compared with 39 per cent. of households nationally), and in some parts of the Inner City this figure rises to over 75 per cent. Indeed these figures conceal that the car is not always available to the whole family in one-car owning families. For example, during the working day where the family car is used for the journey to work, the remainder of the family is deprived of the use of the car, and are therefore dependent upon public transport. It is estimated that, during the working day, the percentage of households in Manchester which either do not have a car or in which the car is not available for family use rises to 85 per cent. The impact of this falls particularly on women (who as a group make greater use of public transport than men), young people and those over the age of retirement.

Among other criticisms of the policies, the petition states:

> that the strict safety standards needed for public service vehicles will not be upheld;
>
> that continuity, reliability and stability of services will end;
>
> many bus and rail services will vanish;
>
> the few services that are left will no longer connect and services will become less frequent;
>
> passengers will not know which services should run at what times, or what fares are to be charged;
>
> operators will compete with old, unsuitable buses and coaches;
> neither Users nor Ratepayers will have any say about their local public transport services;
> the vital economic activity of the City Centre in particular and Manchester as a whole will not be maintained.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will reject any legislation to implement the proposals of the White Paper on buses and the Transport Bill.

The message of the petition is one of compelling importance for tens of thousands of my constituents and for hundreds of thousands of the citizens of Manchester as a whole. That is why it bears the common seal of a great city and I most warmly commend it to the House.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered; reported, without amendment.

9.37 am

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill seeks to deal with one of the sickest crazes of the 20th century, colloquially known as glue sniffing, but which is the much wider problem of solvent abuse. It is a youthful form of self-poisoning, and the problem is, as we heard in speeches on Second Reading, found all over the country in urban and rural areas. It has been gratifying to have the support of the House for this measure. There was not one speech against the Bill on Second Reading, and support has come to me from all over the country during the intervening period.

This is the third Bill that I have been fortunate enough to bring to this stage in the House. The other two, the Consumer Safety Bill 1977 and the Licensing (Amendment) Bill 1980, gave rise to many debates and arguments, some controversy and many amendments. I remember myself tabling over 100 amendments to one of those Bills.

There has been no attempt to amend or improve the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Bill since it was first brought before the House, and I find that very gratifying. I thank in particular the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for the assistance and wise counsel that he gave me when the Bill was being drafted. I also thank the sponsors who have supported the Bill throughout, those who took part in the Second Reading debate, and my hon. Friends and Opposition Members who are here today to speak in the debate.

We know that the vast majority of the young people who indulge in solvent abuse do so out of curiosity. In many cases they do it as a group activity. They want to belong to a group in which sniffing is the current craze. The substances are cheap and easy to obtain and are to be found in every broom cupboard in every home.

As well as the large number of people who indulge in the habit as a craze or out of curiosity, there are a smaller number of serious cases of chronic addiction to solvent abuse. The usual background is that they come from unhappy or disturbed families. It is a way of seeking attention or a way of escape, and it is a very serious problem.

Those who engage in solvent abuse or sniffing only as a passing phase can, unfortunately, kill themselves in that short time. One trial sniff can lead to death, and we read about it all too often in the newspapers. They are indeed tragic events. The damage can be to the heart, to the lungs or to the brain. There is not only the problem of organs of the body being seriously or fatally damaged. Frequently accidents are caused by the intoxication resulting from abuse and many are fatal. There is the additional problem of anti-social acts done by people under the influence of solvents.

A wide range of products can be used in solvent abuse. I shall not go into all of them, but I have a table that was produced by one of the bodies concerned with the prevention of solvent abuse. It shows that 24 per cent. of the deaths in a 10 or 12-year period were due to the use not of glue—the substance most often thought of—but to gas fuels, and in particular lighter fuel. The table shows that a further 17 per cent. of the deaths were due to the use of aerosols—a particularly dangerous form of sniffing. They included fire extinguishers, anti-perspirants, air fresheners, cleaners, fly sprays, paint sprays and hair sprays—things in everyday use in every house. Glue of one form of another accounted for 27 per cent. of the deaths, and the remaining 31 per cent. were from a wide variety of products. I should not have thought that chloroform — one of the products listed — was to be found in every broom cupboard. Many others, however, such as petrol, paint thinner, plaster remover and cleaning agents, are all widely available products.

I should like to repeat the warning about aerosols. Anything that can be sprayed from an aerosol can be sniffed, and people can kill themselves by using any of those products. It happens regularly. The message should go out from this debate that aerosols are very dangerous for young people to use in the way that I have described. Many of the tragedies are due to the abuse of aerosols, and that fact is not sufficiently appreciated by parents. Most people believe that glue is the substance to avoid, but the statistics to which I have referred show that, although the sniffing of glue gives rise to death and accident, most accidents are not due to the use of glue. I repeat that aerosols are a particularly dangerous form of abuse, and all parents should be aware of that.

One of the suggestions made to me during the three months since the Second Reading is that there should be dummy containers of the abused products kept in shops. I do not think that that is a practical suggestion. Bearing in mind the wide range of products to which I have referred, it would not be practical for shops to carry on their shelves dummy containers for so many products. I have been in correspondence with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security on the subject, and he is raising the matter with the British Adhesives and Sealants Association and the British Retail Association for them to consider. Perhaps some products —glue in particular—might be dealt with in that way, but I do not think it would be practical to treat so many products in the way suggested and to have only dummies on the shelves.

Those at risk are mostly between the ages of 13 and 16. When the Bill was being drafted, it was suggested that perhaps the offence of deliberately supplying substances to youngsters should be limited to those up to 16, but the problem continues beyond the age of 16. Therefore, it seemed to me right that the limit should be 18. There has not been any opposition to that suggestion, and therefore, the age remains in the Bill at 18.

Some young people regard the sniffing of solvents as a kids' craze, but I am told that the fact that it is totally different from what adults do gives it some attraction to young immature people.

How many children take part in solvent abuse? No one really knows the answer. For obvious reasons, it is not practical to have a census, but it is thought by some researchers that as many as 5 per cent. of all children in the age group have sniffed solvents at some time, although in most cases it is a passing phase.

There has been research in Newcastle by Dr. Anthony Thorley, the director of the centre for alcohol and drug studies at St. Nicholas' hospital together with Brenda Davies, the senior registrar in psychiatry, and Mr. Dennis O'Connor at Newcastle university, to whom I referred on Second Reading, who runs a very successful clinic for people suffering from the problem. Those three people have produced a study which suggests that, of the 5 per cent. of 15-year-olds who engage in sniffing, 10 per cent. — one in 200 of those children — continue sniffing beyond that age into young adulthood. That is a serious factor.

In the three months since Second Reading I have been keeping a note of developments in my area in the north-east. I do not think that that area is any different from the rest of the country. There has been a continuation of the distressingly regular series of tragedies and problems caused by solvent abuse. In February, an 18-year-old boy was convicted of indecent behaviour which was brought about by his being under the influence of glue. There have been several cases of burglary. In one of those cases the 19-year-old involved pointed a gun at a policeman. The policeman found himself with a gun at his temple held by someone in a fairly crazed condition. Fortunately, the policeman was able to seize the gun. Although it proved to be a very accurate replica, it was a worrying and terrifying incident for him. Those burglaries and other incidents have been carried out by children in their late teens, not by children in their early teens.

There has been trouble on our splendid Tyneside metro system. A train had to come to an emergency stop because a youth, intoxicated by sniffing, was in front of it. There was a crowd of sniffers around at the time. A 12-year-old sniffer of gas went berserk when his cartridge of gas was removed from him. He ransacked his house, and the police had to be called. In February, an 18-year-old boy was found to have permanent damage to a lung as a result of sniffing. Last month an 18-year-old girl, who had been sniffing all day, collapsed and died three days later from irreparable brain damage. In March, there was a fortunate escape by a 16-year-old girl who had been sniffing for a long time and who collapsed. Fortunately, the ambulance was called speedily. She lived near the ambulance station, and within three minutes of her collapse the ambulance men were there. They saved her with seconds to spare as she was turning blue. I am told by the local ambulance service that there is now about one call a day to deal with serious cases of glue sniffing. The ambulance men find that the young people can be violent and strong as a result of the intoxication to which they have subjected themselves.

One of the particularly worrying factors that has come out of the research by Dr. Thorley and his colleagues is the way in which a small but significant number of those who have become serious addicts of solvent sniffing go on to hard drugs. After four or five years of sniffing glue, they turn to sniffing heroin and end up injecting it. Let me give two examples.

First, there was an 18-year-old girl who had sniffed for seven years since she was 11. At 17 she started taking LSD tablets together with solvents, and spent 12 hours a day on that activity. It is hard for us to understand how young people can spend a whole day doing that, but she did, and she took heroin whenever she could get hold of it.

Secondly, a 20-year-old girl had sniffed for six years from the age of 14. When she was 18 she moved on to LSD and heroin.

To add to the tragedies caused by abuse of solvents there is the danger of the activity extending into hard drugs, with permanent effect. On Second Reading I referred to a young man who told me that he had spent 12 or 14 hours a day consuming a litre of glue. It is terribly hard to understand how anybody could absorb a litre, but it appears to be a regular occurrence for hardened addicts. I am old enough to have difficulty in understanding litres. I am one of those who nowadays never knows how much petrol I am putting into my car except by the price. I tend to think of a litre in terms of the amount of whisky that one can bring back duty free from one's holiday. However, I am not sure whether whisky is a good subject to refer to in a debate on abuse——

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): There are more people addicted to that.

Mr. Trotter: As the hon. Gentleman says, more people are addicted to whisky.

I understand that a litre is 1¾ pints, and a pint is something that I do understand. From my earliest days, I have known the size of a pint of milk. Therefore, a litre is getting on for 2 pints. That is the quantity of these substances being consumed daily by some people. It is a very large amount. The substances are also relatively cheap—much cheaper than whisky.

At present the police are powerless to prevent glue from being deliberately sold to children for sniffing purposes. On the one hand, dollops of glue in old crisp bags are sold in kits tragically known as "happy bags", and, on the other hand, hardened addicts buy and consume a litre of glue. In England and Wales, the police are powerless to do anything about it. As we know, in Scotland, under the different legal system, it has been established that the police have the power to act. The Bill simply seeks to bring into statute law in England and Wales the rules which now exist in Scotland.

I believe that the existence of such a law will act as a powerful and effective deterrent. On Second Reading the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) referred to the clang of gaol doors. I like that expression. I believe that the threat of the clang of gaol doors will deter evil shopkeepers. In the House we argue about the extent to which gaol sentences act as a deterrent to criminals. I believe that that threat will be a successful deterrent against the sort of person who is deliberately selling glue for that dreadful purpose.

Not only those who deliberately sell glue but those who are wilfully blind will be affected. It is in no way my intention to put at risk the ordinary shopkeeper. Some shopkeepers have expressed concern, but no formal representations have been made to me on behalf of shopkeepers. I think that they understand, and I am sure that they all abhor the deliberate sale of poison in that way. The ordinary shopkeeper is appalled by it, as we all are, and understands that he is not being put at risk. I fully understand the problems that shopkeepers face when a child comes in and asks for a product. If they make a genuine mistake they will not be at risk. They should use their discretion and not supply the product if they have any doubt. I hope that they do so now. Shopkeepers in my area tell me that that is their practice. If a boy who they have reason to suppose may want to use the product for sniffing comes into the shop, they do not supply it. I am sure that they are right in not doing so.

[Mr. Trotter]

For those who deliberately sell glue recklessly and without regard to what it might be used for, the punishment should be gaol or a heavy fine. The Bill provides for a six month gaol sentence or a £2,000 fine. When the Bill was drafted, I wondered whether the House might wish to alter those penalties, but it has not done so. Hon. Members have agreed with my judgment and that of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department that that is the correct level.

We had it in mind that the penalty could be imposed in the magistrates courts. It is widely felt that such an offence should be dealt with speedily before the magistrates. If they felt that an offender had behaved in an appalling and large-scale way, and that more than six months' gaol was called for, I imagine that they could impose consecutive sentences. I cannot conceive that a case would be brought on a single incident of selling glue. We are talking about people who have a record of selling it in large quantities.

I remind the House that in Scotland gallons of glue were sold in small corner shops when in no way could gallons of glue have been needed in the normal course of business. Some people were buying it a litre at a time and even more were buying those dreadful happy kits, with a few spoonfuls of glue in an old crisp packet. No shopkeeper would sell glue in an old crisp packet without knowing exactly what it was being used for. People doing so will be doing it on a large scale. It is possible for the courts to impose consecutive sentences if they wish. In Scotland, two-year gaol sentences were imposed.

The police know who is involved in and guilty of such activity. The authorities in Tyneside told me that they have been aware that a fish and chip shop has also been selling glue. A hot dog seller is also known to have provided glue. No reasonable person could suppose that the sale of glue with fish and chips or hot dogs was a normal trading activity. It is the people who do such things that the Bill is designed to deal with, not the normal corner shopkeeper who has no wish to engage in this wicked trade.

There has recently been an interesting development on Tyneside. After four years' research, a firm called Plus Products reckons to have produced a solvent-free glue. Glue is not the only problem — most of the serious accidents are caused by other substances — but in the case of casual sniffing glue is the substance most commonly sniffed. If a successful solvent-free glue could be produced, that would be a great achievement. Mr. Perry, who runs Plus Products, tells me that one could sniff the glue for as long as one liked and it would do one no harm, and that the glue performs just as well as normal glue. If that is so, the product has a very good future. The product is called Plustex C3530. That means little to me, but it may mean something to my more technically minded colleagues. It may be more expensive than ordinary glue, but it goes much further. We must follow that development. I shall encourage Mr. Perry to the best of my ability, and I am pleased that this breakthrough is a Tyneside development.

There is a need for education by teachers and by parents, and for education of teachers and of parents. This matter does not fall directly within the scope of the Bill, but it has been suggested to me on Tyneside that all local authorities should be required to prepare a plan to deal with the problem in their area and perhaps to report each year on what they are doing about solvent abuse. There is a precedent in that authorities are already required to prepare such a plan to deal with problems of cruelty to children. I am satisfied that everything possible is being done on Tyneside to deal with the problem, but I am not sure what is being done elsewhere in the country. It may be that other areas are equally aware of the problem. Nevertheless, it might be a good idea if each local authority had to produce an annual report.

The solvent manufacturers are at present represented by the British Adhesives and Sealants Association. The members of that body are good citizens who are very much concerned about the abuse of some of their products. They have gone to considerable lengths to assist in dealing with the problem, and I understand that they have plans for even greater efforts in the future. The subjects to which they are devoting their attention are the alleviation of the suffering arising from abuse, the education of the public about the dangers, the promotion and support of research into the problems and the dissemination and publication of the results of that research for the benefit of the public. There may also be the endowment of scholarships for the support of relevant research work. The association proposes to increase its activities. I believe that it intends to hold an international conference on the subject next year. The House will congratulate the association on its efforts.

The Bill is deliberately short, and I hope that it will be effective. It has a very straightforward aim. I believe that it will lead to the closure of an obvious loophole in the law. It will not eradicate the problem. The substances are too readily available in every broom cupboard, bedroom and bathroom as well as in the shops. It will not deal with the social and family problems that often give rise to serious abuse. However, it will provide a weapon to be used against the evil men who deliberately profit from this sick craze. The Bill will provide a weapon that does not yet exist, and will help to reduce the supply. Each death prevented will make the Bill worth while. The sooner the Bill appears on the statute book, the better.

10.6 am

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Once again I congratulate the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) on his initiative in bringing forward the Bill, his good sense in restricting it to a narrow and non-controversial area, and his expertise in steering it so successfully towards the completion of its stages in this House. It is not the Opposition's purpose to delay or obstruct the Bill. We have some qualifications about what it may achieve in practice, and there may be some problems, but we support the Bill and wish to see it on the statute book.

Solvent abuse does not attract as much attention today as it did at the time when the hon. Gentleman first thought of the Bill. It has been overshadowed—certainly in my own area of Merseyside—by the increasing problem of the use of heroin and cocaine. Heroin is now much more readily available, and there are increasing quantities of high-quality cocaine on the streets at relatively low prices. Those much more dangerous drugs are therefore now being used by a larger number and a wider variety of young people, some of whom might otherwise have used solvents. The problem has moved away from the abuse of solvents towards the addiction to heroin and cocaine.

To some extent, the problem of solvent abuse disappears, as the user tends to move on from that form of abuse to other in many ways much more dangerous drugs, or, indeed, to alcohol. Solvent abuse is not, apparently, the problem today that it was 18 months or two or three years ago. The problem is now much more serious, and on a much larger scale. However, we all know from experience in our constituencies that solvent abuse is a considerable problem, not least for the parents of the children concerned.

We have all had letters from, or met at our surgeries, parents who are deeply worried and upset because they have found out that their children have been abusing solvents. They feel themselves to be failures. They feel helpless to confront the problem. They do not know how to deal with it. Quite apart from the problems for the user, solvent abuse certainly creates considerable problems and much distress for his family. There are also the incidental anti-social effects that have been alluded to. Many crimes are committed, not because the person concerned is inherently criminal or would in more lucid moments have embarked on an act of criminality, but because he—or she—is under the influence of some solvent substance. He might commit indecent exposure or burglary, or some more horrendous crime of malicious actual bodily harm. There has been one widely publicised case of murder. Such crimes can occur because of the effect on young people of sniffing glue or other solvents.

More disturbing are the deaths, of which there were 282 from volatile substances between 1971 and 1983—there were 80 in 1983 alone—72 per cent. of which were of people under 20. As the hon. Gentleman said, the addiction tends to be concentrated in the younger age group. When considering how the Bill will work, it is important to note that 31 per cent. of those deaths were accounted for by the use of cleaning agents, 27 per cent. by the sniffing of glues and 24 per cent. by the inhalation of lighter fuels and the like. It is worrying that volatile substances can be the cause of death, but it is even more worrying that there is such a massive and terrible waste of young life in such horrible and disturbing circumstances.

It is a great pity that the Bill and its passage through the House has attracted relatively little attention from hon. Members, many of whom want at other times to make great play of the problems of solvent abuse. They seem not to take a great interest in the subject when it comes to doing something, or attempting to do something about it.

As I have said before, the Bill does not address itself to the real problem of solvent abuse, nor does the hon. Gentleman pretend that it does. It provides no more than that it will be an offence for a retailer to supply solvents to people under 18, knowing that they are likely to be inhaled. That is a perfectly reasonable objective. Nobody should knowingly aid and abet young people in this anti-social, unhealthy and distressing practice. If anyone is prepared to take that responsibility knowingly, he ought to be regarded as having committed a criminal offence and be convicted for it.

Nobody should profit from young people's addiction to or affliction by solvents. In that regard, the Opposition have supported and will continue to support the Bill. However, most retailers do not knowingly aid and abet the purchase of solvents for sniffing. The overwhelming majority—99·9 per cent.—of retailers would not wish in any way to aid or abet such a practice or to profit from it. As the hon. Gentleman said, there are a few evil people who profit, but the vast majority are only too willing to abide by the Government's guidelines. My evidence is that those guidelines are being adhered to conscientiously and, in many cases, enthusiastically. It is perhaps not amiss that the Bill reinforces those guidelines.

We must ensure that the public are aware that the Bill is limited. They should not have grandiose expectations of it. The Bill is limited simply by the fact that 39 per cent. of those who abuse solvents steal them. They will not be caught as a result of the Bill. A further 33 per cent. get somebody else to buy the solvents. When the Bill becomes law, that percentage will rise because young people will not run the risk of being embarrassed in public by retailers, but will get older and unaware people to buy the solvents. Only 15 per cent. of solvent abusers themselves purchase the product. it is therefore only that 15 per cent. who could be caught. It is obvious that that figure will change.

Some people will be caught by the Bill. Some retailers will be identified as embarking on this evil, vicious and anti-social trade and be prosecuted and convicted. Nevertheless, I suspect that, when in two or three years' time we consider how the Bill has worked, we shall find that it has had little impact. I hope so, because I hope that most retailers are law-abiding. The real need, as the hon. Gentleman began to say, is for comprehensive health and social education of children likely to be at risk, and their parents. As with drug abuse generally, it is essential to give help, counselling and education to the parents of children who might become drug or solvent abusers. It is also important to have a well-thought-out strategy of training for professionals. Many social workers, health officials and teachers are not sufficiently trained in the recognition of symptoms or the type of help that they should give a solvent abuser or a drug misuser. I am aware that much is being done, but nobody will pretend that it is enough. We should provide far more services for solvent and drug abusers.

The central funding initiative and the £10 million is welcome, but it is not enough, given the increasing scale of the problem. If we are to believe what the Minister is telling every radio and television station—that we are confronted with an epidemic of heroin and cocaine abuse—and if the quantities of those drugs entering the country are increasing as alleged, it is clear that £10 million, significant though that sum is, is a drop in the ocean compared with what is needed to provide additional services for those in need.

I shall put the Opposition's anxieties on the record in the hope that they will help to inform those who have to implement the Bill and because they should be on the record for when the other place considers the Bill and what changes might be appopriate. The first concerns the phrase, "reasonable cause to believe". Retailers must refuse to supply solvents to young people if they have reasonable cause to believe that that young person is likely to inhale them. Responsibility is put on the retailer to ensure that he is not committing a crime.

I am not jibbing at that, but the problem is that many retailers might become over-cautious when supplying solvents to those aged under 18. Many young people might be prevented from buying perfectly innocuous substances such as paint strippers, petrol, glues and cleaning fluids which they, or somebody who has sent them, want to use for perfectly legitimate purposes. If there is a great deal of police activity and public concern about solvent abuse in a particular area, individual retailers may be over-timid about selling solvents to anyone under the age of 18. It would be most unfortunate if young people were discriminated against and publicly humiliated in a crowded shop by a retailer refusing to sell an article to them, with the implication that they must be disreputable drug or solvent abusers.

That problem has been compounded by the unfortunate remarks about punks made on many occasions by the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), whom I am glad to see present today. On every occasion the hon. Gentleman has identified someone dressed like or otherwise resembling a punk as being ipso facto a solvent or drug abuser.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): That is misrepresentation.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: It is on the record.

Many of the voluntary organisations with which I am associated are staffed by people who adopt bizarre and frightening clothes and hair styles which I should certainly not adopt or wish my children to adopt, yet those people are the most sensitive and hard-working and often the most cautious and timid. To tar them with the brush of solvent or drug abuse, as the hon. Member for Ealing, North has done on three occasions in the House——

Mr. Greenway: I have never done that.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: It is in Hansard. It is an unwarranted slur and I fear that it will compound the problems that may occur under the Bill. We cannot have retailers automatically refusing to sell glue to anyone with orange hair or studs round his belt. That is unfair to the retailer and to the young person and it will cause great animosity and controversy, which we can well do without. I hope that it will not happen and that most retailers will have a better knowledge of young people than that displayed by the hon. Member for Ealing, North and will use the powers provided by the Bill with far more sense than he would.

I am also concerned about the meaning of the word "substance". How are retailers to interpret that concept? For instance, they may conclude that lighter fuel is a substance which they can refuse to sell, but that a disposable lighter is not. Again, Tipp-Ex thinner is presumably a substance, while Tipp-Ex fluid is not. A host of similar anomalies will arise if retailers are asked to make definitions which no hon. Member would be able to make and which lawyers may find extremely difficult to interpret. It will be no use if the potential abuser merely buys a different product which has the same effect but is not a "substance".

The most important caveat about the effect of the Bill in practice is that it may restrict availability of the less toxic substances. The substance most widely associated in the public mind with solvent abuse is glue. In the House, too, when discussing volatile substances we tend to talk about glue sniffing. Therefore, retailers will tend to be most cautious, nervous and restrictive about the sale of glue. If that happens, young people will turn to aerosols, cleaning products and other substances which are more likely to be supplied but which do the most irreparable damage. Those substances are the killers. No one wants to legislate to ensure that young people switch from glue to even more dangerous substances, but that could be the unfortunate and unintended consequence of the Bill, and we must guard against it. Retailers must be alerted to that risk. For that reason, it will be necessary to monitor the working of the legislation very carefully.

Most important of all, we must not over-sell the likely effect of the Bill. We endorse and support its Third Reading, but we do not want it to raise false hopes or to pretend that it is a major step towards solving the problem of solvent abuse. Solvent abuse will continue on much the same scale the day after the Bill becomes law as the day before. We must also not pretend that the Bill deals with the problem of drug abuse in any real or meaningful way. We must not allow this legislation to distract our attention from the real issue of identifying and dealing with the causes of solvent and drug abuse.

Above all, in the polite, all-party, non-contentious atmosphere that tends to prevail on Fridays in relation to Bills of this kind, when we are all working together as we should in the interests of all our constituents and irrespective of party politics, we must never forget that the major responsibility for dealing with drug and solvent abuse rests with the Minister and the Government. It is their problem, but in many cases they are not living up to their responsibilities in the way that they should.

We must also take into account the social and economic circumstances in which solvent and drug abuse flourish. Whatever the actual causal relationship, we know that there is a major and significant relationship between high unemployment, poverty, social deprivation and inadequate housing and the problems of solvent and drug abuse. Of course, as recent well-publicised instances have shown, some people at the top of the social scale with good job opportunities and large incomes are solvent or drug abusers. We do not deny that. Nevertheless, the largest concentration of solvent and drug abuse is in decaying inner city areas and in the decaying outer estates of areas such as mine. The Government have a great responsibility for having created those conditions, and an even greater moral responsibility to take action to eliminate those social and economic conditions and the abuses to which they give rise.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): It is a pity that the reasonably well-informed speech of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) included a totally ill-informed, unwarranted and disgraceful attack on me. The hon. Gentleman had the gall to claim that I classified all punk rockers as glue sniffers because on one occasion —not two or three—I thought it right to bring to the attention of the House a most distressing example that I had witnessed of glue being sold to a punk rocker. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will do his homework properly next time. I remind him of what I said on that occasion, and I stand by it. I said:

> "I went into a well-known shop the other day, and as I was being served a punk rocker came in. He asked for glue and was sold glue. A man standing next to me said to the person who had sold the glue, 'You know that glue is going to be abused.' The man behind the counter said, 'Yes, I do, but what is it to me if people choose to kill themselves in that way?' That is disgraceful. The Bill will overcome that and I welcome it in that spirit."—[Official Report, 18 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 660.]

That is the single example of a punk rocker that I used. I took one instance, and the person buying the glue just happened to be a punk rocker.

When I gave that example, I was not saying that all punk rockers are likely to do the same thing in the same way, just as I would not say that somebody who is dressed in a particularly slick way is a slicker and financially devious, and that all other slickers are the same. I would not bracket all City gents with the actions of one City gent, however sweet and charitable, or whatever. The hon. Gentleman has some knowledge of these matters and he is usually an honest debater, but it was unworthy of him to speak like that.

I join in the hon. Gentleman's congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) on his great success in bringing the Bill before the House and on the fact that it will be the third Bill that he has got on to the statute book. That is no mean achievement for a Back Bencher.

The problem of glue sniffing relates to all ages, from tots to adults, and even people in middle age. We know that on average 10 per cent. of all children in schools sniff glue. In some schools the percentage is as high as 14 per cent. and rising, so it is a serious matter. Between 1971 and 1981 there were 169 deaths from glue sniffing. In 1981, there were 45 deaths, and in 1983, there were 80 deaths, as the hon. Member for Knowsley, North said, and the figure is still rising.

In between the first sniff of glue or solvent and death all sorts of damage can be caused to the individual. We hope that elimination of such problems will be helped by the Bill. From the staggering around of tots who have sniffed glue to the deaths of people of all ages from glue sniffing, people can suffer the most terrible brain damage. I know about one man whose brain was so damaged by glue sniffing that, on release from prison, he was unable to lead a coherent normal life and was soon back in prison because he committed further offences.

I hope that the Bill will go some way, although I know that it will not go all the way, towards overcoming the problem. I have presented two Bills to the House relating to the problem of glue sniffing and solvent abuse because of my long concern over the matter. I have received four petitions in two years from constituents—two from head teachers, one from a parent and another from a classroom teacher—each with hundreds of signatures and in one case with thousands. They have all pleaded for action. Effectively, the Bill is the first action that the House has been able to take since I received those petitions. The fact that they came from parents, teachers and head teachers is a sign of the particular concern felt by those who are involved in bringing up and educating young people.

I should particularly like to see more glues of the type mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth as being produced in his constituency, which are solvent-free and therefore not open to any abuse. Dunlop has produced such a glue as well, as has EVODE. I hope that all manufacturers will bend their minds to the production of such glues, because it has been shown that it can be done.

Education is part of the answer in the long term. However, there is heavy pressure on the school curriculum, so there is not much room for a great deal to be said about the problem of glue sniffing when teachers have also to deal with drugs and so many other problems. We shall be heavily dependent upon what the Bill can do to lessen the difficulties that glue sniffers and their families are facing.

I welcome the Bill for its limited value in making it a committable offence deliberately to supply toxic substances to young people for inhalation. That brings English law into line with Scottish law, and the supply of toxic substances into line with the peddling of drugs to some extent. The two are closely related.

Motivation is obviously an important factor. That needs to be emphasised, so that shopkeepers and shop assistants do not feel too stressed when faced with the consequences of the Bill. From my knowledge of the matter, I know that those addicted to solvent abuse can buy as much as a litre a day. If a shopkeeper or shop assistant is asked for such a quantity of solvent every day by the same youth, such an individual should become suspicious. The Bill will cover such circumstances. Therefore I welcome it.

It is clear that those who are addicted are keen and sometimes desperate to get a regular supply of solvent, with no questions asked. Therefore, they are not likely to go to the same shop every day, once the Bill comes into force. That, perhaps, is one of its weaknesses. Mothers of addicts have written to me about their children's problems and expressed frustration about the Bill. They feel that there are so many different outlets where addicts can purchase solvents—DIY shops, department stores, local shops, Woolworth, and so on—that they need never arouse suspicion. That is especially true of large shops which have frequent staff changes, tea breaks and shifts and many different cash points.

Much depends on where addicts live, but it seems characteristic of addicts that they are devious in pursuit of their addiction, and we need to bear that point in mind as we examine the Bill on Third Reading. Recently, I received the most harrowing letter that I have ever received, from the mother of an addict. Her son, who has indulged in solvent abuse for three years, is now 18 years old. His name is Daniel. He is a Londoner, but he could come from anywhere. The mother argues that his addiction has helped to cause the death of her husband, the loss of her addicted son's job and the break-up of the family.

The worst part of the story is that the mother cannot get any help from anywhere. Everyone has washed their hands of this lad. While he was still legally a juvenile, the police would take him in for his own protection for being drunk and disorderly on glue, which he had been free to purchase, but which he may be less free to purchase as a result of the Bill. Other support aid agencies no longer take an interest. What is almost worse is that he is a social outcast, and unemployed. His mother thinks that he now sniffs glue almost 24 hours a day.

Does any agency exist that can help, if prompted, in this situation? If it does, I should be glad to know of it, because this Third Reading debate gives an opportunity to draw attention to what the Bill is seeking to do and perhaps to relate other curing agencies to it at the same time. There are many such sad cases that desperately need help.

I support the Bill strongly for its limited value. It will end the terrible, wicked situation of which my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth spoke when he moved the Second Reading and again today, whereby people can go into a shop and buy fish and chips and glue at the same time. That is dreadful and wicked. It is an obvious abuse with which the Bill will deal.

I went recently to a church residential centre where a youth high on glue had cut his wrists and run amok one night. The priest in charge told me that that youth always went to the same place and had no difficulty in obtaining glue. The youth received hospital treatment, and with bandaged wrists returned to the centre a day to two later, when again he ran amok. The priest in charge and others had the terrifying and difficult job of trying to control, help and save him from himself while he was high on glue. It appeared that he had purchased the glue at the same place, even though it must have been obvious to the shopkeeper that he was in an unstable medical condition. The Bill will ensure that that sort of thing does not recur. I felt agonised for those who were attempting to deal with that youth. The law is weak without the amendment that the Bill will introduce. There is no referral agency that the church residential centre can call in aid.

Surely it is right to punish drug pushers and shopkeepers who knowingly sell glues and solvents to would-be sniffers. The Bill is absolutely right in principle. Some shopkeepers have told me that they expect to face considerable pressure and stress as a result of the Bill when they refuse to sell solvents to regular clients. We should not make too much of this, but the House should face the problem and offer some advice to individual shopkeepers who will be obliged to refuse to sell glues and solvents to those who are already high on them. Shopkeepers must not panic. They should try to lecture the youngster or expect very much self-control on his part. No purpose will be served by being critical of him or by giving him lectures. I think that shopkeepers would be well advised, when faced with that situation, to call in the police or the help of social service agencies. The House must accept that difficulties may arise as a result of the Bill's enactment and should offer coherent advice.

In the Daily Express of 18 April, and in one or two other newspapers, there were reports of the deaths recently of two glue-sniffing brothers who died within four weeks of each other while in council care. Their heartbroken mother, Mrs. Angeline Coyne, who is only 37, said:

"If it had not been for glue sniffing, my sons would be alive today, yet no one seems to be able to do anything."

I have spoken to medical people and there is no doubt that glue sniffing is the thin end of the wedge which leads to general drug abuse. We are aware of the seriousness of drug abuse, and the link between that and glue sniffing is clear. One leads to the other. It seems that glue sniffing is part of the general drug abuse scene. That is emphasised by the report that appeared in the Daily Express and in other newspapers.

The chairman of the Leeds social services committee has claimed that the police are turning a blind eye to the problem, but we must recognise that the police do not have the power that they need without the enactment of the Bill. That is why I welcome it with renewed zest and enthusiasm.

I shall conclude by reading a short extract from the letter of the mother of Danny, who, as I have said, has been a glue sniffer for three years. He is now thought by her to be sniffing glue 24 hours a day on some occasions. He has his known sources of procurement. However, he will be limited, to some extent, in that procurement because, when the Bill is enacted, he will not be able to go to the same sources. The shopkeepers know him. They know that if they serve him glue he will sniff it. Once the Bill is enacted, they will be aware that they will be breaking the law if they sell him solvents. They will be aware also of the penalties for doing so.

Danny's mother wrote:

"Danny got on the Youth Training Scheme—he loved it. He also went on work experience to one job learning car mechanics for three months and then to another job to do arc welding for three months. The only time he went glue sniffing was at the week-ends and it looked like we were getting back to being a normal family again. I felt sorry for my younger son Peter, because he is a good boy and he has to live with all the misery of his mother and brother.

The last job Danny did closed down at Christmas, and he hasn't even looked for a job since. He is probably on glue 24 hours a day. He takes it to bed with him and starts sniffing the minute he wakes up, so we have rows every morning and night now. I have told him to go out and not come back, but where can he go? We have no other family or friends. All Danny's mates have grown out of glue and ignore him now. I think he is always on his own. Last week the Careers Office 'phoned him and asked him to go and see them, and he came back and said he had an interview for a job in the Cumberland Hotel in two days' time, but he had to wear black shoes and black trousers, which he didn't have because he always wears jeans and trainers. He was so enthusiastic about getting this job as a bus boy. I went out with him and spent my electric bill money on getting him a pair of black shoes and trousers, which cost me nearly £40, but I was hoping he might get the job. He looked really smart and I was just as disappointed as he was, when he didn't get the job. So we are back to square one again.

A few days ago, Danny came home early and locked himself in the bathroom to glue sniff. He started shouting and swearing and saying he wished he was dead."

Danny is 18. The letter continues:

"He was sick of this life, and me, and this house, and his brother. I tried to speak calmly to him. I was scared he might try and kill himself, when my younger son came in and tried to break the bathroom door down. I 'phoned Carter Street Police Station and asked them if there were any Police passing could they call here, because my son was a glue sniffer and he had locked himself in the bathroom and my other son was trying to break the door down trying to get him out. (No wonder nobody talks to us.) Five minutes later two Officers called and they persuaded him to come out. One of the Officers took him into his bedroom to have a talk and I helped the other to find the tin of glue. He said he would take it away. They said its a shame to see a young boy in such a state, there are so many kids on glue or drugs these days, but Danny wasn't breaking the law, its O.K. to sniff glue. They admired all his boxing trophies in the front room and asked him if he was still boxing. He said 'No', and they went. They also told me to 'phone up anytime we needed help. The next day Danny was back on glue. When I think that there are so many places for drug addicts so much help also for alcoholics and even gamblers, but people don't realise that glue is dangerous. It's only if it is in your own family do you find out all the misery and upset it can cause. We are not a family any more.

It is so easy to buy solvents."

This is where the Bill will help. Danny's mother adds:

"All the DIY shops must know when a boy goes in each day to buy glue what he wants it for? Do they care? Even Woolworths sell it. It is too easy for any child to get started and end up hooked on it, just like a drug, that can cause so much heart break for a victim and his family who have to live through all this with him. We are watching him kill himself with a slow poison.

Please do something before it is too late for my son. I don't want him to be just a memory."

The Bill will help a little.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): The hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) and I represent neighbouring constituencies. We are both well aware of the scale of the problem in the north-east, especially in the Tyne and Wear area, and we are saddened and concerned about the number of our constituents who have lost children as a result of the problem.

Oddly enough, I first raised the matter some five years ago, and it was referred to the Minister for Consumer Affairs to ascertain whether the chemical industry in particular could make a product with adhesive qualities without being dangerous. I regret that after much research the chemical industry cannnot find the right product and the adhesive manufacturers, who in the main purchase from the large chemical companies, have also admitted defeat. Therefore, I am somewhat heartened to learn that a firm on Tyneside, Plus Products, may be moving towards some solution, or partial solution, of the problem, but it would be foolish to be too optimistic, given the scale of the problem.

I must disagree with the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), because the Northumbria and Durham police have involved themselves considerably in this matter. In my constituency the police, in co-operation with councillors, have organised a series of public meetings and have shown the horror films on this subject. They have had good support from teachers, social workers and many youth organisations in the area, but regrettably, the problem continues on the same scale.

In last night's edition of the Newcastle Evening Chronicle there was a report of a public meeting at Consett which was attended by over 400 people who went to hear the experts speak on the dangers of various drugs. A mother, who is not named, told the horror story of her son who is being paralysed as a result of drug abuse. I shall not give details of the particular method that he used because I do not want it to receive too much publicity.

I also want to pay tribute to the provincial press, particularly The Journal and the Evening Chronicle, for their long, sustained and responsible campaign to highlight the scale of the problem. It is noteworthy that in this article Detective Inspector Harvey Harrison of the Durham drugs squad highlights the responsibility of parents in analysing their children's behaviour. He highlights some simple points, which it does not take an expert to observe. He says that parents should look for glazed eyes or slurred speech, tinfoil used for the smoking of heroin, minute scales used for weighing drugs, a general lack of interest in appearance and dress and, above all, whether a normal healthy child has a lack of interest in the opposite sex. Clearly, those basic symptoms should be readily observed.

I should like to see such matters raised more publicly. A long campaign is required. The problem will not go away. I disagree somewhat with my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) when he says that the drug problem is superseding that of solvent abuse. The drug problem is increasing in the United Kingdom and it is causing the Minister much concern. I congratulate the Minister on his visit to America. He used valuable time during his Easter recess, and he did so wisely, obtaining good, responsible publicity thereafter. The BBC helped the Minister to highlight the problem that could arise in Britain, and the House should commend the Minister and his advisers for that initiative.

I concur with the views of the hon. Member for Tynemouth on Newcastle university's academic staff. They have played a prominent part and have been patient and kind and considerate to me, in particular, when I have asked for information.

This is a sombre subject and I cannot envisage any magical solution to the problem. I hope that the Government will continue to publicise the use and abuse of drugs as they have been doing in recent leaflets. I should also like to see another campaign, perhaps in a region such as the north-east, on the narrow subject of solvent abuse. If we can do that, despite the cost, we may be able to bring the question responsibly to the fore.

I have time to make only a short speech and I hope the Minister and other hon. Members will forgive me if I have to leave shortly, but I shall be back soon. The hon. Member for Tynemouth's Bill will receive my support and the wholehearted support of the people in the northern region. It is as far as we can go, bearing in mind the limit of our knowledge on the subject. Therefore, I hope that the House will give the Bill its Third Reading today and that it will have a successful passage in another place.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I speak from a completely different viewpoint from that of every other hon. Member who has spoken so far today. In the first place, let me disclose my financial and personal interests on the Bill. I am a small shopkeeper and a member of several chambers of trade and commerce. I have an honorary role looking after the interests of the National Federation of Retail Newsagents — a host of small shopkeepers. I cannot but support the Bill because its principle is so good, even though it will be almost impossible to implement in practice.

Every hon. Member who has spoken so far has said, "Yes, but". They have all said that the Bill is a good idea, but have asked whether it will work. Some of the quotes that I have jotted down this morning include, "No one knows how many take part in glue sniffing," "the official list is not complete," and "it is a bit hard on the shopkeeper because he may be in court as a result of an incomplete list."

I was amazed to find that my own shops sold many of the substances listed. My business deals with drawing office and art materials. It had never occurred to me that a glue sniffer would come in to one of my shops, but I was told only yesterday that a young man, bearing all the signs of being, as my staff had been advised, a glue sniffer, had come in the previous week to purchase a solvent. It was a well-known proprietary brand of gum which we all use for pasting up our election literature. It must be able to be applied and removed or moved once in place. I suspect that there are many more adhesives than my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) knows about. There are low tack, high tack and many other degrees of stickiness.

The girls in the shop, bright intelligent young ladies, had a quick conflab and agreed not to supply that young man—quite rightly. Unfortunately, it turned out that he was over 18 and the son of a local architect purchasing the glue for a respectable practice. We have lost that customer for ever and the girls have lost their commission. I do not criticise those girls, because they were right to act as they did, and I congratulate them, but that is a perfect example of how an excellently intentioned legal sledgehammer may miss the nut at which it is aimed.

How long will we go on persecuting the small shopkeeper simply because hon. Members feel that what the House is doing may improve things? I do not deny that the Bill should make matters marginally better, but by only a jolly small margin.

Another comment was that there is no magical solution. Of course there is not. The retail trade welcomes and supports the guidelines and principles of the Bill, but we already have voluntary guidelines, which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said some months ago in the House were working reasonably well. I do not doubt that the principle is good, but I doubt the practice. I suspect that the measure may fill the courts with small shopkeepers, but I doubt whether it will stop many round-the-corner glue sniffers.

[Mr. Tony Speller]

I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) that appearance does not matter a pennyworth in terms of what people will do with solvents. There are so many solvents that it cannot be fair to put this legislation on the statute book, although my hon. Friend the Minister has inserted a clause which provides for vendors who have acted reasonably and responsibly.

A corner newsagent is busy in the early hours of the morning and evening sending out newspapers. The staff will be good people and, probably, part of the family or part-timers. How can they be expected to tell that a person is under 18? Can any hon. Member genuinely tell the age of a boy or girl? A 14-year-old who was 6ft 2in came to see me recently. I knew that, but no shopkeeper could possibly have known that. I suspect that when cases do come to court, the person alleged to have bought the solvent on behalf of the defendant will turn out not to be the buyer, because glue sniffing has almost become a party sport. That sounds horrible, but sniffing tends to be done in groups. The lad or girl who is sent to buy will look 18.

The shopkeeper must first judge a buyer's age, but that person may be buying balsa wood cement for an aircraft kit. Which 10-year-old has not done that, let alone a 17-year-old? The shopkeeper has not made the product that he sells, but has bought it in good faith from the manufacturer. He is no chemist. He may be an expert in art, newsagency or pharmaceutical matters, but these substances are now available in almost every chemist's shop, now that chemists' shops are retail shops, as are garages these days.

We are drawing a net with extremely large holes. I suspect that we shall catch some rather small fish, which will probably not be worth the cost of the net in the first place. That may be an extreme view. Although no hon. Member will vote against the Bill, the measure relies on the shopkeeper to make a judgment which is both onerous and unrealistic, especially regarding age.

Many young people look older than they are, yet the seller must decide on their age. How many retailers of cigarettes, for example, are prosecuted for selling to an under-age buyer? The same applies to obscene publications. It is hard on the shopkeeper if he must make a snap judgment and someone else may be judge and jury in his case at court.

The variety of solvents is legion. I had to write their names down because they mean nothing to me. They include toluene, hexane, acetone, amyl, acetate and benzine. Many of those items are for the home. Ladies need butane refills for the things that they use to curl their hair, and they use hair lacquer sprays. Can we expect a retailer to divine whether a normal-looking person — 99.99 per cent. of the time the person will look perfectly ordinary and normal — is under a certain age and that having obtained a butane refill for mother's curling tongs will give it not to mother but to someone else?

We must not forget that most small shopkeepers rely on repeat trade. There are two sides to that. If a genuine customer, or his son or daughter, is refused service, he will not return to the shop. That is fair enough, but not from the shopkeeper's point of view. The ordinary small shopkeeper is probably the most respectable person in society. I say that in full knowledge of the fact that there are only five shopkeepers in Parliament and many more attorneys, accountants, schoolteachers and other folk. A small shopkeeper who finds himself in court will suffer from being taken to court. However, that is nothing to his further suffering, even if he is found innocent, as he almost certainly will be, because the burden of proof under the Bill is hard on the prosecution. He will feel the social stigma of being taken to court. If it is a small newsagent, who will mind the shop while he is in court? Will the person who minds the shop be as vigilant as the shopkeeper in watching to whom he sells the goods? If a shopkeeper misjudges the circumstances, he could literally find himself in gaol, not for criminal intent, but for a misjudgment. That is inequitable.

On Second Reading the Minister congratulated my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), as I do, on the narrowness of the Bill, in that it is intended to get at the pusher. The more that I have considered the Bill since volunteering to serve on the Committee on the Bill and following its passage, the less sure I am that we shall catch pushers. Indeed, what would we do with an under-18-year-old pusher if we caught one? Will the result be as sad as that of the case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North, in which the user merely got the supply from elsewhere? Supplies are readily available. The only answer is for the substance on the market not to be a substance that can be used. That will involve research and patents. Moreover, glues and solvents are cheap and necessary in every sector of our life. I do not see that solution arriving in the short term.

When the Second Reading of the Bill was announced, the headline of the Evening Chronicle in the north-east, which is not a paper I normally read, stated:

"Police set to Pounce on Evil Dealers — M.P. Tells Commons."

Even bigger headlines referred to "Corner-shop Killers". One may say that that is over the top. The Minister may say that the Bill is loose and narrow and not intended to catch the good shopkeeper, but I wonder whether that will be the case. Following that heady headline, the editorial referred to corner shop owners who sold glue-sniffing kits to children as being evil. The editorial states that my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth stunned Parliament —I suspect that the House was as crowded as it is today —with a catalogue of horrors.

The Daily Express questioned whether the proposed punishment was tough enough. The press are selective in pursuing a campaign for a perfectly good principle. None of us could deny that. However, we cannot let our national newspapers see in every corner shop a wicked man intent on making a fortune from selling a small tube of glue, probably at the recommended retail price or 2p off. Thank heaven there is no incentive for corner shop retailers to sell these products to a person who will misuse them. Moreover, the product is generally sold industrially in vast quantities; indeed, hon. Members have referred to tons of glue.

One of the problems is the fact that there are so many types of glue. I have about 18 different types of adhesive in my business, which are used for everything from modelling, to mending bits and pieces, to mounting paper. When people think of glue, they forget that fact. We know that it is extended to hair sprays and butane refills. Who knows to what else it will be extended? I suspect that every office in this building has something which could be sniffed. I understand that even matches can be used in some circumstances.

Without wishing to labour the point or detain the House, I need an assurance from the Minister that the intent of the legislation is to bring down the weight of the law only on those who would make it their business to push intoxicating substances on people under the age of 18, and that it is not intended, and may not become, a charter to victimise small shopkeepers. I know that that is the intention of the House, but we are a long way from, for example, the shopkeeper who has got up the nose of the local environmental health inspector or one from the local trading standards office. It is not difficult to make a case with such blanket legislation.

The Bill has caused great anxiety among small shopkeepers. We shopkeepers feel somewhat naked. We are aware of all the Acts and restrictions, and we try to obey them. I do not suppose that any small shopkeeper, who stands to lose his business only too easily in these days of harsh competition, wishes to promote drug pushing or the awful abuse about which we have heard. I must tell my hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth that, although I accept the excellent principle of the Bill, I believe that in practice more shopkeepers than pushers will end up in court.

11.10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretay of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): Three months ago, during the Second Reading debate, the Bill was unanimously and rightly supported by the House. The Bill had a short and highly sucessful Committee stage, and has now returned to the Floor of the House. As I suppose is inevitable, several points have been raised now which show less than fullhearted support for the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) spoke with his usual eloquence and sincerity, and the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) also raised one or two points of detail. The hon. Gentleman said in Committee:

"The fact that no one wants to table amendments to it and that no organisation outside the House with a knowledge of, interest in or experience of the Bill whom I have approached over the last weeks has any caveats or qualifications to make about the Bill is again a tribute to the sense of the hon. Member for Tynemouth."

Since then the hon. Gentleman has found a few caveats, and I shall be happy to reply to them on the basis that they were sensibly advanced and not intended as an exercise in nit-picking.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) took an interest in glue sniffing for many months before he was fortunate enough to secure first place in the ballot for private Member's Bills. This enabled him to make this most useful change in the law, and I congratulate him on the skill and moderation with which he has piloted the Bill through the House, and wish it every success in the other place. The care with which my hon. Friend monitors the problem in the north was apparent from the examples that he gave today. I also wish to associate with that observation the speech of the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), who is the epitome of gentlemanliness and courtesy in the House. I thank him especially for what he said about my efforts to ensure that there is responsible information and comment on these profoundly difficult related social problems of glue sniffing and drug abuse.

Several hon. Members have said that glue sniffing has left the headlines in recent months, but there is no evidence to suggest that glue sniffing is less of a problem now than when it featured largely in the headlines. Although the focus of attention has inevitably shifted towards other drugs, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Services who is responsible for the matter, and myself—I am responsible for the law and order aspects—remain especially troubled by glue sniffing and most anxious that the efforts being made by communities to resist glue sniffing should continue. The effort must not be left to the Government alone.

It was most timely, although a tragic occurrence which one would wish had not happened, that my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth was able to tell the House of a coroner's inquest at Leeds this week. Tragically, two brothers aged under 16, in unrelated incidents, probably died from solvent abuse. It certainly appears that both of them were solvent abusers. The problem has not gone away.

On Second Reading I gave the House some details of the number of deaths that can be attributed to solvent abuse. I mentioned the steep increase in recent years, from 29 deaths in 1980, to 45 in 1981, 60 in 1982 and 80 in 1983. I said then that, on the figures available for 1984, it appeared that there might be a reduction, which would be welcome, but I said that all the statistics had not been analysed. It now appears that the figures for 1984 will be broadly similar to those for 1983. That has two lessons for us. First, we might draw some hope from the fact that deaths did not increase in 1984 as they did in the years leading up to 1983. Secondly, it might suggest that glue sniffing is reaching its peak, although one would not wish to draw too many conclusions from one year's statistics.

The fact that nearly 80 youngsters may have died in 1984 from the effects of glue sniffing is not a matter about which any of us can be complacent. It is 80 youngsters too many, and it strengthens the point that I made earlier, which was echoed by many hon. Members, that we must not let the problem of glue sniffing slip out of our minds.

No one makes large claims for the Bill. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North recognises the narrow compass of the Bill, and said in Committee:

"What it does is simply to plug a loophole that none of us realised existed, because none of us thought that there were such evil people around who would deliberately and premeditatively supply so-called glue-sniffing kits to vulnerable young people." —[Official Report, Standing Committee C; 30 January 1985, c. 4.]

It is highly relevant to the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North that he should be aware of the dilemma caused to my hon. Friends the Members for Tynemouth and for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), who have taken such a consistent interest in the matter, and indeed to the Government, when the Scottish shopkeepers' case was decided at the end of 1983. Two Glasgow shopkeepers had cynically set out to corrupt children by selling them so-called glue-sniffing kits—glue and paper bags to put over their noses while they were sniffing—in return for receiving stolen goods from those children. They had plainly set out to run a Scottish version of Fagin's den, using glue as the bait with which to attract children. They had stored large quantities of glue in the basement of their shop for that purpose.

Rightly, it was made apparent in the Scottish courts that such activities were not acceptable and were a breach of the criminal law, and those men were sentenced to long periods of imprisonment. Then came the problem. As custodian of the criminal law of England and Wales, the Home Office was obliged to consider the matter, and it discovered that there was no equivalent provision to the Scottish common law which would have permitted those two shopkeepers to be brought before the English courts had they committed the offence in Tynemouth, Bideford, Knowsley, Putney or Ealing. If it had been discovered some months later that an unscrupulous shopkeeper in Ealing, Putney or Tynemouth thought that this seemed a good way of making money, and knew that he could not be prosecuted, the Government and the House would have been condemned by the public for having allowed the loophole to remain open.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Although I agree with the hon. Gentleman, will he remind me about one matter, because I have forgotten? I believe that there was a case in England involving a former policeman. He was convicted of selling glue-sniffing kits to young people. Under what law was he prosecuted and convicted?

Mr. Mellor: We have very few documented cases in England, and they did not result in any penalties being imposed. I believe that the individual referred to by the hon. Gentleman was brought before the court on matters which did not allow the court to impose any substantive penalty. The attraction of my hon. Friend's Bill is that it allows the imposition of a large fine and six months' imprisonment. Whether or not the hon. Member for Knowsley, North is right when he suggests that similar cases have come before the courts in England, our clear advice is that there is no crime known in the English criminal calendar which precisely fits the terms under which the Scottish shopkeepers were prosecuted and sent to prison for a significant period. Obviously, I cannot be expected to know of every case settled in the English criminal courts. It would be of considerable assistance if the hon. Member for Knowsley, North would write to me about the case that he has in mind.

In passing my hon. Friend's Bill, the House is doing the very minimum that could have been expected in the wake of the Scottish case. Not to have acted would have exposed us to real criticism, but now we come to the matters raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North. Once we start to impose criminal sanctions on what hitherto has not been criminal, that cannot always be all gain. Whether an offence has been committed is never at the margins the easiest issue to unravel. I can well understand the apprehensions of shopkeepers, especially in the light of some over-coloured and rather tendentious press comments about the implications of the Bill.

The question put to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North can be answered in the terms that he wants to hear. This is a long-stop Bill designed to deal with those who knowingly or recklessly become involved in behaviour akin to that of the Scottish shopkeepers. It cannot be used to penalise shopkeepers who make an honest mistake and in good faith sell a substance which is capable of being used to cause intoxication to a youngster who, unbeknown to the shopkeeper, subsequently abuses it. I have to say in categorical terms that no shopkeeper who acts in good faith is placed in any jeopardy as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Greenway: This is very important. Will the Home Office issue guidelines about possible symptoms in the regular glue sniffer which might help shopkeepers? They need some sort of guidance.

Mr. Mellor: I agree, and I am happy to tell my hon. Friend that that has been done already.

Mr. Greenway: Can it be done again?

Mr. Mellor: I do not know whether it needs to be redone. The information is available. What is important is that shopkeepers who require guidance should know that that guidance is available and should set out to obtain it. I am sure that the various organisations represented by my hon. Friend will play their part in disseminating this information.

As the hon. Member for Knowsley, North knows, we have been pursuing a range of policies to try to ensure that the dangers of glue sniffing are brought to the attention of parents and children by the provision of a leaflet which can be made available. I can tell the hon. Member for Wallsend that about 500,000 copies of the Health Education Council leaflet have been produced. I shall arrange for some to be sent to the hon. Gentleman. Because we attach importance to local counselling and local efforts, one panel of the leaflet has been left blank so that it can be overprinted by local organisations to give details of local counselling groups or individuals who may be contacted. We are extremely gratified to know that 500,000 copies have been distributed, because that is a major achievement.

A video has been produced by the Central Office of Information. It is entitled "Illusions" and is devoted to glue sniffing. In fact, it has won a prize. It is available to be borrowed and it has been borrowed on about 2,000 occasions for the use mainly of professional people, teachers, youth workers, parents and the like who wish to become acquainted with the problem. A number have also been sold. Again, if anyone wishes to make use of that film, it is available. It is regarded as one of the best information films available, and that is why it won the prize that it did. Its success has encouraged us to ask the same people to produce a similar film to help people who are trying to combat the wider implications of drug abuse in their communities.

Mr. Garrett: I have seen the film to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and it is of exceptionally good quality. However, it underplays a very important source of these solvents, which is from industry. There is a lot of petty pilfering of solvents that are used in industry, especially in heavy industry, and it is very difficult to apprehend the pushers. More publicity in this direction would be extremely useful, not necessarily to shopkeepers, but to employers, trade unions and anyone caught taking the stuff away and passing it on to young people.

Mr. Mellor: That is very helpful.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North that the Government are well aware of how easy it is to rush into action which proves in the longer term to have been misguided. That is why we took so much trouble, when trying to work out the appropriate steps to be taken, to consult interested organisations. In January 1983 we issued two circulars. The first one was to retailing organisations asking for their assistance in devising a set of guidelines to shopkeepers to help them restrict the sale of solvents to people who should not have them and giving advice on where these products could be located and the range of products that could be abused. The second circular was sent to a wide range of community groups, magistrates' associations and groups involved in the criminal justice system generally to inquire what intervention from the criminal law would be helpful.

I deal with the latter point first because it has turned out to be the least controversial. The almost unanimous opinion of the several dozen groups contacted on the criminal law point was that it would be wrong to make the sale of solvents to anyone under 16 a criminal offence. It would have caused tremendous problems to retailers, and we have never contemplated doing that. We were also advised that glue sniffing should not be made a criminal offence. We want to help children who sniff glue, not punish them. We do not want to drive the problem further under ground by making it a criminal offence, which might even add to its attractions for some youngsters.

The only intervention in the criminal law that we have been minded to make is the limited intervention which, with his customary good sense, my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth has proposed. Rightly, my hon. Friend is making a virtue of the fact that this is such a limited intervention.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North asked for guidance to be given to shopkeepers. That guidance has now been issued. However, guidance is never a once-and-for-all process. If further points should be included and supplementary guidance is required, those are matters about which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Services will want to hear.

I think that the guidance is common sense on this crucial point of how a shop assistant doing his or her best for the business and for the community might identify a potential glue sniffer. I shall read out five or six paragraphs from the guidance to show what common sense it is, because the warning to shopkeepers is cast in these terms:

"Watch out for any or all of the following: groups of teenagers standing around counters or areas where glue or other solvent-based products are normally displayed.

Frequent purchase of solvent-based products and aerosols by the same individuals.

Traces or smell of glue or solvents on the customer's clothes or breath.

A drowsy, vacant or glazed expression in the eyes.

Unsteadiness, slurred speech or other signs similar to drunkenness.

Red eyes, heightened colour and reddening spots around the mouth and nose.

Uncontrolled or excessive giggling and rowdy silly behaviour."

On Second Reading I said that perhaps too many shop assistants should not come into Prime Minister's Question Time on that basis.

"Purchase of plastic bags at the same time as glue or other solvent-based products.

Obvious absence by a child from school."

Those are common-sense points. One is not asking the impossible of shopkeepers, although one recognises the difficulties of their job.

I believe, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North will accept, that it would be wrong, faced with the problem of glue sniffing, which has brought misery to thousands of families and caused the death of perhaps as many as 80 youngsters in the past three months, and 80 in the previous 12 months, to suggest that shopkeepers should be under no obligation to the community to do their best to restrict sales where it is plain that abuse will or may take place. Most socially conscious shopkeepers would not want to be completely free of any moral obligation.

We are trying to keep the criminal law from the outer edges of extreme and unpleasant behaviour, but to put out common-sense, practical guidelines which have been negotiated and hammered out with the retailing organisations so that any prudent shopkeeper can train his staff or himself. The organisations which represent shopkeepers will make them aware of that. That enhances the reputation of the shopkeeper as a socially responsible person.

I am sure that we are not asking shopkeepers to do difficult things. Equally, it would be wrong for us not to recognise that there are youngsters who are plainly sniffing glue. If we could make it more difficult for them to get the substance, even if we will not prevent the problem, we shall be taking a step in the right direction.

I should like my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North to reflect upon what I am saying. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security will be more than willing to hear from him if he feels, in the light of what I have said, that there is more that we could or should do to assist the responsible shopkeeper to run his business responsibly.

We, as Members of Parliament, know only too well that the world is full of some thoroughly unreasonable people. Many of them write letters to us in red, black and blue ink, heavily underlined and so on, but no one——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: They buy the ink from your hon. Friend's shop.

Mr. Mellor: Yes—ink which they no doubt buy from the shop of my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North.

If a shopkeeper or his assistant is genuinely troubled about a young man purchasing a potentially abusable substance and refuses to sell the item, I should have thought that it was outrageous for his parents to hold that against the shopkeeper. I spend much of my time in the Home Office trying to find ways to persuade people to behave sensibly and understandably in relation to a wide range of matters which go on in the community and in which they could intervene and help. It is sad to me and to all of us that many people hear noises of assaults or criminal acts and do nothing about them. If someone telephones the police and makes an honest mistake about a criminal action, it would be awful if the neighbour involved said, "I was just kicking the cat. You obviously thought that I was being murdered and rang the police." That is a thoroughly objectionable approach. It is equally objectionable——

Mr. Greenway: He must not kick cats.

Mr. Mellor: Of course, I am against kicking cats, but we have a number of cases where people have become aggrieved over what they regard as interference by neighbours who are merely doing their best. If people are to take a responsible attitude towards crime, they must report suspicions to the police. If those suspicions turn out to be wrong, people must understand that that is the only way that people can show good neighbourliness in their communities. The same is true here. If a shopkeeper, acting in good faith, restricts the sale to a youngster, for the parent not to recognise the pressure on the shopkeeper and to hold it against him would seem to be thoroughly irresponsible and unreasonable. I hope that shopkeepers will recognise that even if they lose one customer they will gain much more respect in the community by being ready and willing to stand up in that way.

Mr. Greenway: I know that my hon. Friend is a cat lover. On the point of the guidelines, which are so important, he will know that not all shopkeepers are as assiduous as our hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller). Will the onus be upon them to obtain the guidelines, or will they be sent to them?

Mr. Mellor: The guidelines have already been distributed. I hope that most shopkeepers have them, but it is impossible to send the guidelines, unasked for, to every shop. One of the arrangements entered into with the retailing organisations was that they would participate in the distribution. If my hon. Friend knows of shops which do not have them, part of the common-sense role, which I am aware he plays in his community as a Member of Parliament, is to see that they are available. No doubt Members, as a result of the debate, can put in their local papers the fact that guidelines are available and advise shopkeepers to write for them.

Most of the guidelines are simple, common-sense and straightforward things about which most sensible folk following the glue-sniffing problem will know. The guidelines are merely an attempt to assist those who wish to structure their staff training. We see that as a crucial part of our effort.

The hon. Member for Knowsley, North can never resist a degree of partisanship and, of course, today was no exception. Having made, on the whole, a sensible speech, he sought to blame the Government for glue sniffing by saying that we had created the conditions within which glue sniffing could flourish. That suggestion is wide of the mark. Glue sniffing began in the United States in the 1950s. It came to Scotland in the early 1970s. It has been in England and Wales since the middle and late 1970s. The fact that it has grown in intensity causes us all anxiety, but to reduce the argument to one of narrow partisanship is not helpful and falls below the standards to which I am sure he normally aspires.

The hon. Gentleman's argument was unfair in relation to his area of Merseyside because in so far as the social conditions in Merseyside facilitate glue sniffing by youngsters, I do not know that it is just this Government who need to examine their conscience. What about those who locally have considerable influence over the attractiveness of the region to employment and who have controlled, without exception, local government at metropolitan county and borough level for 20 years or more? Are they to be free of the taint of having assisted glue sniffing to flourish if, as the hon. Gentleman asserts, it is the result of economic decline? I think not. I should have thought that that was the kind of boomerang argument which strikes the hon. Gentleman as firmly on his forehead as it does me on mine.

This has been a helpful debate. I am grateful to those who have sought reassurance, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North. It is crucial that there should be no misunderstanding about the Bill. It is an important Bill, even though it is limited. It is not intended to make the problems suffered by small shopkeepers any worse. No responsible shopkeeper has anything to fear from the Bill. Those who do are those who, for their own financial reward, trade cynically on the weakness of children. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North will carry back that message to the small shopkeepers whom he represents.

Mr. Trotter: With the leave of the House, I shall deal briefly with some of the points that have been raised.

I do not accept that drugs have taken over from glue sniffing as a problem. They are an additional problem. The glue sniffing problem will be with us for some time. To deal with it we must have a continuing campaign by Government, local authorities, industry and, as the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said, the media. The hon. Gentleman referred to the efforts of the police on Tyneside, and I wholly support what he said. They are playing a very constructive role in the front line of the campaign because they come across the incidents day by day as they occur on the streets.

There has been reference to the problem of supplies of glue from industry. Glue is used not only in mechanical industries but also in the building industry, and much of it is stolen and used by glue sniffers. I draw the attention of builders to the need to keep under safe control the large stocks of glue that they use in woodworking, in particular.

I should like particularly to dispel the worry of my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller) that the ordinary shopkeeper will be at risk as a result of the Bill. It is perfectly understandable that such a view should be put forward. I would not have wished to introduce a Bill which would penalise in any way the ordinary shopkeeper, whether on a corner site or anywhere else. I do not believe that any honest mistake made in good faith will lead to a prosecution.

I have found the attitude of my local Northumbria police very sensible. I suggest that chambers of trade or commerce in every part of the country, if they are still worried after what the Minister and I have said on the subject, should talk to their local police forces. I do not believe that they will find any intention by the police to harass or attack the ordinary honest shopkeeper.

If it had not been for the prosecutions that were brought in Scotland, many of us would have thought it beyond belief that there were people who deliberately set out to make profits from selling glue to young people to be sniffed on a large scale. However, there are such people. People are in gaol in Scotland for having done it. I have no doubt that there is a small number of such people in other parts of Britain.

I referred earlier to the information given to me on Tyneside that it has been possible to be supplied with fish and chips and glue or hot dogs and glue. That is not the practice of an honourable trader. It is a disgraceful activity, and I do not believe for a moment that the people that my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North represents could be included in that category.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: If the hon. Member has been given information that retailers, carrying out an otherwise lawful business, are supplying children with glue along with hamburgers or fish and chips, what did he do about it? It is a very serious and important allegation. Were those retailers identified? Was the information followed up? If they were identified, what happened?

Mr. Trotter: I was advised of it by the authorities themselves, who are powerless to deal with it for the reasons that have been debated now for three months. There is no law in Britain—apart from the odd case of the policeman to which the hon. Gentleman referred—under which prosecutions can be brought.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Surely a great deal could have been done. It would have been possible to publicise the names of the retailers concerned. That kind of publicity, in a decent law-abiding community, would itself be a deterrent. The retailers could have been reported to their own professional trade associations. There are clearly other legal sanctions that could be taken against such people. I believe that someone was found to be supplying glue-sniffing kits and was prosecuted under the procedures dealing with breaches of the peace. I am sure that in those cases, with enough will-power and ingenuity, action could have been taken.

Mr. Trotter: I understand that one of the traders concerned operated from a tricycle. I very much doubt whether he was a member of any trade body.

There are at present no laws to deal with the problem. The whole aim of the Bill is to close this loophole. I anticipate that when the Bill becomes law the police will visit those who are regularly supplying the substances and knowing what they are doing. They will be warned that if they do not desist they will be prosecuted. I believe that that will stop the trade. If, however, they continue with the practice after they have been warned, they will be prosecuted and they will go to gaol, as happened in Scotland.

Those who were prosecuted and gaoled under the Scottish law had been warned at a time when it was thought that the law also did not apply in Scotland. They took no notice of the warning. When told that they were carrying out anti-social, dangerous and wicked behaviour, they said, "We have not broken the law and there is nothing you can do." They continued to trade, but when it was found that under Scottish law an offence had in fact been committed, they were prosecuted and gaoled.

I believe that the police will not abuse the statute. They will warn those who are regularly, recklessly and deliberately supplying poison. If those people do not desist, they will be prosecuted and gaoled. The ordinary corner shopkeeper has nothing to fear from this necessary measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered, reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. William Powell.]

11.46 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): May I begin by observing one of the usual courtesies of this House and explain to my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) that I have a pressing engagement in the midlands and therefore will not be present to hear his comments in summing up the debate. However, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department will occupy the Front Bench and will take note of any new ideas and new issues that may emerge in the debate in order to feed that information back to the Department of Trade and Industry and to the Home Office.

I thought that it might be helpful to place before the House for the first time the results of the first comprehensive survey which has been undertaken by statisticians in the DTI into the size and performance of the computer software industry. On Second Reading, we all recognised the crucial and growing importance of the industry, but I thought it might be helpful to put that information before hon. Members so that we may have a framework against which to judge the economic implications as well as the implications for fair play and for proper protection for authors of software as proceedings are conducted through this House and the Upper Chamber.

The first survey of the computer services industry, including small as well as larger firms, shows a 20 per cent. increase in turnover in 1984, and that provisional estimate suggests that the industry—which is concerned with the development and application of software—increased its turnover from £1,750 million in 1983 to £2,120 million in 1984. The industry consists of approximately 15,000 firms, but 200 larger companies accounted for more than half its total sales. The statistics were collected from the DTI's regular quarterly survey of larger firms in the computer services industry, but during 1984 it was supplemented by a sample survey, including the smaller firms, taken from the Business Statistics Office's register.

It is interesting to note that about 30 per cent. of the firms regarded manufacturing as their primary market, 20 per cent. were mainly concerned with the distributive trades, and 20 per cent. with financial services. Of the remaining 30 per cent., about half saw the public sector as the main market for their services. A further £180 million-worth of software is also produced by companies whose main activity is in another branch of the economy —computer manufacture, computer games or computer-aided design machinery.

The combined output of computer services inside and outside the industry is therefore about £2,300 million. About £1,000 million is attributable to what can be broadly described as systems analysis, software and software maintenance. Data processing and database services represent rather more than a quarter of the total, and the balance includes consultancy, hardware maintenance and training.

[Mr. John Butcher]

I am delighted that that information came forward only this week. This debate has provided an excellent opportunity to place it before the House, not least because there are among hon. Members, including my hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), several enthusiasts who favour the industry as one of the growth points in the British economy.

Needless to say, the Bill has no enemies in the House, to the best of my knowledge. The only enemies it may have are among the pirates themselves who, no doubt, if the Bill is passed, will not be looking forward to the implementation of measures similar to those that have been so effective for video piracy.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Can the Under-Secretary tell us where the detailed results of the survey will be published? Can he assure us that they will be published in full? His Department has an extraordinarily bad record of publishing summary reports—for example, in January after a report on research and development—whereupon there is a two-year lag before the publication of the full report.

Mr. Butcher: I note what the hon. Gentleman has said. Obviously he cannot expect me to agree with the import of what he has said. However, I hope that he will recognise that this information, as a result of an internal survey by Department of Trade and Industry statisticians, has been placed before the House before anyone else has had a chance to see or comment upon it. That is proper, and should be the case. Of course, we are prepared to provide the background to the survey, the headlines of which I have given the House this morning. A copy will be put in the House of Commons Library so that hon. Members can check its validity, the basis on which the statistics were collected, and so on. I am happy to discharge that obligation as a believer, in the case of statistical analysis, in the principles of open government.

Dr. Bray: Will the survey be published in British Business in the ordinary way and, if so, when?

Mr. Butcher: I should be surprised if it were not published in British Business in the usual way. It is a survey of major importance and significance. I do not think that I am on weak ground in predicting that the survey could figure in British Business at the earliest opportunity. However, I hope that the best way of proceeding is to make it available to hon. Members who have an interest in the industry.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) for introducing a Bill of major importance. It is of major economic importance, and is important to those who hitherto have been penalised for deploying their ingenuity and brain power in this growth industry. I repeat that, to the best of my knowledge, the Bill has no enemies other than among the pirates.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am delighted to congratulate my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary who, I know, must depart, and my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) and his supporters on piloting the Bill so successfully towards its Third Reading.

I was interested to hear the up-to-date figures on the size of the computer industry and the fact that the computer software portion is now at or approaching a billion-dollar industry. Copying in breach of copyright—as it will be — of computer software by electronic means is extraordinarily easy and profitable. It has attracted to itself the same type of wide boy and fast buck operator who, in the past, has been attracted to the video nasty and video piracy. The Bill makes it clear beyond doubt that computer software will be covered by the Copyright Act 1956 and provides for adequate criminal provisions so that pirates who indulge in that nefarious activity get their deserts. Their pirated material can be searched, they can be brought before the courts, and adequate punishments will be available.

As my hon. Friend the Minister said, computer software itself, whether for business purposes or computer games, is the result of a great deal of time, trouble, investment and ingenuity by those who take part in this important and fast-growing industry. It is quite wrong that their efforts should be stolen by those who, for example, equipped with a twin-disc drive mini-computer, can run off a copy of a floppy disc on to a blank costing £1 or £1·50 for word processing purposes, which retails at about £300. They can sell it off cheap for £100, £150 or £175 and make a fast buck for themselves. It is equally wrong that some people in legitimate activities in the computer industry should use that pirated software as loss leaders for their hardware. I am sure that the moral effects of the Bill will help to stamp that out. If it continues, they too can be brought to book under the new provisions.

I congratulate once again the Federation Against Software Theft on the careful way in which it has marshalled the evidence that has convinced my colleagues —my hon. Friend the Member for Corby and my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Trade and Industry and the Home Office—and myself that this is another example of where Parliament should act swiftly. It has acted swiftly. I hope that within minutes the Bill will obtain its Third Reading. I wish it a speedy passage in another place and on to the statute book.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): If I recall correctly, two or three of the four or five of us now present in the Chamber sat through the heat of the debate on Second Reading on 22 February. My further recollection, which the Minister has just borne out, is that there was an all-pervading spirit of unanimity in our dealings that day. As my hon. Friend said, there was unanimous acceptance of the dire problem of software theft. There was a unanimous welcome for the Bill and congratulations, I must confess that I am somewhat tainted by personal envy of the powerful and persuasive way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) presented his case. There was unanimous hope that the Bill would enjoy a speedy passage through Parliament. The reality of that hope exceeded my expectations. Delayed by the London traffic, I arrived for the Committee four minutes late to find that the proceedings had been completed.

Just as the Bill meets with widespread approval in the House so, not surprisingly, as we have heard, it meets with widespread and general support in the industry itself. On Second Reading we heard much about how software theft is a serious and immediate problem to the industry. In the intervening weeks, fresh evidence has come my way from the industry in my constituency which underlines the necessity for urgent and speedy action.

In the computer industry throughout the United Kingdom, software theft threatens innovation, jobs and investment. On Second Reading we heard how the phenomenal sum of nearly £150 million was lost by the industry last year—a breathtaking statistic that demands an instant and urgent response. During that debate we heard much about the various forms that the theft takes. To the lay mind, it is hard to distinguish between the terminology of that theft. There is counterfeiting, replication without permission, production of look-alike copies and so on. However, the basic point is that every aspect, area and category of a software business is affected by theft — games and micro-business software and commercial software packages. We were left in no doubt that there is a very serious problem that must be dealt with, and dealt with effectively.

In introducing the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby set it in the context of the computer software market in western Europe and Britain. He analysed the development of Government and public policy over the past decade or so to show why it is necessary to deal with the problem on its own rather than wait for more general Government legislation. Of equal if not greater significance was my hon. Friend's analysis of some of the difficulties under the present law. He spoke at length of the consequences for the industry of the present state of the law. It is that legal uncertainty that makes the present situation unacceptable and provides the justification for the Bill.

However, we must not delude ourselves that legal action on its own will solve the entire problem. Legal change is perhaps the most essential step, but there is also the whole area of technical deterrents to illicit copying. Perhaps we heard less about that on Second Reading than we should have done. I take up what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) said, partly because it gives me another opportunity to praise the work of the Federation Against Software Theft. FAST has made much of the need for technical deterrents. I quote from one of its publications:

"No technical protection method, of itself, will prevent a determined thief from copying computer programmes and then selling them copyright-unpaid for his own profit. As the law stands there is small risk in this criminal activity. Instead, all the risk is borne by the Author and Publisher, who have made a substantial investment of skill, time and money. Unlike the thief, the Author and Publisher are potential sources of future software for the Consumer . . . FAST will not recommend an industry standard in this field, partly because that would concentrate the attention of would-be 'code-breakers'. However FAST is urging Authors and Publishers to investigate whether a technical protection system could reduce the vulnerability of their products, without causing an unacceptable reduction in user value or unacceptable increase in cost."

An industry that takes self-help seriously is doubly entitled to ask for the normal legal protection accorded to other forms of intellectual property. Technical deterrents clearly have a part to play, but all hon. Members who took part in the Second Reading debate acknowledged the urgent need for clarification and strengthening of the law.

The serious problem of software theft will be reduced significantly by the proposed amendments to the 1956 Act, and the effectiveness of the remedies will be increased. That is why we need the legislation. It is straightforward and not contentious, and I am sure that the House will accept it.

Clause 1 contains the simple assertion:

"The Copyright Act 1956 shall apply in relation to a computer program . . . as it applies in relation to a literary work"

Nothing could be much more direct than that. In one fell swoop the clause removes all doubt, uncertainty and ambiguity. It is what the industry wants. It provides the legal protection that will help to save the industry the £150 million a year that it is currently losing. In essence, clause 1 seeks to protect the software business in the same way as the Copyright (Amendment) Act 1983 sought to protect the video business. There is evidence that the video amendment legislation has provided considerable protection.

Clauses 2 and 3 bring into effect the provision of the 1956 Act for computer software programmes. Under the legislation it will be possible to apply to magistrates for a search warrant. That is a crucial power of law enforcement. It is the same as the power now available to deal with video piracy under the video amendment legislation. That legislation appears to have been immensely successful. It is estimated that two thirds of video piracy has been eliminated. If that statistic can be duplicated in computer software, there will be many smiling faces except among the pirates, and there is every reason to hope that the Bill will have a comparable impact on computer software theft.

Clause 3 provides for the penalties. I understand that at the moment there are no criminal penalties for computer software theft. Under the Bill, the penalties will be the same as those for any other breach of the Copyright Act . . . imprisonment for a maximum of two years and unlimited fines. Those are substantial deterrents. We are moving a long way from the days of the £40 fine under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. I apologise in his absence to my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) for referring by implication or innuendo to one of his constituents without giving him prior notice.

I am still as fervent in my support of the Bill as I was on Second Reading. Reduced to the barest essentials, it provides the industry with the legal protection that it wants. It is our job to give the industry that protection. On Second Reading, I made much of the importance of the computer industry to Basingstoke. It is partly because the computer industry features so prominently in my constituency that I wish it to flourish. The Bill will help the industry to flourish, and it has my total support.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): I, too, should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) on his introduction and handling of a Bill that seems likely to receive the early agreement of the House. It will make a useful contribution to tackling the problems of copyright and software theft. Simply by doing so, however, it will highlight the remaining software problems.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) was right to draw attention to the question of technical deterrents, but I would be sceptical about how far that will contribute to the solution of the problem. It is only likely to have an effect at a somewhat low technical level. High-grade protection of systems will be extremely difficult to provide. We shall need to seek a change in practice and organisation within the software field much more akin to the openness of the results of scientific research which is an acceptable and necessary part of technical progress in other areas. We have found that, in the patent system, much of the problem lies in getting at information, not in locking it up. Thinking that the software solution lies in locking it all up so that it is not accessible is probably the wrong direction.

As for the size and growth of the industry, I think that the Minister was anxious to help by referring to the statistical survey, but he has probably thrown in a great deal of confusion by infringing what seems to me to be the best practice of Ministers when handling the results of statistical surveys. Guidelines were set out by Sir John Boreham, the head of the Government's statistical service, in a recent issue of Statistical News. They firmly advise separation of the first announcement of a survey's results, which should be done by officials without any comment from Ministers, any comment by Ministers should be the subject of a separate press release. That separation is intended to prevent Ministers from picking up the plums which suit them politically and because the information is in danger of being misunderstood and misrepresented if not presented properly as a professional statistician would do. The key importance of this particular information is in planning manpower policy in the computer industry, especially manpower for the software industry.

I shall examine the figures that the Minister gave more carefully, but it seems that as he presented them they offered no guide by which it would be possible to judge the adequacy of the plans that the Government have announced for the production of qualified scientists and engineers in software. The supply has been miserably inadequate. So far, the increases in expenditure have been achieved by bleeding Department of Trade and Industry Votes, and others, to support the Department of Education and Science spend on the training of computer staff. I hope that the Minister will write to me and ensure that the full results of the survey are published as soon as possible so that we have better information on which to judge Government policy, especially on the supply of manpower to the software industry.

There will have to be a substantially increased effort by the Government in the development of major software systems and standards which are freely available publicly for common use as the framework in which application areas can develop. The Government rightly turned down the proposal of British Telecom and IBM to develop their own value added network.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he is getting wide of the Bill. I have allowed a little latitude because I realise that the Minister wished to make a statement which was relevant to the background to the Bill. I therefore allowed the hon. Gentleman to comment as well. Strictly speaking, however, a Third Reading speech should deal with the contents of the Bill.

Dr. Bray: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was about to make the link with the problem of copyright in common user systems. The problem with the common user systems is to maintain their integrity in a form in which they can be properly described, developed and applied by a wide variety and level of user. Copyright has a part to play in that in maintaining the consistency of the different standards as they are produced. If a standard is offered by different manufacturers in their equipment, a necessary part of ensuring that software will run on different types of equipment is that it operates precisely, to the nearest bit of information, the same system that others use so that common additional software will operate reliably. I am not sure that we shall get from this Government a coherent scheme for the development of software which will provide those wider standards which can be used in value added systems and common user systems of the future.

I hope that the industry will turn its attention to the positive aspects of copyright—means by which unwise conformity to standards can be observed in the rapid spread of computer applications.

I hope that the Bill will not run into any problems in another place and that it will provide a foundation on which the wider problem of intellectual property in computers will be tackled by the Government. I hope, however, that it will not get too lost in the general problems of intellectual property, because computers will deserve continuing attention. It is right to tackle a problem with a private Member's Bill in this case, but I suspect that when the subject next comes up in the House it will have to be dealt with in a Government Bill. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill on behalf of the Opposition and wish it a speedy passage.

Mr. William Powell: With the leave of the House, I should like to comment on what has been said. I thank those who have spoken on what has turned out to be an easy passage for the Bill so far. I thank the hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) for giving the Bill the wholehearted support of the official Opposition and for what he has said in our debates. I listened with interest to and agreed with a great deal of what he said today about the future of the software industry and the developments that must occur.

I should like to thank the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who was kind enough to tell me that he would be unable to attend this morning, for wishing the Bill rapid progress to the statute book. I thank my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), who was the first Member to take up the cause of extending copyright law to cover computer software in his ten-minute Bill in July last year, which initiated the parliamentary process which has led to this Third Reading.

I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), who made a major speech today, as he did on Second Reading, and whose interest in and knowledge of the computer industry and its ramifications is second to none.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister, whose assistance and co-operation has enabled the Bill to be produced in a widely acceptable form. He, my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology and officials in their Department have been of major assistance.

None of this would have been possible without contributions from many quarters in the House and, as has been stressed, from within the industry. There has been unanimous agreement in the industry that such a Bill is necessary to secure its survival and prosperity.

This is, of course, an interim measure because in due course it will have to take its place within the context of the wider revision of copyright law which is now being contemplated and which we analysed on Second Reading. It is also an interim measure because in itself it will not be sufficient to deal with all the many problems facing the industry as it develops.

One of the most important tasks is to educate the public to respect copyright. In an age in which the copying of materials is so easy, it is all the more important to ensure that authorship and the legitimate proceeds of authorship should be respected in computer software as much as in literary authorship and in video, to which the law was extended two years ago.

We had a very full Second Reading debate, which no doubt assisted the Bill's progress in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke was, alas, all too right when he said that, due to unavoidable circumstances, he was late, but it never occurred to him that just a few moments delay would rule him out of the Committee stage which lasted all of seven seconds.

If the Bill receives a Third Reading today it will go to another place and, all being well, it will become law. But it is only a beginning. No one in the House or in the country should imagine that this is the end of the problem. I hope that the message will go forth from both Houses to pirates here and abroad that their behaviour will not be tolerated any longer. They have done immense damage to the industry and they are causing immense damage to our economy. They are doing immense damage to firms with a future that will be felt throughout the world.

This is a short, private Member's Bill, but it is surely also a major Bill which demands the approbation of the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Controlled Drugs (Penalties) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered, reported, without amendment.

12.23 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Committee Stage of this Bill was not quite so succinct as that of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). Second Reading, however, went through on the nod, so this is the only opportunity to debate this important measure on the Floor of the House and it is right that the debate should be as complete as possible. It will also allow us to impress on the country the severity of the problem of drug trafficking and our readiness to tackle it.

This is not a partisan measure. It belongs to that rare breed which commands support from every corner of the House and I am proud to say that the 11 sponsors include representatives of every political grouping and every shade and faction within those groupings in the House. The Conservative climatic season is fully represented, from bone dry to saturated wet, and the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) will forgive me for commenting that on this occasion the Labour party is seen not so much in harmony as in unison, with the Healyite Right and the Bennite Left for once united. I am also grateful for the full support of the Government and I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and his officials for all their help and encouragement, especially in providing drafting facilities.

The Bill is brief but its potential impact, I hope, will be big. Its purpose is simple and straightforward — to increase to life imprisonment the maximum penalty available to the courts in sentencing people convicted of trafficking in class A drugs, principally heroin and cocaine. The Bill is not directed at addicts who pathetically push hard drugs to finance their habit. It is directed at the big boys — the Mafia-style drug dealers and godfathers of drug trafficking who are not addicts themselves but who are out to exploit addicts for financial gain.

The Metropolitan police estimate that 23 per cent. of targeted criminals in their area are now involved in hard drugs. Ten years ago those people would have stuck to armed robbery, but they now find dealing in heroin and cocaine far more lucrative. The Bill is concerned with that category of dealer — with the most serious offences, involving the most harmful drugs.

Why is the Bill needed? Again, the reasons are simple and straightforward. The existing maximum sentence of 14 years imprisonment does not match the seriousness of the crime. Large-scale trafficking in lethal drugs is, in effect, dealing in death. To me, there is absolutely no difference between murder by shotgun in the course of armed robbery and murder by heroin for financial gain. The existing maximum sentence is also insufficient to deter traffickers who may be released after just a few years to enjoy the proceeds of their evil trade. Often a fortune awaits them because seven-figure fortunes can now be made in a relatively short time.

By increasing the maximum penalty to life imprisonment, we hope to achieve two aims — to create a far more effective deterrent, and to ensure that those who persist in trafficking in hard drugs will go to prison for a long time.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Can the hon. Gentleman now answer the question that both he and the Minister were unable to answer in Committee? How many people convicted of trafficking in class A drugs have actually received 14-year sentences?

Mr. Raffan: If the hon. Gentleman will be patient, I shall be coming to that point later. It is a small number, and we are aware of that. I shall mention Lord Chief Justice Lane's guidelines in the Aramah case and his comment during that case that, sadly, few of the big fish have been caught. However, rather than break up my remarks and lose the thread, I shall deal with that later.

Sentences of life imprisonment, should the Bill be passed on Third Reading and eventually receive Royal Assent, will be buttressed by the decision of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary severely to restrict parole for drug traffickers sentenced to more than five years. I hope that the sentence will be further reinforced by the effects of legislation in the next Session to deprive drug traffickers of the proceeds of their crimes.

I read with interest of the visit made by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department to the United States, and the comments that he made about it. He spoke of what he had learnt there and the possibility of introducing into British legislation a reversal of the burden of proof, and requiring the suspect to prove the legitimacy of his or her assets rather than those assets having to be shown to be acquired illegitimately by the legal authorities. This will be a contentious matter, but it is important that moves are made so that drug traffickers can be deprived of their assets and the astronomical amounts they are making from this evil trade. I look forward to hearing from my hon. Friend when he believes such legislation can come before the House.

The whole point of deterrence is to reduce the supply of drugs and so slow down the increase in the number of addicts. The measure of the problem can be clearly seen in the notified figures of heroine addicts for 1983. It is not melodramatic to say that we now have a heroin epidemic. In 1983, there were 3,550 notified heroin addicts, and that was 400 per cent. up on the figure for 1979. In 1983 there were 1,400 notified new addicts, which was 50 per cent. up on the figure for 1982. It is widely recognised that notified addicts are just the tip of the iceberg, and the number of regular users is much greater. It is estimated to be between 60,000 and 150,000.

The statistics may measure the problem, but they cannot measure the misery that the problem creates. I hope that the House will bear with me if I read some extracts from The Listener of January this year, following an effective programme on BBC 1, to which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary alluded in Committee. The programme was called "Real Lives—Pushers". In that programme, two pushers were interviewed about the experience and physical effects of heroin addiction, and their feelings about selling heroin. The two pushers were called Chris and John, and when Chris was asked to tell the interviewer about the experience and physical effects, he said:

"When you first start smoking you vomit a lot—anything you eat you just vomit back up again straightaway and, as John said, you lose your appetite anyway. All you seem to need to get you through the day is your heroin. First thing you think of in the morning is your heroin and the last thing you think of at night is your heroin. There are also changes in your personality. I mean, I'd do things for money for heroin that once I would never have dreamt of doing — stealing, shoplifting, burglary, anything, it doesn't matter what it is. You'll even rob your mother and father. Personally, I haven't stooped that low, but most of my friends have. Then there's the lying. Your whole life's a lie. From the time you wake up in the morning until you go to bed you are just telling one lie after another to con people, to get money. Heroin completely changes a person to a totally different person, a bad person."

John, when he was asked about his feelings of guilt about selling the drug, said:

"I always feel guilty. People think you do it by choice. Nobody does it by choice except the dealers who don't smoke it, the ones who are making all the money. I do it because if I didn't do this, I'd be out robbing. I don't want to rob any more because I don't want to go to prison again. But you've got to have it. I've woken up on the morning and I've started crying because from the second you open your eyes it's like someone dropping a ton of bricks on you: 'Where am I going to get the money? I've got to have it, where am I gonna get the money?'"

It is those against whom the Bill is primarily directed.

Heroin addiction knows no barrier of geography, class or age. I came across a recent newspaper headline which read:

"The primary kids who fix at a fiver a time'.

It was sub-titled

"A glut in the supply of heroin has forced the pushers to seek even younger markets".

That headline does not come from some sensational Fleet street tabloid newspaper but from The Times Educational Supplement in an article last year on drug addiction among primary schoolchildren.

I shall quote from the article, because it illustrates the sheer misery caused by heroin addiction among very young children.

"Heroin dealers, anxious to dispose of a glut of the drug, began selling to younger and younger teenagers. 'They could see they're an easy market', Carole Woolley, Merseyside Drug Council's full-time advice worker, explained. Ten-year-olds are now offered 'starter packs' of low-grade heroin at £5 a time. 'The technique is usually the same', says Carole Wooley. 'A pusher will give the stuff free to a teenager three or four times running saying that it will make them feel good. When the child has got used to it, suddenly they find that they have got to pay. That is the start of the downhill slope'. As the addiction takes hold, usually over a period of weeks, children find themselves needing more and more of the drug. They may turn to shoplifting, mugging or even teenage prostitution to raise the money."

That is the extent of the problem. One of the main reasons for the dramatic increase in recent years is the change in the method of misusing heroin. There are many, especially children, who draw the line at injecting the drug but who are willing to smoke it, which is called chasing the dragon. They do so in the mistaken belief that it is less likely to lead to dependency.

It is important to impress anecdotal evidence upon the House and, I hope, through the House upon the public. I shall quote the most moving description that I have heard, from Detective Constable Brandon Barrow, of the Merseyside drugs squad of a typical routine heroin raid. It exposes the total degradation of heroin addiction and the disintegration of human lives to which it leads. The detective constable said:

"One case that will live with me for the rest of my life was just a routine raid in a house in search of heroin. I went to an address, together with another detective and a policewoman. I knocked on the front door of the house and I was allowed in by the male occupant. It was approximately 12 noon. I could see from his demeanour that he was under the influence of some drug. Having gained entry, we found his wife in bed, in a similar state to him. After identifying ourselves to them we started to search the premises, which consisted of two bedrooms, a lounge and a bathroom and toilet. Unfortunately for me, I chose one of the bedrooms which appeared to be not in use. I entered the room and was immediately confronted with a smell that cannot be described. The windows had been sealed with tape, in a feeble effort to stop draughts. On the windowledge lay a number of dead flies all of whom at some time had had to suffer in the stench of the filth. The room was so full of rubbish that it was near-impossible to search. I heard a noise coming from one of the corners. In a cot was a baby. Aged eight months, she was lying on her back attempting to position the teat on a sauce bottle, which contained cold tea, into her mouth. She was wearing what I can only describe as a loin cloth over her lower parts. I reached into the cot to pick her up and saw that her little arms appeared to have no strength in them, making me think that they were broken. There was a large bruise on her face. Her nappy, if that's what you could call it, had obviously not been changed for some considerable time and, not surprisingly, there was a dreadful stench in the room. The excuse given for the bruising to her face was that she was a very active child who thrashed about in her cot. I immediately took the child to a local hospital and she was taken into care. The doctors told me that the reason for the lack of strength in the child was lack of love, having rarely been lifted out of the cot or ever received the cuddles that a baby normally receives."

That description of heroin addiction is far more effective than any statistical evidence in showing the sheer degradation that the appalling drug brings to its victims and how evil the trade in the drug is.

It is true that the seizure of controlled drugs has increased dramatically. In 1973, only 3·3 kilos of heroin were seized. Forty kilos were seized in 1979 and the estimated provisional total seized in 1984 is 294 kilos. The seizure of increasingly large quantities is a great tribute to Customs and to the police. However, it confirms the severity of the problem. Despite record seizures, the street price for heroin is more or less unchanged, and its purity is still high. A plentiful supply is still available. It is impossible to say how much is still entering the country. When we discussed the issue in Committee, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State rightly said that the total was unquantifiable. It is difficult to know what percentage the amount seized is of the total, but the Minister conceded that it can be only a fraction.

Other evidence of the growing problem is the number of offences involving drugs. In the area covered by the north Wales constabulary, which includes my constituency of Delyn, in 1978 there were 292 drug offences, none of them involving heroin, but in the first eight and a half months of 1984 there were 826 drug offences, half of them involving heroin.

This is no longer an inner city problem. It is no longer restricted to the great metropolitan areas or even to the peripheral suburban areas of cities such as Liverpool. I hope that the hon. Member for Birkenhead will not mind me describing his constituency in that way. The constituency of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) is affected as well. Heroin addiction has spread much further into the countryside and the small towns and, indeed, the small villages of north Wales.

The sentencing of drug offenders shows the courts' awareness of the need for firmer action. The proportion of drug offenders sentenced to more than five years imprisonment has doubled since 1978, from 3 per cent. to 6 per cent. In the guideline judgment in the Aramah case Lord Chief Justice Lane made it clear that heavier sentences should be imposed and to an extent that has been followed by the courts. Lord Lane advised that in cases involving the importation of any amount of class A drugs a sentence should seldom be for less than four years. For trafficking and amounts to the value of £100,000 or more the sentence should be seven years or more. For amounts to the value of £1 million or more the sentence should be 12 to 14 years.

For the actual supply of any amount a sentence should seldom be for less than three years for transactions of any amount. The nearer the source the heavier should be the sentence, up to levels similar to those for importers. But Lord Lane added that unhappily all too seldom the big fish among suppliers would be caught and that most prison sentences would be two years or less. I concede that point. That is why I, with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), who made this point effectively in Committee, believe that it is important that the powers of the police and customs officers should be increased whenever possible. They have considerably strengthened their efforts to combat drug trafficking.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State mentioned the increase from 125 to 212 in the number of customs officers dealing with heroin alone and he spoke of a further increase of 160 over the next 12 months. We are also grateful for his assurance that he would not hesitate to recommend further increases if he were satisfied that there were still further difficulties in combating the problem.

Since 1 January 1985 every police force in England and Wales has had its specialist drugs squad. There are now 1,000 officers involved in some way in the investigation of drug offences. The regional crime squads are now spending at least half their time dealing with drug conspiracies.

Two other important innovations have been the now regular annual conference of the Association of Chief Police Officers where experience and information on tackling problems of drug misuse can be exchanged. The association has set up a committee to review arrangements for drug operations. There is also in New Scotland Yard a central drugs intelligence unit, drawing officers from all over the country and disseminating information that is gathered to all the police forces. That unit also has five customs officers.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West emphasised in Committee, it is important that liaison between customs officers and police should be improved and increased and that there should be much more co-ordination of their activities. A further valid point that he made was that, as in the United States, the Inland Revenue should be brought more into drug investigations. Often the only signs of criminal involvement are large unaccounted-for assets. The Inland Revenue could help the police greatly in drug investigations.

There has been and must be an increase in the effectiveness of the police and customs officers, and an improvement in the co-ordination of their investigations. All the improvements that have been made so far are essential and welcome. Fear of detection can be as great a deterrent to crime as fear of punishment.

Parliament must ensure that the efforts of the law enforcement agencies are supported and reinforced wherever possible by making available to the courts, as this Bill does, penalties that will act as a genuine and effective deterrent to drug traffickers, and sentences that match the gravity of the crime of those caught and convicted of trafficking.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): I congratulate the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) on choosing, as the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) did, a subject in a narrow area which has all-party support, and on negotiating it successfully through the labyrinth of Parliament to Third Reading, which it will receive today. He was extremely fortunate in that there was no Second Reading debate and only a small and uncontentious Committee stage, and now we have an interesting but clearly abbreviated Third Reading debate. Nevertheless, he is to be congratulated on having had the foresight to choose a subject which would command all-party support. I am puzzled, however, about the categories into which he fitted my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and myself when he described the Labour Members who supported him.

The hon. Gentleman addresses the serious problem of drug abuse. All hon. Members have attested to that problem in terms of the increase in the availability of both heroin and cocaine. Both substances are now freely and easily available, certainly in all our major cities, and almost certainly in the major urban areas. Moreover, it is available inexpensively.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the number of addicts has increased considerably. We know the number of those notified as addicts to the Home Office. Since 1979, during the lifetime of the Government, there has been a 400 per cent. increase in the number of heroin addicts notified in that way. None of us knows the number of drug abusers. Official and unofficial estimates vary from 50,000 to 100,000. Certainly all hon. Members are experiencing in their constituencies an increasing number of younger addicts of heroin and cocaine.

Three years ago it would have been extremely unusual for me to come across a young person who was a heroin or cocaine addict or a drug abuser in my constituency. It used to be rare for me to receive letters or representations from parents about the paucity of facilities in my area because their children were not drug abusers. Unfortunately, it is now an everyday occurrence to hear of, to know and to meet drug abusers, and to come across the more distressing feature of their anguished parents seeking help. It has even reached the stage when the Liverpool Echo can publish photographs of newborn babies who are addicts suffering from withdrawal symptoms of heroin because their mothers were addicts.

The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) and his wife foster children. In Committee he gave a graphic account of the way in which he and his wife had to deal with the withdrawal symptoms of a baby whom they fostered, whose mother had been a heroin addict. That is a terrifying picture of the state that we have reached.

The problem is exacerbated by the amount of heroin, cocaine and other drugs that come into the country. The fact that seizures have increased dramatically during the past few years is a tribute to the effectiveness of Customs and Exise officers, but it also suggests that they are seizing a larger amount of a bigger overall volume coming through the ports. The fact that 300 kilos of heroin were seized last year suggests that it is only a fraction of the amount that is entering the country. In Committee the Minister said that that was nearly 20 per cent. of the amount coming in, but even if we take that as a reasonable estimate—I do not know on what it is based—we must not forget that a considerable amount of heroin is still entering the country and is freely available.

That is aided and abetted by the reduction in customs staff. I do not wish to make too much of the point, and the Minister will no doubt say that the number of uniformed staff has been reduced but that there are many more officers engaged in intelligence work. I accept the sense and importance of that. Of course it is much more important to have trained professional officers trying to identify sources and couriers, catch them and convict them, than it is to rely only on untrained, uniformed officers at the ports.

However, while acknowledging all that, it is still true that the more a person knows he is likely to be stopped and searched, even on a random basis, the more will he be deterred from bringing in heroin. Of course it will not stop the major pushers and the professional organisations, because enormous amounts of money are involved, but it may stop some of the smaller fry, who are also important in terms of the total volume of drugs entering the country. I regret that the Government have reduced our defences, inadequate as they were in the first place, so dramatically during their period of office. Given our open boundaries and the open nature of our society, we shall never prevent determined, professional, well-organised traffickers from bringing drugs into the country. We should never believe that that is possible, but the Government could have done more than they are now.

It is also true that more small-time pushers as well as addicts are being convicted of drug offences every year, and more of them end up behind bars without the services and facilities that are required. More crimes are also being committed by drug addicts, either as a result of hallucinations or delusions stemming from their addiction, or because they need the wherewithal to purchase drugs. Drug addiction leads not only to the destruction of young and adult lives, to enormous social pressures and family difficulties, but to a great increase in ordinary crime, which affects innocent, law-abiding citizens. There is also a massive increase in the cost to the Health Service, not least in terms of illness and death caused by drug addiction. Several hundred people die each year in the most horrifying and terrible circumstances.

There is a massive and increasing problem of drug abuse. Just as during our debate on the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Bill, so it is relevant to say here that we need more education of youngsters and their families. Therefore, we need more training of social workers, teachers and other professionals, which in turn means that we need many more facilities and services, be they rehabilitation hostels, detoxification units or drop-in advice centres, than are currently available. It is a disgrace that many areas of Britain, including London, the home counties and the north-west of England, are completely bereft of facilities for drug abusers or their families. It is a disgrace that, under all Governments, we have not taken a greater interest in the deep and serious problems of drug abusers and their families and provided the necessary social, medical and rehabilitative services. As we said in the previous debate, the Government are providing about £10 million, but that is not enough. On other occasions, right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have acknowledged that and made representations to the Government about it.

More importantly, the £10 million comes to an end in two years. Whatever that money is pump-priming now runs the risk of dying when that mony from the Government stops in two years. It is clear that we need not just £10 million as a one-off payment, but a continuing Government commitment to central funding for rehabilitative services for drug abusers.

What we really need to do—and this is what the Bill addresses itself to—is to catch those responsible for bringing the substances into the country and for subverting young people into becoming abusers. We need to catch and punish the traffickers. They are evil men and women who are making huge commercial profits out of the destruction of young lives.

In that context, incidentally, it may be relevant to point out that many of us greatly regret that the Minister is not yet able to announce when legislation will be introduced enabling the courts to take the assets of drug traffickers gained in the trafficking of drugs. It is not a new idea. It was put forward a long time ago with all-party acclamation. It was received with enthusiasm by the Minister and his Home Secretary more than 18 months ago. We are still waiting for the legislation to help deal with that problem.

If and when that legislation comes, presumably it will shift the onus of proof to the alleged drug offender to show that his assets were not obtained during the course of his trafficking in drugs, and I am not sure that that will receive the support of the Opposition. That is a matter to which we shall have to come back on another occasion, but it may be useful to point out now that the Minister should not assume that such a fundamental change in our criminal justice system and in the principle of an individual being innocent until proved guilty will obtain the support of the Opposition.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that we already have the concept of the shift of proof in taxation matters, where the man is put to proof that the money that he has received has come from legitimate and earned income sources? This is not such a fundamental shift in our principles.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: That may be so, but because a precedent exists in one area, that does not mean that it would be appropriate in another area. However, I do not propose to get involved in an argument about the merits of our fiscal system. We are discussing a Bill dealing with a very specific area. In any event, I have no doubt that we shall have that debate across party lines, and I am sure that there will be many hon. Members on the Government Benches who will take a different view from my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham). But that is for another occasion, and it looks like being an interesting debate.

When I mentioned, incidentally, an area that seemed to arouse controversy, I was saying that we needed to do a great deal more in terms of prevention and of detecting and catching those responsible for trafficking in drugs. There is no doubt that we need more police working full time on this problem. I know that every police authority now has a full-time drugs squad. However, the number of police officers in each police authority area actually working full time in the drugs squad varies enormously. Given the size of my own county of Merseyside and of its drug problem, there seems to be a relatively small number of officers working full time on drugs inquiries when compared with other areas of the country. Perhaps more guidance should be given by the Home Office to ensure that the priority that the Government and Parliament accord to catching those who traffic in drugs is recognised by our chief constables and acknowledged in terms of the resources that they put at the disposal of their drugs squads. In that context, I should like to see more liaison between police forces and Customs and Excise investigative officers.

The Opposition do not oppose the Bill. We endorse its principle and wish to see it on the statute book as quickly as possible, though I am not convinced that it will make a major impact on the drug scene. First, I do not believe that many of those who come before the courts will receive life instead of 14 years' imprisonment. Many of those who are caught at the moment do not receive 14 years. The hon. Member for Delyn could not tell me, despite my repeated requests, how many drug traffickers had been sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment or less. The Minister could not answer that question in Committee. As he has been put on notice, he will no doubt have the answer, or an adequate reason as to why he does not have one. It is important. I do not suspect that many individuals will come into that category. Not many will receive life imprisonment, because not many receive 14 years at the moment.

Mr. Raffan: The hon. Gentleman's logic is somewhat astray—the intervention of the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) may have somewhat thrown him—because the fact that few maximum sentences of 14 years' imprisonment are not given at the moment does not mean that that will be the position in the future.

As my hon. Friend the Minister made clear in Committee, he expects that the Lord Chief Justice, should the Bill become law, will produce further guidelines. There is evidence that the guidelines that he produced in the Aramah case have been observed. The hon. Gentleman is being somewhat negative. He should wait and see how effective the Bill will be, rather than dismiss it before there has been a chance to implement it.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: I am not dismissing it. If I were, I should be opposing it, and I am not. The Bill has gone through largely undebated, let alone opposed. It will go through unopposed today. It is reasonable in that context to make the point that if Parliament is saying that it wants to increase penalties it has to show that the penalties presently available are insufficient and not effective or strong enough. The only way to demonstrate that is to show that many people who should have been given life have not been so sentenced. We cannot show how many people have been given the maximum of 14 years, which is available to the courts at present. We should consider that point.

I accept what the hon. Member for Delyn says, with his convoluted logic. If we make the maximum life, it may act as a greater deterrent to drug traffickers. That is what we are talking about. We are not talking about catching more people or providing extra resources for the police and Customs and Excise. We are not doing any more on the ground. We are saying that when we have caught the drug traffickers, they may get life instead of 14 years. I do not dissent from that for the evil people about whom we are talking.

The only effect of the change of law might be to deter from drug trafficking because of the threat of life imprisonment some people who would otherwise have trafficked in drugs because the threat was a mere 14 years. That is not a deterrent, but it is a matter of judgment and I hope that I am proved wrong. If the Bill saves one life, or the destruction of one family, it will have been worth while. I hope that it does more than that, but I do not believe that it will.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): The hon. Member for Knowlsey, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) has called into question the Government's determination to confront the drugs problem. I dissent from what he has said on that point, but only on that point.

I support the Bill wholeheartedly. I am sure that the introduction of draconian penalties for those who indulge in the filthy but lucrative trade of producing and supplying class A drugs will accord with the wishes of the public. I am sure that that will find a great deal of sympathy in the country. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) on introducing the Bill.

Everyone in the House must agree with the Bill in so far as it seeks to confront the enormous growth in the supply of hard drugs. As a Member of the House and as the parent of two teenage children I am worried about the possibility that my children might be dragged into that foul trade. The habit cannot be acquired or sustained without the production, supply and distribution of drugs. The dramatic increase in the supply in recent years was confirmed by the evidence given to the Home Affairs Committee this year by the customs and excise group of the Society of Civil and Public Servants.

Almost daily we read in the newspapers of dramatic seizures by the customs and excise and by the police. I pay tribute to the vigilance and success of those enforcement agencies—particularly to those dedicated and diligent officers quartered overseas who are pursuing inquiries in the countries of supply. However, I fear that the startling successes of the customs and excise merely highlight the growth of the trade.

Only yesterday customs officers at Heathrow seized 14 kilos of cocaine, valued at £2·5 million. That is thought to be the largest ever single seizure of cocaine intended for supply and sale in Britain. It is interesting that two foreign nationals—Brazilians—were arrested in connection with those offences. I shall say no more about it because it is now sub judice.

The highlighting of the big seizures merely demonstrates the extent of the problem. I understand that there are now major fears on the part of police and customs officers that cocaine abuse in Britain will explode, as it has in the United States. The latest seizure figure for cocaine in the United States, in the most recent year for which figures are available, is 33,000 lb—a growth from under 1,000 lb in a very few years. Last year customs officers in Britain seized 77 lb of cocaine, valued at £7·25 million. Yesterday's seizure tends to demonstrate that the growth in the supply of the drug is explosive.

There seems to be a view that cocaine—which has a following among those who might broadly be called the prominent people of the café society—is in some way more acceptable than the established heroin abuse. There is nothing to choose between them. The appalling growth of heroin abuse merely serves as a pointer to the potential growth of cocaine abuse. An increasing number of addicts are known to the police; there is an increasing amount of seizure.

Another extremely worrying factor is the apparent drop in street prices. That tends to confirm the fears expressed by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North that there is a dramatic increase in the availability of the drugs. Like the hon. Gentleman, I regret that the Bill does not include any measures to allow the seizure and forfeiture of the assets of those convicted of drugs offences. There is now a very sophisticated laundering of the illicit gains of those convicted of supplying and producing drugs, and only by seizing their assets shall we spike the laundering process.

I am also worried about the number of convictions of foreign nationals. There should be automatic deportation of anyone from another country who is convicted of the supply and distribution of class A drugs, and there should be no right of appeal.

Notwithstanding those reservations, I give the Bill my complete support. I am sure that we all worry about the drugs problem. It has no respect for social class, from the café society people that I mentioned to those in the public bars of working class pubs, this pernicious and evil trade is making its impact. I speak with some limited experience in that respect. I congratulate my hon. Friend again on introducing the Bill. I shall have absolutely no qualms about giving it my full support.

1.10 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Like other hon. Members, I congratulate the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) on bringing forward the Bill. I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) made that point, but he was unfair to go on to say how limited the Bill's impact would be. No one who supports the Bill pretends anything other than that it is one small measure in attempting to deal with a grave problem. When we have had the chance to debate it before, we have pressed the Government on how comprehensive their policy is to try to beat the evil disease that is racking our society. Speeches have concentrated on the need to break up the centres of production, the supply routes and gates into this country, the pushing and the need to help those who are addicted.

However, today we are dealing with one small area, which is the penalty for those who are liable to make most out of the trade. I wish to give the Bill wholehearted support because it is a matter about which many of my constituents feel strongly. It is interesting that in meetings around the constituency, drugs is now the number one issue that people wish to discuss. Constituents are worried about the level of sentencing. They have another worry, on which the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) touched. If people who make considerable profit out of the trade are given light sentences, they come out of prison to rich pickings. I point out that it is significant that three quarters of the Opposition Members present are from Merseyside constituencies. That shows the importance that we attach to the matter.

I ask the Under-Secretary to give us an idea about his proposals for dealing with the assets of those who have made considerable fortunes out of the drug trade. I should like to draw his attention to the fact that one does not have to be what is typically described as one of the big boys or girls in the trade to make a fortune. Let me illustrate that point. A couple of weeks ago I had a meeting in the north end of Birkenhead at which the residents' association told me that one of the ordinary pushers had been given a good beating up five times by local people because they were so horrified at the role that that person was playing in pushing drugs in the area. To ordinary people like me, the threat of one beating up from the north end of Birkenhead would bring about a change in my behaviour. To risk not one but five such beatings and still push that trade tells us something about the gains that those people are making.

When I reported back on the Bill in the constituency, there was overwhelming support for it. Equally, however, people have suggested that if we are going to hand out tough sentences, we should also take measures to make sure that those who are little more than merchants of death in that trade do not profit by the horrors that they inflict on others. Therefore, my one contribution to the debate is to ask the Minister to tell us something more about his proposals and the experience that he gained in the United States, which we learnt about in The Guardian and The Times earlier this week.

1.13 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): As a practising lawyer, I have come across the merchants of death in one capacity or another on several occasions. An anecdote was told to me by a friend, who is also a practising lawyer, which illustrates the moneys involved in that dirty and despicable trade. One of his clients received a sentence of five years for supplying a class A drug. The only thing that concerned that man after sentence was how he would safeguard his investments while he was in prison. It is wrong that people should make a vast amount of money—vast amounts of money are involved in the trade—cause other people misery, go to prison, and know that while they are in prison their money is being utilised, earning more and growing in size so that they come out to a fat little nest egg. I take the view—I hope that the Minister will reassure us on the matter—that those who are involved in the drugs trade, make money out of the misery and suffering of others, and are convicted for doing so, should be put to the test of having to explain where their assets come from. I refer, of course, only to those who have been convicted.

I would take issue with anyone who argued that we would be shifting the burden of proof and contravening the natural principles of justice. Do we allow the burglar, after conviction, to retain his stolen property? We do not. It is taken back. The equivalent of the proceeds of a burglary in the case of dealing in class A or class B drugs is the money received. There is no logical distinction between the drug pedlar and the burglar or car thief who has taken property that he should not have taken.

I stress that the Bill is concerned with the drug dealer, not the user, who belongs in a quite different category. We are talking about those who make money out of the sale of class A and class B drugs. If legislation were brought in to take away the proceeds of crime from the dealer after conviction, I would support it. There is no distinction in my mind between the position of a convicted drug dealer and that of a burglar, thief or fraudster who gains the property of others through criminal activity. The dealer gains the property of others—their money—by criminal activity. We should not deny the courts the right to take that money back, by putting the dealer to the test of having to reveal where his assets have come from. I suspect that a vast number of members of the Labour party share my attitude towards the convicted criminal and the proceeds of his crime.

Belatedly, I congratulate the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) on the content of his Bill. I welcome the availability of the life sentence for those convicted of class A drugs offences. For certain dealers a life sentence is the only justifiable punishment. Life sentences are available for manslaughter. They are rarely used but they are part of the armoury of the court. The Bill adds the life sentence to the armoury of the courts in the case of class A drugs. I do not expect that many people will receive a life sentence. Very few cases would merit such a sentence. However, the possibility should be there.

I welcome, too, the increase to 14 years as the maximum sentence in the case of class B drug offences. Recently I read with horror an article in Police Review advocating the legalisation of cannabis. Few people in this country would support that attitude. Cannabis is as insidious and as open to manipulation as any other drug. There seems to be an attitude of mind that cannabis is not very harmful. I invite anyone who takes that view to spend a day in Amsterdam to see what happened there when a relaxed attitude was adopted towards the drug trade. It got so completely out of hand that the police were unable to cope, and there was the spin-off effect of people experimenting with quick pleasure and rapidly turning to hard drugs. Amsterdam is now an absolute mess, as anybody who has been there knows.

People who deal in cannabis also make vast fortunes. When we hear of shiploads of £2 million or even £3 million-worth of cannabis being intercepted, we should ask why people are importing the stuff. It is because there is a market for it, and a quick profit is readily available. That profit is not taxed and it is not, at the moment, seized. If a Bill to legalise cannabis were ever introduced, I should resist it all the way, and I am sure that many other hon. Members would, too.

Drugs are addictive, manipulative and damaging, and ultimately they destroy those who use them. Drug dealers are evil and cunning and should be incarcerated for a long time. If I had my way—I hope that the Minister can give us an assurance on this—when they came out of prison they would be bankrupt. There should be no profit in the sale of substances which cause such misery.

1.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) on bringing forward the Bill, on securing such widespread support for it, and on the eloquent way in which he proposed its acceptance in Committee and again today. He has done an excellent job.

The problem of drug abuse is a matter of increasing concern and is central to my work at the moment. I have recently returned from the United States, where I learnt a great deal about their problems. It would be instructive for the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) to make such a pilgrimage, as I am sure that his understanding of the problem would deepen if he went there.

It has been noted that the Americans are as interested in how we are tackling our drugs problem as we are in knowing how they are tackling theirs. I was told more than once that they are surprised, not that we have a bad problem, but at how long it has taken us to get one. America has had a serious problem with drug misuse for several decades, but it has intensified as cocaine has entered parts of the community which previous drug habits did not. The problem in some other western European countries, such as the Netherlands, Italy and West Germany, started before ours and is worse than ours. I say that not out of complacency but to put our problems in perspective.

One of the lessons to be learnt from the United States is that there is no one lever on the wall which can be pulled to resolve the drug abuse problem. The matter must therefore be addressed in many ways. There must be interventions at each link in the long chain that leads, in the case of cocaine, from South America or, with heroin, for the most part from Pakistan, to the user. We have to disrupt the supply in the country of origin, at ports and airports and as it is distributed.

Although the Americans are spending between $1·5 billion and $2 billion at federal level on dealing with drug abuse this year, 20 per cent. was the best estimate that I could get from the Drug Enforcement Agency of the amount of cocaine that it is intercepting. We must all keep trying as hard as we can to disrupt the flow of drugs, but we can never take all drugs away from customers. In a free society there will always be some people who can get around the inevitably limited restrictions on the importation of a product.

Unless one is prepared to erect the barriers of totalitarianism, one cannot check every individual entering the country, intercept every package and search every container. No free society can do that, so we must give increasing attention to taking the customers away from the drugs. That is why we have been anxious to expand facilities for the treatment and rehabilitation of long-term addicts and have made direct funds available for that purpose. [Interruption.] I am trying to answer questions put to me by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North. No doubt he put them merely for the record and is not particularly interested in the answers, but it would be a good deal easier for me to make my speech if I could have his attention.

We have sought to give impetus to treatment and rehabilitation in two ways: first, funds are available through the DHSS central funding initiative; secondly, we have sought to apply proper pressure to health authorities to ensure that in carrying out their duty to provide comprehensive health care for their communities a fair proportion of funding is directed to the treatment of drug misuse. The Department is making efforts in that regard. About £700 million in increased cash is being made available to the Health Service this year, of which some £60 million to £70 million is actual growth money, and it is right that a fair proportion of that should go to improve these facilities.

I appreciate the gravity of the problem on Merseyside, where I shall be spending all day Monday. I do not have my programme with me, but I believe that I shall be visiting the constituency of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I shall be opening a new facility provided by Merseyside regional health authority, and I know from my friendship with the chairman that that authority is deeply concerned about the situation.

Both we and the Americans are also using prevention campaigns and trying to educate people to recognise the misery of drug abuse. My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn quoted tellingly from the extremely helpful BBC television programme and the article in The Listener. Who could read about the misery of that addict's life without feeling that no one should have to go through that, and that even a teenager feeling rebellious and disenchanted with society should not willingly put himself at that kind of risk.

However much Governments may do, as both we and the Americans recognise in the forewords to our statements of strategy—it is Government's duty to set the framework—the drug menace will be turned back only when the energies of the whole community are directed towards eradicating it. That can be done in many ways. There is a need to build better relationships between parents and teenagers so that teenagers can talk candidly to their parents about the pressures to which they are subjected. People should be prepared to co-operate to the maximum extent with the police and the authorities in making it clear that drug pushers will not be tolerated in their communities. There is far more knowledge in the community about what is happening on the drugs scene than is ever revealed to the authorities.

If we are to defeat the pushers, I believe that even the user-pusher, for whom one may have some sneaking sympathy, must go to prison, along with the more cynical pusher who is in it purely for the money. Whether the motive for spreading the habit be cynical greed or the need to feed one's own habit, anyone who is prepared to try to interest others in drug taking deserves to be taken out of the community. That is the only defence mechanism that the community has.

I wished to put our efforts in context because I believe that we are evolving a comprehensive policy. In recent months we have intervened in all those ways, and more is to come. We have expanded the capability of the customs, and we will not hesitate to increase the numbers of customs officers if the threat from heroin and cocaine continues to grow. The value of intelligence and the impetus that is put on knowing what is happening is clearly evidenced by Operation Rattlesnake, which was concluded yesterday, when 14 kilos of cocaine were seized as a result of many months of effort.

There will always be room for the random stopping of people coming through customs, because experienced customs officers, pooling information with drug enforcement authorities in other countries, will be aware of what is going on. I was delighted to learn of the high level of co-operation between the United Kingdom and the United States in these matters. Any experienced officer on duty in the green channel will have an idea of the profile of the potential drug pusher. He will always make a large find by having the experience to say that someone is behaving suspiciously.

However, in the end, if we are to get more of the people organising this, and not just the mules, who are literally two a penny and will run the stuff through an airport for a fee, we shall have to rely on intelligence. There has to be the maximum transparency between police and customs. We have not only to lay down a database from which careful exploration of these conspiracies can be made, but we must have experienced analysts able to analyse what is happening, what that tells us and how that enables us to get down to the heart of the practical job of smashing these conspiracies.

The police role against drugs needs always to be enhanced. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North took a somewhat one-dimensional view of the police role in talking only about drugs squads. Drugs squads have an important role to play at individual force level, including some of the specific work on the distribution network of drugs within the community, but the size of the drugs squad should not be taken as evidence of the commitment of the police force to the eradication of drugs, because that ignores two dimensions.

The first is the extent to which, on the instigation of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary, and the Association of Chief Police Officers, so much attention is being given to educating every policeman, and not just those who are in the drugs squad. This is particularly directed to the officers on the beat so that they are able to intervene helpfully in the drugs problem in their neighbourhood. It is not good enough to say that the drugs squad is the expert part of the force, and that the rest of the force gets on with other work. We all know that drugs are not a problem on their own. People involved in drugs are often involved in crime either because they are criminals or because they become criminals to feed their habit.

Secondly, major criminals who have hitherto earned their living from counterfeiting or robbing banks have moved into major drugs distribution as a way of making even richer pickings. That is why it is crucial for the House to recognise that up to 50 per cent. of the time of regional crime squads is spent investigating major drugs distribution networks. That is the way it should be. Drugs should be treated as a mainstream police activity, because it is certain that mainstream criminals are involved.

If there is to be an answer to the drugs problem, it can come about only by the will of the whole community to resist it, and the ability of people to say no. In the end, that is the key to it. It is the willingness at all levels of society — inexplicable to those of us outside — to become involved in drugs that is so frightening. The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) will find how desperately frightening it is when he goes to America next week. I wish him and his colleagues on the Home Affairs Select Committee all success on that visit. He will be as horrified as I was to learn of the extent to which cocaine has penetrated not just to the deprived ghetto areas, where one can argue, as the hon. Member for Knowsley, North did, that deprivation causes drug addiction, but to the achievers in society. These are successful people with a high income—the yuppies as I think they are sometimes called. The influence of such people—often bankers and executives, who go to the smart consulting rooms of the leading cocaine specialists whom I saw in New York—on the drug scene is causing the problem.

I was told that one of the leading groups telephoning the cocaine hotline consisted of airline personnel, and that makes one realise how serious is the threat to the community. That crucial personnel, whose spot-on behaviour is vital for the mechanisms of a sophisticated society, are robbed of their energies, abilities and concentration by drugs is one of the most frightening things. It is even more frightening in many ways than the fact that unsuccessful people escape from their misery into drugs, although that is troubling enough.

In erecting barriers against drugs, it is essential to have a framework of law and penalties which enable sentences of imprisonment to be visited on drug dealers which are commensurate with the gravity of the offence and enable a warning to be sent to those who might become involved that the courts will not overlook such behaviour and that it will be visited with severe sentences of imprisonment.

We know, as my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn has told us, that, within the existing range of penalties, the Lord Chief Justice has constructed a careful set of guidelines for the courts, which were promulgated in September 1982. I believe that the guidelines have been highly successful. In 1978, 15 people were sentenced to over seven years' imprisonment for drug offences. In 1979, the figure was 20. It was 16 in 1980 and 31 in 1981, of whom three were sentenced to 14 years. There were 28 in 1982, of whom one was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment.

In the first year after the Aramah judgment, 61 people were sentenced to more than seven years' imprisonment, of whom two fitted into the Lord Chief Justice's principal category of 12 to 14 years in prison for trafficking in class A drugs to the value of more than £1 million. However, neither of those persons received 14 years' imprisonment. One was sentenced to 13 years and the other to 12.

I do not have the figures for 1984, as they will not be available until the summer. However, I have taken a sample of some of the cases which have been heard this year, and those who believe in stiff penalties for these offences will be encouraged to learn that this very month at the Inner London Crown court three people who were involved in one importation of 12.78 kg of heroin were each sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment. In February, at Maidstone Crown court, three principals in a heroin smuggling syndicate were dealt with following a 6 kg seizure last year. They were sentenced to 12 years, 12 years and 10 years respectively.

As recently as yesterday, an American woman who sought to import cocaine to the value of about £250,000 received eight years' imprisonment and an experienced High Court judge, Mr. Justice Kenneth Jones, made it clear that that was precisely the sort of sentence which those running drugs in from America could expect. On the same day, at Reading Crown court, an Indian involved in heroin smuggling was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. When a circuit judge said the other day that the courts had declared war on the drug smuggler, there was much evidence — we read it in our newspapers every day — to show that he was right. I warmly congratulate the Lord Chief Justice on giving a lead, as I do the judiciary on so faithfully following it.

We are bound to make value judgments on gravity in the criminal justice system, but it is wrong that individual acts of murder, for example, or some offences not involving murder, should merit life imprisonment if drug trafficking, which involves death and misery on a large scale, does not. As my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn said, that must be the underpinning case for introducing life imprisonment for trafficking in class A drugs.

Within the 14-year tariff, the Lord Chief Justice is compelled to have a wide bracket when dealing with offences involving drugs to the value of £1 million or more. We know from the Rattlesnake operation that amounts that are worth more than £1 million are being intercepted. We know, too, that the tariffs for bank robbery and armed robbery are often higher than those for drug offences. That is because there is no restriction of 14 years for those offences. When the Bill becomes law, as I hope and pray it will speedily, those involved in offences in which a large quantity of drugs has been discovered will merit life imprisonment. In many instances a lot of money will be lying around and it will be clear that the Crown will not be able to take possession of it whatever effort is made to do so. Those who are now sentenced to the maximum term will be released within 10 years even without parole. A decade of one's life may seem worth while in the judgment of some if one has millions of pounds, dollars, Swiss francs or another currency stashed away to live on.

The penalty of life imprisonment and the determination of successive Home Secretaries to make that stick, enables the courts to deal for the first time with people who have cleverly salted away assets which, however hard we try, will be difficult to get hold of. It will also allow the tariff all the way down the scale to be lifted up. It is not for me to offer advice to the Lord Chief Justice, but I imagine, knowing of his identification of drugs as one of his principal worries in exercising his criminal jurisdiction, that as soon as the Bill becomes law he will take the opportunity of another case such as that of Aramah to lay down fresh guidelines. I am equally sure that his colleagues will, with equal vigour, ensure that those guidelines stick as well as they have made the Aramah guidelines stick.

This is an area in which it is crucial to make clear the good and bad aspects of the situation. If we are to get on top of the drugs problem, we shall only do so by candour and by recognising the scale of the difficulties that we face. It is clear that sending people to prison is important if they are major dealers, but that it is not the end of the exercise while we do not have the most effective way of confiscating assets.

There might be some misunderstanding about what can be done at the moment. It would be wrong, just because we are focusing on finding a new and more effective way of confiscating assets, to think that ways do not exist to deprive people of the profits of their crime. They do. As recently as the Criminal Justice Act 1972 a mechanism to make serious offenders criminally bankrupt was introduced. That was carefully thought out and went through the House, to a great deal of acclaim. It is regrettable that for one reason or another it is not much use and is regarded as a rather blunt instrument, but it is there and can be used.

The courts also now have the option of imposing unlimited fines. The confiscation of assets does not need to be by way of a confiscation order. If it is known that someone has £1 million stashed away, there is no reason not to fine him that amount and rely on the enforcement procedures. That can be done by the courts today, so it must not be thought that the courts are impotent to deal with assets.

Equally, the Inland Revenue has a role to play. Although it took a long time, it was almost certainly worth while, in the judgment of us all, that some years of pursuit of the principals in the Operation Julie case led, as I understand it, to the Inland Revenue recovering almost £500,000.

All those steps can be taken by the court today. What cannot be done as effectively as we would want is to deal with the fact that the sophisticated international criminal does not have a large deposit account in his name in a high street bank so that anybody on a moment's investigation can find it. He is involved in a sophisticated enterprise and the money may be in a country unaffected by the conspiracy. It may be in assets, passed to other criminals or laundered through a multiplicity of accounts, as the Americans will tell the hon. Member for Knowsley, North when he goes to the United States. We must find more sophisticated ways of tracing assets, and that is what we are directing our attention to.

In the world of fantasy which the hon. Gentleman will occupy at a moment's provocation, he seems to think that all this is easy. It is interesting to note that in goading us to find the answer he was rather short on solutions himself. Having latched on to one possible solution which appeared in the press yesterday as a result of my debriefing on my American trip — that there might be some utility in reversing the burden of proof — the hon. Gentleman, having called for effective measures, was quick to say that if that were introduced it might be too effective for the liking of the Opposition. Happily, there are independent spirits on the Back Benches in the shape of the hon. Member for St. Helens, South and others who, I dare say, will give that a fair wind.

The business of tracing assets requires a number of things. It requires the ability to find mechanisms to go through and uncover a complicated system of dealing in which the successful Mr. Big will have become involved, and a high level of co-operation between various countries. That is why we are working so hard with the Americans and through the Pompidou group — the Council of Ministers' group on the misuse of drugs, which we now chair — to find mechanisms to ensure that our orders are given effect in other jurisdictions.

Above all, there may need to be changes in banking arrangements so that there is transparency in appropriate cases. The Inland Revenue may need to be more greatly involved in the police work to uncover drug conspiracies. Those are major points. I know that when the hon. Member for Knowsley, North tries hard he is capable of being fair. He will recognise that these matters cannot be carried out at the drop of a hat. They merit careful thought. The worst step that we could take would be to rush into arrangements which we think will be successful, but which are only half thought out.

I am determined that we shall make progress on this matter. I do not regard my hon. Friend's Bill as the last word on the matter, but it is a crucial contribution to the efforts that we are all making to get on top of the drugs menace. I commend the Bill to the House.

1.45 pm

Mr. Raffan: I should like to make some brief comments on the speeches that have been made today. I wish in all good humour to apologise to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk) if I upset him by my description of the Labour party. I admit that it was a gross over-simplification to suggest that there were only two factions. I did not intend to do that.

I agree with most of the hon. Gentleman's comments. He made a valid point when he referred to the increased amount of heroin seized being as much a reflection of the fact that increasing amounts are entering the country as of the increasing effectiveness of the police force. There is no room for complacency. We must be eternally vigilant and do all that we can to improve the effectiveness and the co-ordination of the police and customs officers. The Bill is no substitute for that.

It is unfortunate to play the old numbers game about customs officers. There is no doubt that my figures and the Minister's answer show that an increased number of customs officers, whatever their overall total number, are directing their efforts solely towards drug trafficking. All hon. Members must be extremely careful and responsible in their comments about customs officers. It is important that we do not say or do anything that could possibly lower their morale or raise the morale of drug traffickers. I hope that hon. Members will be responsible in that respect, because the House must give those officers every support.

I agree, as, did the Minister, with the remarks of the hon. Member for Knowsley, North about random stopping. In Committee, the hon. Gentleman referred to the three hours that it took to search a Boeing 737 and its passengers. If every plane coming into Heathrow or Gatwick were stopped and searched, there would be tiers of aircraft up to 50,000 ft. waiting to land. That would be impossible. By its nature, random stopping cannot be highly effective in the sense that it cannot stop the trade dead.

There are many other aspects of the problem, including the medical and educational aspects. Last month the Minister produced a pamphlet on tackling drug misuse, which has been most valuable and which brings everything together. He is leading a co-ordinating team of Ministers from different Departments who are considering all the different ways of tackling drug misuse. I am only sorry that the name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is not mentioned, although the name of one of the Under-Secretaries of State for Scotland is. Perhaps we can bring that matter up at Welsh Question Time and find out whether he has been attending those meetings. I hope that he has.

Another important aspect raised by the hon. Member for Knowsley, North is that of sentencing and Lord Chief Justice Lane's guidelines. The hon. Gentleman is being unfair in harping on about the numbers who receive the maximum sentence. The guidelines have proved effective. Although not as many drug traffickers have received the existing maximum sentence as he would have wished, as the Lord Chief Justice said, there are great difficulties in catching the big fish. Obviously, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) said in Committee, we cannot sentence them until we catch them. It is a valid point, but I do not believe that sentencing is at fault.

We must detect the major dealers, and my hon. Friend the Minister made an effective point about the sophisticated methods of detection in the United States, which I have no doubt are duplicated here. The major drug dealers—the merchants of death, as the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) rightly called them—are sophisticated operators. They are not running sweetie shops. We need highly sophisticated operations and legislation to deal with them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) was disappointed that there is no clause in the Bill relating to the forfeiture of assets. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) also believed that it might have been useful to include such a clause. We had discussions about it, but the feeling was that it would be sad to endanger the Bill by including a clause that might be contentious and inadequate.

My hon. Friend the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham mentioned sophisticated laundering operations. In order to deal with them, we need highly effective legislation, which should not be drawn up hurriedly, although I hope that it will be introduced in the next Session. That Bill will obviously be much longer than this one, and it must be sophisticated if it is to work. My hon. Friend the Minister referred to the present bankruptcy legislation, which is rather a blunt weapon. It would be sad if any legislation on the forfeiture of assets were also blunt.

There was an omission in my opening speech, which I wish to correct now. It might be invidious to single out any of my supporters for the help and encouragement that they have given me, but I shall do so, because the hon. Member for Birkenhead has give me considerable support and help, and I wish to pay tribute to him. His commitment to the problem is well known in the House, and he was the instigator of an important early-day motion that was tabled last autumn. I am extremely grateful to him for his assistance.

The Bill is no magic cure, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead said. The problem of drug misuse is highly complex, extremely serious and ever-growing. There would be no point in the Bill if it were seen simply as the Tory Right on a rampage of retribution. The fact that I introduced it shows that it is not a Tory Right measure anyway. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North was right to say that there are many aspects to the problem, including prevention, treatment and rehabilitation. However, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, no lever can be pulled which will suddenly, miraculously and at a stroke resolve the problem. The Bill covers just one aspect of deterrence, which in itself is just one part of prevention.

I hope that the hon. Member for Knowsley, North's suggestion that the Bill will have no impact will be proved wrong. It is unduly negative to say that now. It is a modest Bill, but it can do something, and surely we should do anything that we can.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Prohibition of Female Circumcision Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered; reported, without amendment.

1.53 pm

Mrs. Marion Roe (Broxbourne): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am delighted that we have reached this stage of the Bill's progress because there has been pressure for such a measure for several years. I am grateful to all those who have assisted me. The purpose of the Bill is to make it clear beyond doubt that the practice of female circumcision should be illegal in Britain. Although, as the law stands, it might be argued that to perform such an operation constituted an act of actual bodily harm, there is no precedent detailing this. The degree of abhorrence of these procedures felt by all can leave no room for uncertainty. The Bill, though short, is both concise and exact and achieves that purpose.

Female circumcision is an act of mutilation performed upon young girls and women. The Bill seeks to include all the various methods adopted, from the most simple, known as sunna, to the most radical, infibulation. To achieve this, the working of the Bill, as set out in clause 1(1), has had to be of a catch-all nature. Obviously there is no desire so to leave the Bill that it interferes with legitimate medical operations, and clause 2 makes this clear. With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall return to that shortly.

Accordingly, any act of mutilation is included in clause 1, which creates the offence itself. This is then extended to include the aiding and abetting of another in self-mutilation. As I mentioned in Committee, this is a direct analogy with the Suicide Act 1960. No offence is committed by a person performing such a violent act upon herself. In our society, such prohibitions, echoing faintly the notion of burying suicides in unconsecrated ground, are not felt to be appropriate. But the weak need the protection of the law from those who would exploit their weakness. If these practices are to cease in this country, the law prohibiting them cannot have potential loopholes.

In accordance with the basic principle of the criminal law, the Bill therefore provides that to aid and abet the offence is also itself an offence.

The penalties envisaged underline the detestation of female circumcision in this country. The Bill does not regard the offence as one to be treated lightly.

Since the discussion of the Bill in Committee, I have received a letter from Professor Macnaughton, president of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. In it he sets out the views of the college:

"Firstly, we are at one with you in seeking to prohibit female circumcision of any kind being performed in this country. However, there are a variety of surgical operations that are necessary for the physical and mental health of women, which have nothing whatever to do with circumcisions performed for traditonal or cultural reasons. I wish to make it clear that the College would be opposed to any statutory limitations on these legitimate procedures."

The operations to which Professor Macnaughton refers can be divided into two categories—those dealing with physical health, of which cancer is an example, and those dealing with mental health.

The Bill does not seek to interfere with a patient's right to receive legitimate or ethical surgery, and therefore clause 2 excludes such operations from the scope of the Bill.

There has been some discussion of the nature of exclusions for reasons of mental health. In a very small number of cases surgery is required for reasons other than physical illness. Obviously these fall into a category which is a form of cosmetic surgery, often resulting from the distress caused by a perception of abnormality.

The problem in a previous incarnation of the Bill proved insurmountable, as the word "abnormality" was used without real regard to its definition. In practice it must be right to leave that to the judgment of the individual doctor. This consideration is essential.

There is no doubt that if a woman was deluded or imagined that there was something wrong with her, it would be good professional practice not to offer surgery but to persuade her to accept psychiatric treatment. This is a view that could adopted with all forms of cosmetic surgery, but is surely best left to the professional judgment of a doctor. Such cosmetic surgery is a long way, both qualitatively and quantitatively, from female circumcision.

The purpose of the Bill is to prevent the custom of female circumcision, not legitimate, ethical and surgical procedures. The exclusion therefore of reasons of mental health needed careful drafting. There was no point in passing a Bill that created an offence if, in a later clause, it was so poorly drafted that it allowed unlimited exemptions. Accordingly, it is worth examining precisely the offence and the practice that we find so abhorrent.

The Bill seeks to prevent the ritual mutilation of the female genitalis, hence the deliberate inclusion of the words "custom or ritual" in clause 2. We cannot create an offence and then say that the act constituting that offence is exempt from the Bill. Such legislation would be nonsense. The provisions for exemptions for reasons of mental health must ensure that reasons of custom or ritual are not justified.

We cannot allow female circumcision to occur on the ground that a woman's health would suffer if she did not conform with the prevailing custom of her community. Such an argument knows no bounds—we would have allowed suttee in this country a century ago. Would we allow it now were it still the prevailing custom in India?

The Bill has its roots in the protection of children. It stands four square behind the United Nations declaration on the rights of children of 1959, which asserts that children should have the possibility to develop physically in a healthy and normal way in conditions of liberty and dignity.

The Bill seeks to prevent an appalling practice which leads to no physical benefits and is associated with a number of health hazards, including haemorrhage, pain, shock, infection, septicaemia and long-term obstetrical problems.

We in Britain are not alone in our desire to act. Other European countries, including Sweden, have banned the practice. In Kenya, it is illegal, as are all but the simplest procedures in the Sudan.

There is no doubt that at the same time as legislation there must be a process of health education among those people who still perform the acts. I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister, who confirmed in Committee that his Department would consider sympathetically any applications for grants for that purpose, but we cannot allow that consideration to prevent the Bill from becoming law. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on her luck in the ballot and on bringing forward this important Bill. May I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being able to remain until the end of the proceedings.

I want to give the Bill my support because it concerns an issue that came across my desk when I was in the Department. It is one that I viewed with the greatest sympathy, but there were then, as my hon. Friend said, many difficulties. The medical profession was not perhaps as helpful as it has now turned out to be. The Department tried to get the matter working, but it was not possible. I am delighted that, clearly with the aid of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health, that has now been possible.

I congratulate my hon. Friend, and I hope that the Bill will rapidly become law.

2.3 pm

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): I also congratulate the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on her Bill, of which I am a sponsor. She has done a good service by introducing it. I hope that today we shall see the completion of its stages in this House. As she said, the subject has had a somewhat chequered legislative career. In many respects, we all understand the problems which gave rise to the complexities of legislating on this difficult subject

There is no doubt that there is enormous abhorrence of and anxiety about the practice. At the same time, as hon. Members will know, some black women feel that clause 2(2) could be considered to have racial overtones as it forbids the use of mental stress as a reason for those who wish to have female circumcision for ritual or custom as against those who use mental stress as a reason because of difficulties with deformed or enlarged genitalia. I hope that we have been able to convince them that there is no such intention behind the Bill.

It must be put on record that even now the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists is not, as far as I am aware, 100 per cent. satisfied with the formulation of the Bill. Indeed, it gave me a revised amendment which I tabled unsuccessfully in Committee. The Commission for Racial Equality also has some reservations about this portion of the Bill. However, I have been unable to find any other way of changing it. Perhaps the noble Lords will have a look at it.

I underline the hon. Lady's hope that the Minister of Health will confirm what his colleague the Under-Secretary of State said in Committee two weeks ago. He said that he recognised that black women face very serious pressures in all sorts of ways because of the practice in their own community, and that they needed health counselling and health education. He undertook to look at that aspect with sympathy.

It was only by chance that before coming into the Chamber this morning I saw a letter to me from the director of the Foundation for Women's Health research and development—the organisation called FORWARD. It is a very reputable organisation with distinguished sponsors, including Dame Josephine Barnes, Lord Kennet and Baroness Lockwood. The director, Mrs. Stella Efua Graham — who, in her correspondence with me, has welcomed the Bill—sent me a copy of the letter that she sent to the Under-Secretary of State on 18 April picking up the point that he made in Committee, when he said that he would look sympathetically at accepting "applications from any organisations for funding to cover such activities."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 3 April 1985; c. 16.]

She points out that, in the name of FORWARD she asked for support from the DHSS in late 1983, but received no response.

Mrs. Graham is putting forward — as she has in the letter — three projects which could very well receive funding and support from the Department. It would help in terms of health education and health counselling, and would be seen by those who may be worried about the matter as a sensible way of having a public health programme alongside the legislation that we are discussing today.

Although I am not trying to bounce the Minister into an answer on the project, I hope that, when he has an opportunity, he will discuss the application with his hon. Friend. It would go a great way towards reassuring people who would genuinely like to outlaw the practice altogether but who see the difficulties of women, of their mothers and of their prospective husbands in dealing with a problem which has been so much a part of their culture and practice.

I reiterate my congratulations to the hon. Lady and hope that, when the legislation becomes law, the Department will deal with it in the most sensitive possible way and not in a nasty, draconian way, because the Bill will cause some problems and one would not want legislation to drive the practice underground in a way that none of us would welcome.

2.9 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I happily join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) on the way in which she has so skilfully steered the Bill through the House to its present stage. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), who was a colleague of mine in the Department until recently, that it proved an intractable and difficult problem when it came to drafting legislation. My hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne has come close to leading us to a solution.

I am sure that the Bill will be welcomed by the public because publicity about those operations has aroused general indignation. Although we believe that female circumcision has been carried out in only a handful of cases in this country, it does not mean that there are not compelling reasons for legislation to make sure that there are no more such operations here. The mutilation and impairment of young girls and women have no part in our way of life. I am glad to know that that view is shared by representatives of the ethnic minorities who live here. That is why the Government warmly welcome the Bill, and have, indeed, welcomed it throughout its passage.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne that it is arguable that the procedures known as female circumcision are already against the criminal law in this country, but that is by no means certain. We have not had a case to provide a precedent. I am sure that the House would prefer that we had definite legislation making it clear in statute that it is contrary to criminal law.

The problem that arose in the early stages of the Bill was to make sure that one discriminated between female circumcision and other legitimate surgery, because in straight anatomical terms there is little difference between the operation known as circumcision, or some forms of it, and other desirable medical practices. The present drafting of the Bill, as a result of work in Committee, meets that aim and will proscribe the activities that we wish to proscribe without damaging the decision of those who wish to carry out legitimate surgery on their patients.

The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) mentioned the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. A copy of the latest letter sent by the president to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne has been given to me. It may not have reached the hon. Member for Barking yet. My hon. Friend quoted a passage from Professor Macnaughton's letter. He concludes by saying:

"The College will be happy to comment on any amendments that are suggested and I can confirm that the College would approve of your Bill as amended by the Standing Committee."

That may mean that the college is now satisfied that any possible problems have been sorted out. While I am sure that their Lordships will wish to look at the Bill, I hope that they do not embark on amateur draftsmanship of their own and get the Bill back into complications that might run the risk of frustrating its purpose.

Like all those who have spoken so far, particularly the two hon. Ladies, I share their view that there is no question of racism in the Bill or anything of that sort. I am satisfied that it is necessary to make the references to custom and ritual for the reasons explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne. All the sponsors of the Bill and all those associated with it are plainly not only not guilty of any racialist views, but many of them, including the hon. Member for Barking, play a prominent part in combating racism and trying to make sure that no elements of racial segregation find their way into our law. It is the need for careful drafting that caused those references, and there is no need for people to be suspicious of them.

I agree that the Bill should be seen only as a necessary part of a wider health education campaign to eradicate that practice in this country and abroad. We do not underestimate the importance of education and counselling among the communities in which female circumcision has been a custom for millennia. Groups are now at work among those communities providing just such counselling and information services. We share their aims and commend the work that they do.

The hon. Member for Barking is ahead of me in reading copies of correspondence addressed to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. He made a helpful offer in Committee that we would look at any applications for grants. We shall do so as quickly and sympathetically as possible.

I conclude by renewing my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne on her success in having brought the Bill this far. I commend the Bill to the House, and hope that its passage through another place will be equally successful.

Hill Farming Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

2.17 pm

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is a simple Bill. It is a Bill to save the bilberry. Farmers in upland areas need to be able to burn heather and grass so that their livestock are able to benefit from fresh heather and grass. That procedure creates difficulties for wildlife in the upland areas, and it has therefore been necessary, since the passage of the Hill Farming Act 1946, to regulate the burning of heather and grass. It has been found that in practice other species may be damaged by the burning, especially bracken, vaccinium and gorse, and it has therefore been thought necessary to introduce a Bill to enable the Minister to control the burning of those species. The Bill is widely welcomed by those concerned, and I hope that hon. Members will give it their support.

2.18 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) and thank him for introducing the Bill. As he said, the Bill will extend the powers available to Ministers to make regulations controlling moorland burning, which is very important for agricultural management.

The Bill will bring three new plant species—gorse, bracken and vaccinium, or the bilberry—into the same category as heather and grass. The need to make this change was another profit of the discussions held by the heather and grass burning working party, which observed that the burning of moorland vegetation affects adventitiously a number of other plant species which grow in close association with heather and grass. Chief among these are gorse, bracken and vaccinium.

In addition, some farmers choose deliberately to burn certain of these species either to control or to eradicate them. As the potential risks and consequences of the burning of these species are similar to those of the burning of heather and grass, the working party argued that a loophole in the present controls needed to be closed. I am persuaded by this argument and am delighted that the Bill gives us the opportunity to bring about the necessary changes. It therefore has the support of the Government.

Any system of control is meaningless unless it is backed by some sort of penalty. The Hill Farming Act already includes a fine of up to £400 for a breach of the present regulations, and my officials in the regions are under instruction to follow up reports of illegal burning. Last year there were only two such reports. We have also written recently to chief constables asking for their co-operation, by making sure that police officers in rural areas are aware of the legal requirements. We therefore have a mechanism for enforcement which, I am pleased to say, has rarely to be applied to the full, but which provides an appropriate back-up to our main aim, which is to encourage sensible burning through sound advice. This year, as in previous ones, our publicity campaign will include radio announcements and press notices, issued at regular intervals throughout the year and designed to achieve this end.

It is perhaps premature to talk of the type of controls that we might apply once the Bill becomes law, but we would want to use these new enabling powers as soon as the necessary subordinate legislation can be drawn up. I see here a further opportunity for consultation with the working party, since subtle differences might exist in the growing charactristics of the three new species and in how they are best dealt with. I believe that it will also be important to extend the heather and grass burning code which the working party has produced and which is widely circulated, so that suitably fuller advice on moorland burning is available. However, I do not regard these as protracted matters and I hope that subordinate legislation might be laid before the House fairly quickly once the Bill becomes law.

I am delighted to be able to commend this Bill to the House, because, although it is short and simple, it marks yet another important step towards achieving a balance between the needs of conservation and the needs of agriculture, which the Government have already done much to further.

Question put and agreed to

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Agricultural Training Board Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

2.22 pm

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This is a modest Bill which I hope will enable the Agricultural Training Board to offer its unique training expertise overseas to the benefit of the United Kingdom.

As many hon. Members know, the Agricultural Training Board, which was established in 1966, provides training for the commercial agriculture and horticulture industries in Great Britain. Many of the board's activities centre on short craft skills courses for agricultural workers. It has great expertise in the development of those courses and the training of instructors. It also undertakes management training and organises farming apprenticeships and other youth training. Its skills are highly regarded by the farming industry in the United Kingdom.

The board has powers under section 5 of the Agricultural Training Board Act 1982 to teach workers from overseas the methods of agriculture in the United Kingdom, but those powers do not enable the board to carry its expertise overseas. Its ability to do so would be especially useful in the involvement in major export contracts in the agricultural sector such as the installation of irrigation schemes and the setting up of other agricultural businesses, such as complete dairy units, in areas like the middle east. The training of local staff to run such new systems is a vital part of the total export package, and the participation of the board could improve the United Kingdom's chances of gaining contracts and materially helping employment in the United Kingdom.

I hope that the board will be able to operate profitably overseas and that its involvement in such work will be of great benefit to the United Kingdom. There are safeguards to that effect in the Bill. I hope also that the board will be able to use its commercial expertise and to maximise its revenue so that any profits that are generated can be used for the material benefit of training in the United Kingdom.

The Bill also has the subsidiary purpose of strengthening Ministers' formal rights of access to the board's books and records. There is already an agreement that such access will be given, but this power will bring the Agricultural Training Board into line with the current guidelines for public bodies.

The Agricultural Training Board is outstandingly effective in promoting training techniques in agriculture. I hope that this modest measure will enable the board to help to promote British agricultural expertise and business worldwide. I commend the Bill to the House.

2.25 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): It is most gratifying that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) has been able to progress this useful Bill so fast. I congratulate him on introducing it and on the speed with which he has got it through the various stages so far.

As the House knows, the Agricultural Training Board was established in 1966 under the Industrial Training Act 1964, together with many other training boards in other industries. Subsequently, the board was transferred to the responsibility of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and its powers were consolidated in the Agricultural Training Board Act 1982.

The board provides a vital training role for the commercial agriculture and horticulture industries in Great Britain. It is largely funded by a grant in aid from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, amounting to more than £7 million in 1984-85. The development of short craft skills courses and the training of instructors is undertaken by the board, while the organisation of most individual training courses is carried out by a network of 600 farmers' training groups. The strength of this group activity, and the board's expertise in organising them, is of particular interest to developing overseas countries, as the hon. Gentleman has emphasised. In addition, the board undertakes management training and organises farm apprenticeships and other youth training. The board's skills are highly regarded by the farming industry.

In 1982, the then board chairman suggested that the board's training expertise could with advantage be made available overseas. Ministers agreed in principle on the understanding that such activities would be undertaken by the Agricultural Training Board in collaboration with the private training sector and that this would not lead to any dilution of domestic training effort. That is most important. As the hon. Gentleman has pointed out, clause 1(2) of the Bill imposes on the board a requirement to act commercially in the exercise of its overseas functions so that at an early date it can show that expenditure on overseas work can be met from revenues received. That is a most important provision, as we do not wish the United Kingdom agriculture industry to suffer any diversion of funds from its training in order to meet the needs of others, however deserving, outside the United Kingdom. The board has had substantive discussions with private sector consultants through the British Consultants Bureau on this basis, and I understand that a good understanding has been reached.

The 1982 Act does not, however, enable the board to engage fully in overseas activities. The hon. Gentleman's Bill would therefore empower the board to undertake work which Ministers have agreed is desirable. It would remove the restraint on providing training for employment overseas to permit the board to provide training courses and teaching and advisory personnel as well as advice and to charge for those services. Through the requirement to keep separate accounts under clause 1(3), the Bill also provides an assurance for agriculture that there is to be no diversion of funds from the United Kingdom to overseas activities.

Although the board has not yet been authorised to do work overseas, there is considerable evidence that there would be a demand for its services. It has received requests for consultancy and training advice and activities, and there is a steady flow of orders for its publications.

I was also pleased to see that the opportunity had been taken in the Bill to incorporate a further amendment to the Agricultural Training Board Act 1982 to give the Government a formal right of access to the board's books and records. As has already been said, there is already an agreement between Ministers and the board, and it is reaffirmed every year when grant in aid is given that such access should be given.

The Bill is welcome. The ATB has great expertise in the sector within which it operates. As a public sector body, it must first provide a high service and value for money for its customers in the United Kingdom. It is most important that the public and private sectors collaborate in a positive fashion to promote our interests abroad. Agricultural expertise in this country is second to none and many areas of the world would benefit from it.

I highly commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

SOLICITORS (INDEPENDENT COMPLAINTS PROCEDURE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 23rd April, proeedings on the business selected in pursuance of paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 6 (Arrangment of public business) shall, if not previously concluded, lapse at Seven o'clock and shall be counted as a half day as provided by that Order.—[Mr. Nubert.]

Soccer Violence

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

2.34 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I shall declare my interest in this matter while the shed end is vacating the Chamber. I have been a regular football supporter for about 30 years. The first full season that I spent watching Chelsea was the 1954-55 championship year. Under the inspired chairmanship of Ken Bates, I look forward to a repeat performance of that division one championship in the near future. As I have since moved myself to Newham, I go to watch West Ham as well as Chelsea. I am the vice-president of Clapton football club in my constituency, which is one of the oldest and most distinguished amateur football clubs in the country.

The subject of British soccer generally is of sufficient interest to merit a full parliamentary debate. When the Government produce their report, I hope that we shall get just such an opportunity.

Crowd trouble inside and outside football grounds is not a recent development and is not confined to Britain. The problem should not be overdramatised by politicians and the media. However, more people have become aware of the problem and it has increased in seriousness. The Prime Minister is far from being the first politician to express concern. The right hon. Lady's instant-response approach could create almost as many problems as it solves. If the Prime Minister had not seen the hooliganism at the Luton-Millwall match on television, I doubt whether we would have had so many Ministers running around trying to find immediate solutions to deep-seated and complex problems.

I hope that the Minister has studied the report of Norman Chester's committee, which was produced in 1968, the White Paper on sport and recreation, which was produced by the previous Labour Government, the 1976 report of the working group on football crowd behaviour, a committee chaired by the late and much-lamented Frank McElhone, and the 1984 report on football violence from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. If the Minister can find the time to add to that reading list, he might like to read my own paper on the subject, which was written when I was chairman of the GLC's general purposes committee in 1975. This is a way of showing that the problem of crowd violence at football grounds has been analysed to death over the past 15 to 20 years. Unfortunately, successive Governments, the football authorities and the clubs have failed comprehensively to deal with it properly. There have been too many knee-jerk reactions and far too little real action.

I do not believe that there is any one identifiable cause for football violence. Different outbreaks occur for differing reasons. Local solutions based on local knowledge but with Government support are far more likely to be successful.

The problem should be confronted at two distinct levels. The long-term approach should be aimed at dealing with the decades of neglect within the sport itself. The short-term approach should be designed to contain the immediate menace of increasing crowd violence that is created by a small and unrepresentative element. There is disturbing evidence coming to light which shows that the most serious violence in football is being efficiently organised.

It is only comparatively recently that professional football has become aware that it is in competition with other forms of mass entertainment and, in comparison, is losing out pretty badly. Those who go regularly to football matches know that terraces open to the weather, insufficient seating and primitive refreshment and sanitary arrangements remain the rule rather than the exception. Any serious supporter knows just how appalling conditions remain in most of the 92 league clubs.

Since 1979 the Prime Minister has been to just two matches, and they were both cup finals. She was lucky to get the tickets. Perhaps she will tell me her source. I do not know how many league clubs the Minister has been to, but it is important that politicians who will be making decisions and recommendations should base those on some element of personal experience.

Virtually all football league clubs need to be modernised. That is best done through partnership arrangements between clubs, local authorities and Government agencies, together providing the large-scale funds that are needed to establish sports and social complexes based on the individual grounds.

Local authorities already give grants to a wide range of cultural bodies. I can speak as a past chairman of the arts and recreation committee of the GLC. I have never been able to see any rational argument for excluding footboll clubs, which represent a major working-class cultural activity, from receiving local authority grants. When I argued that particular case in 1975, it was caricatured as soccer on the rates. We have opera, theatre, ballet and recreation on the rates, so why not professional football?

Much could be achieved in terms of general ground improvements and the more intensive use by commuities of football grounds, but it requires imagination as well as resources. None of that is original, because closer working between local authorities and football clubs is already well under way. In Manchester, both Manchester city football club and the city of Manchester recreation department have been involved in the past five years in a football and community programme. It is probably the most highly developed scheme in the country and shows the positive benefits of a long-term relationship between football clubs and local authorities. In that particular scheme, I understand that something in excess of 100,000 people have taken part, 70 per cent. of the courses and competitions that are organised are aimed at the 8 to 18 age group and 85 per cent. of the people taking part have come from the local communities.

In London the GLC has been pushing ahead, as one would expect from a well-run Socialist and progressive authority. In the past two years we have developed several major initiatives with football league clubs. The provision of the all-weather pitch at Fulham was in exchange for the club guaranteeing a minimum of 500 hours of community use of the pitch for six years. A programme of community use is already well developed and it is used by school children, the unemployed, and people with disabilities, and there is a highly imaginative programme involving a senior citizens' club. In a short time that club has become an important resource for the local community instead of a woefully under-used facility.

A recent scheme announced by the GLC involves close co-operation with Arsenal football club, using the club's indoor training facilities for the benefit of the local community. Such things can be done and the Government should encourage local authorities to work on those partnership arrangements with clubs. Their grounds represent an under-utilised asset within our communities where such assets are badly needed.

Public funds should not be used to reinforce private gain. Therefore, I would look for radical changes in the way in which clubs are presently owned and organised. If football clubs were owned and run by a more representative section of supporters, the problem of crowd trouble would disappear in the long run. Football should look to the way in which cricket and rugby union organise themselves. That is the way that professional football should go. It is only in football that directors can act like 19th century mill owners. Regrettably, it is the worst elements of Victorian attitudes that survive in the way that our premier national sport is run.

Those are some of the long-term problems. Let me now deal briefly with the immediate problems we face. No one can doubt that soccer crowd violence is on the increase. The bad publicity that the sport gets is clearly affecting the gates and therefore the economic ability of the game to deal with its problems. It is a reinforcing cycle. The violence is partly a reflection of our increasingly violent society. Therefore, it is nonsense to single out football violence.

I shall make some brief suggestions because I wish to give the Minister plenty of time to reply. As it is a short debate I shall make out a list and if the Minister cannot respond to them all when he replies, perhaps he will respond to me in the usual way, as he has done in the past.

First, all football league matches should be played on Sunday mornings. That would undoubtedly upset some people, but it would do much to eliminate the problems of alcohol inside the grounds. Secondly, ground, should be all seating, covered and divided into small secure sections with closed circuit television. I know that it is easy to say that, but such ground improvements and security measures would cost the game millions. If the Government are not prepared to provide the cash, they should make low or no-interest loans available to professional football clubs through a national funding agency.

Thirdly, if, as I hope, we move towards the concept of football clubs organised as social clubs, admission by club membership card would be compulsory without any erosion of civil rights, which straightforward identification cards at present represent. I read today in The Standard that the chairman of Luton football club is pushing such an idea.

Fourthly, where clubs have singularly failed to minimise the dangers, they should be penalised in a much more draconian fashion. League points should be deducted. Clubs should face compulsory relegation or even expulsion from the league if they persistently fail to deal with problems when help is being offered to them to deal with such problems.

Fifthly, I should like to see courts giving more custodial sentences and community work orders on match days for offenders. The sort of thing that gets right up the nose of the average football supporter is having to weed someone's garden when an FA cup match is being played.

Sixthly, increased policing inside the ground should not be a charge on the clubs. Many people are not aware that in London clubs must pay the Metropolitan police for their presence inside the ground. That should not be the case. The charge should fall on the public purse. Clubs could encourage many more of their supporters to act as voluntary stewards as a form of self-policing.

Seventhly, in London the Commissioner should set up on a trial basis football community policing teams. These would be specialised police teams which would travel regularly to away games to brief the local police force and attend the game with their supporters. If the Commissioner ever gets the scheme off the ground, he may wish to enrol me as a special constable, it seems to be a good job. That would assist the police greatly in maintaining effective policing inside the grounds. Those police teams would soon get to know the regular fans and, therefore, could identify those who were attending only to cause trouble.

In conclusion, if the Government genuinely wish to eliminate soccer violence and to help restore the image of this important international sport, they must show political will and financial commitment. The Government take a lot of revenue from the game. Pools promoters, television, and Fleet street all make big money from football. As a football supporter, I believe that the clubs have a right to expect much more of the wealth that their sport creates to come back into the game for the benefit of the much-abused and vilified football supporter.

2.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I am grateful for the constructive way in which the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has approached this important subject. I am at one with him on many of the points that he raised. I only hope that, when Hansard is published, he will circularise his speech to as many of those who are responsible for running our great national games as possible. His comments were extremely helpful in the overall context of this national problem.

I confirm that I have read all the documents which the hon. Gentleman enumerated at the beginning of his speech. However, I am oblivious of his report, which I shall certainly read if he would kindly send my office a copy. I shall sit down and study it. There is much to be read on this important topic.

I can also confirm that since I started watching football in the early 1950s—as an Essex dweller, I began at Leyton Orient—I have visited about four fifths of all first and second division football grounds at some stage or another during the past 30 years.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, disorder at football matches is by no means a new or recent phenomenon. The problem has been with us for many decades and it affects many countries. It is interesting to note, for example, that Millwall's ground was first closed as a disciplinary measure in 1934, and suffered the same fate in 1947, 1950 and 1978. If he were here, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) would acknowledge that the problem was prevalent during his two terms as Minister with responsibility for sport. He will remember some of the more serious incidents that took place during that period. In 1975, in Paris, when Leeds was playing Bayern, and in 1977, when St. Etienne was playing Manchester United, thousands of pounds worth of damage was caused inside and outside the grounds, and many people required hospital treatment. Again in 1977, England fans in Luxembourg caused £15,000 worth of damage to the stadium and went on a rampage through the city. All this, unhappily, is familiar reading for us.

In their book, "Hooligans Abroad", the Leicester university researchers gave some vivid examples of crowd disorders abroad not involving British fans in support of the argument that football hooliganism is not purely a British disease. In Lima, in 1964, when, in a match between Peru and Argentina, the referee refused to allow a goal to the home side, a riot followed in which 318 people were killed and more than 500 were injured. In Turkey, in 1974, fans of two club sides fought with pistols, knives and broken bottles for days after the end of a match between the two teams. Before troops restored order, cars were burnt out, 600 spectators were injured and 44 were killed. We have seen more recent examples in South America. In Argentina, the national association had to implement a nine-day ban on prfessional football.

Of course, that the problem is not new does not mean that there is an excuse for inaction. It is worth highlighting what the Government have done so far. On law and order, we have strengthened the powers of magistrates through the Criminal Justice Act 1982. The courts can now require parents and guardians to pay fines, costs and compensation for offences committed by young persons and children. The Act has also given the courts greater flexibility in the sentencing of young offenders, providing a new sentence of youth custody and doing away with the limitations on custodial sentences on young offenders. The power to impose community service orders was amended to bring offenders aged 16 or over within the scope of the scheme. We have introduced new custodial measures to deal with young offenders convicted of violent crimes, and doubled the maximum fines available to magistrates. We have also considerably increased the number of attendance centres.

I established a liaison group involving all the concerned agencies and authorities, and four Government Departments, to prepare for the three home countries' participation in the World Cup finals in Spain in 1982. As we were successful in eliminating incidents of hooliganism through close co-operation in all the regions of Spain, I extended the remit of the liaison group, led by the Football Association chairman, to co-ordinate policy and precautions for domestic and international matches. Officials from my Department serve on that liaison group, as do officials from the Home Office, the Department of Transport and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

We have ensured that embassies and consulates support the Football Association and clubs in planning matches abroad. Consular staff attend meetings with the Football Association's liaison officer, together with stadium authorities, clubs' staff and the local authorities to ensure, so far as possible, that the necessary security precautions are taken. We have, through the Football League, focused league clubs' attention on the need to take precautions, highlighting the segregation of opposing supporters and the importance of pre-match planning, especially if the clubs are known to have problems.

We have agreed with the liaison group a "blueprint" listing the precautions which should be taken for domestic matches. This was circulated to league clubs last August in time for the new season. It revised existing recommendations, and for the first time ensured that recommendations on segregation and the movement of crowds became mandatory under the Football Association's guidelines.

Following serious incidents of violence towards the end of the 1983-84 season, the Government established a working group of officials from the Departments concerned to review what further options were available to tackle the problem. The group's report was published last August as a consultation document. With ministerial colleagues and the Football Association I have since met 17 representative organisations to discuss the report and its recommendations. The organisations, together with many other bodies and individuals, have also submitted a mass of written evidence for our consideration. The report and the consultation on it formed the basis for our most recent considerations following the serious violence at Luton and Chelsea.

Although the recent violence has focused our attention on the domestic scene, the aspect of the problem which has perhaps troubled me most since my appointment in 1981 is the effect that violence by English supporters abroad has on the good name of this country. Clearly there is more than just national pride at stake. The hon. Gentleman touched upon this. There are more tangible economic casualties both in loss of exports and contracts for British companies to carry out work abroad, and particularly if any club is banned or invited to play behind closed doors by the governing body of European football, in which case there could be serious economic loss to the club.

To help tackle this problem, the Government, through the Council of Europe, promoted the recommendation on the reduction of football violence. In my visits to many European footballing capitals and my discussions with Ministers over the past two years I have found that all accept that this is not purely an English problem.

The recommendation calls for joint action among European countries and sets out the precautions, based on the European Football Association's ground rules, to be taken by the clubs and the authorities.

I first called for the recommendation at the informal working party of sports Ministers in Paris in January 1983, following which a working group chaired by one of my officials was set up to draft these recommendations. I also attended the informal working party of sports Ministers meeting in Rotterdam later in 1983 at which the recommendation was discussed fully and agreed. The recommendation was adopted formally by the Committee of Foreign Ministers in March 1984.

The Government have since taken the lead in the implementation of the agreement. At their fourth conference, held in Malta in May 1984, the European Ministers responsible for sport passed a resolution which I proposed in which they undertook to do all in their power to ensure the full implementation of the recommendation and to draw it to the attention of their respective national football authorities and the European Football Association.

I have also written to my ministerial colleagues abroad in advance of matches involving English clubs pointing out the potential dangers and drawing their attention to the recommendation. On the whole, efforts since have met with co-operation and constructive responses. We shall continue to take the lead on the international front in efforts to build on what has been achieved so far.

I have mentioned briefly the most recent developments following the serious violence at Luton and Chelsea. I was present on 1 April when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, together with other colleagues, met representatives from both the Football Association and the Football League to discuss soccer spectator violence. I have already informed the House that it became clear from that meeting that the football authorities shared the Government's commitment vigorously to combat violence at football matches.

They agreed to re-examine urgently the Football Association rules governing discipline and the responsibility of clubs with a view to changing and strengthening them. They agreed to accelerate the introduction of closed circuit television, especially at grounds where problem matches are played. They agreed to ensure that perimeter fencing was in place and effective in those grounds. They agreed to investigate a practical scheme of membership cards for Football League, Football Association and European and international matches, in discussion with the European Football Association as necessary, reporting back to me within six weeks. They agreed to consider the introduction of more restrictions on the issue of tickets for problem matches—which should be ticket only. Should there be more flexibility, such as Sunday morning kick-offs? I am convinced that such arrangements should be considered by all those clubs. They also agreed to encourage more and better family enclosures at League grounds. They agreed to deal severely with any bad example set to supporters by players' behaviour on the pitch. They agreed, in advance of the Government's proposed legislation, to take action under existing powers to deal with the problem of alcohol at matches.

The Government will give the strongest possible support to the football authorities, and we are prepared to take action in many ways. It is clear that the Football Association and the Football League are the governing bodies of football in this country. They have to run their own sport, as all sports are run through the 140 governing bodies which we support in one way or another. They are responsible for generating their rules and for setting standards of behaviour both on the pitch and elsewhere. They must put their house in order, but we shall do all we can to help. We shall ensure that we take action in the following ways. Legislation will be introduced in England and Wales to control the sale of alcohol at grounds and on transport to grounds along the lines that have been successful in Scotland. I pay tribute to the report of the late Frank McElhone in 1976 which has become the guiding light for legislation in Scotland and for us.

Under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975 designation will be extended to clubs in divisions three and four of the Football League. Initially, it will be to grounds with a record of crowd violence. The guidelines and the green code will be reviewed.

The public order White Paper based on our conclusions following the review is to be published shortly, and our proposals for legislation in the autumn. Some new proposals will assist in preventing and controlling football hooliganism.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will be discussing with the police what improvement can be made to their effectiveness in dealing with football violence—in particular, in obtaining evidence to bring more serious charges where appropriate.

My right hon. and learned Friend is encouraging magistrates to make full use of their powers, including detention and attendance centre sentences. I endorse what the hon. Gentleman said about the importance of young people, who have nothing to do with watching and enjoying football—our national sport—but who seek to disrupt games. I am convinced that it would be an effective deterrent if they were certain that they would be put away on a Saturday afternoon at an attendance centre when a match was on. Many other people would perceive it to be an effective deterrent.

We shall do all that we can to ensure that everyone understands the full range of legal sentencing available. We shall encourage bail conditions forbidding attendance at matches and we are drawing attention to the Court of Appeal guidelines on sentencing violent offenders.

Mr. Banks: Is the Minister prepared to recommend to his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary some examination of the idea of specialised police teams to deal with the problem of soccer violence?

Mr. Macfarlane: I shall draw that important point to my right hon. and learned Friend's attention. It is something that he would have to consider, but it may well have a part to play.

I have not heard from the Opposition parties on our spectator violence report despite my suggestion that they might make comments and observations. I told the House some months ago that 17 organisations and authorities had provided evidence and opinions. I should welcome any contribution or commitment that the hon. Gentleman could give and I would convey it to my right hon. and learned Friend.

For matches abroad, we shall consult other Governments about giving better publicity to and perhaps strengthening last year's Council of Europe recommendation on football violence which I have already mentioned. We shall review how the diplomatic service can help in identifying troublemakers. We are considering arrangements for people convicted overseas to serve their sentences in this country. We shall seek to discourage travel agents from setting up special schemes for problem matches.

The hon. Gentleman made several points that I shall cover in correspondence with him. Our football clubs could become the focal point of many communities. They could develop and generate facilities. The Sports Council has helped in many cases. The urban aid programme and the derelict land grants scheme, in addition to normal local authority expenditure, have helped many football clubs to develop as the focal point for young people in the community.

When I consider the number of people who attended professional football matches in the 1950s compared with the present time, I believe that the time is long overdue for urgent action. The great weight of public opinion is behind everything that we do. We must approach the problem in many ways.

I pay tribute to the tremendous contribution made by the Football Trust, which is financed by the pools promoters and the spot-the-ball competition. It has provided the better part of £20 million for ground improvements, not just under the Safety of Sports Grounds Act 1975, but for all-weather pitches for youngsters, not just for the club members but for the people within the community. Football must now somehow compete with the ever-increasing demand of public attention and competition from alternative sports.

What we are seeking to do represents a substantial package of new measures from the Government to support the new tough line that the Football Association and Football League have agreed to take. We must take urgent action with a package of measures as we approach the close season.

Those people involved in professional football and those responsible for clubs must sit down and rigorously examine what they want to do to see how they can save our great national game domestically and internationally——

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Education Expenditure

1. Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales what the per capita expenditure on books, educational equipment and materials was in (a) South Glamorgan and (b) Wales for the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Mr. John Stradling Thomas): In 1983-84 South Glamorgan's expenditure per pupil on books, educational equipment and materials in primary and secondary schools was £26·10. The Wales figure was £28·20.

Mr. Terlezki: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving such a good reply. I hope that that expenditure will lessen the scaremongering by the Labour party in the House and in South Glamorgan. Is he aware that the Labour party says that we do not spend as much as we should on education? The record shows that we are spending as much as we can on it in South Glamorgan.

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. So much for the parrot cry of "cuts". Although education resources have been held level in Wales, the number of pupils in schools has declined markedly—by more than 12 per cent. between 1977 and 1984. That is not consistent with allegations about cuts.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why have the Government £8 per head less to spend per secondary school child in Mid-Glamorgan, which is already bearing the brunt of Government cuts in other respects, than they have to spend per child in England? Does that mean that children in Mid-Glamorgan must get on their bikes and go to England to receive a decent education?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: No, not at all. In fact, the figures for Mid-Glamorgan are much better than the hon. Lady implied.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my hon. Friend aware—I have informed his Department of this — that I have received a number of letters from the parents of pupils after letters had gone out from schools alleging that the shortages of books and other materials have been due to fairly recently imposed financial constraints? Does not my hon. Friend's answer suggest either that this is nonsense or that, at best, the shortages must be due to maladministration by or maldistribution among schools?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It is up to the education authorities to determine how much to spend on school books and equipment as part of their day-to-day running of the education service. There is no doubt that it is difficult to manage these resources, but that is not an argument in favour of cuts. There have not been cuts. In fact, there has been an increase in expenditure on education.

Llanwern Steelworks

2. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had any recent discussions with the chairman of the British Steel Corporation concerning future investment at Llanwern steelworks.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I met the chairman most recently in February for a wide-ranging discussion.

Mr. Hughes: Will the Secretary of State confirm that no concast project has been authorised for the 1985-86 financial year? Is this not a poor reward for the record breaking performance at Llanwern in recent years? Bearing in mind all the delays that have occurred, will the right hon. Gentleman seek an urgent meeting with the corporation's chairman to ensure that this project is given the go-ahead without delay and that resources are provided for it?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman implied that the steel corporation had decided not to go ahead with concast during that financial year. The chairman has made it clear to me that he is very much aware of the importance of concast. We discussed the thorough consideration which the British Steel Corporation is giving to the way in which future investment will take place. Decisions on the corporate plan for that financial year have not been taken.

Mr. Grist: Will my right hon. Friend hazard a guess as to how much of the investment in Llanwern has been endangered, or at the very least delayed, by the recent miners' strike?

Mr. Edwards: The BSC chairman recently estimated the cost of the strike for the BSC in 1984-85 to be £175 million. It is too early to judge the final figure, but that money could have been used to reduce losses, to reach profitability sooner and to provide the sort of investment which the Labour party has just urged on us. Of course, throughout that strike the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) encouraged the miners.

NHS Facilities (Gwynedd)

3. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the provision of National Health Service facilities in Gwynedd.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): Health services in Gwynedd have been much enhanced by the opening last year of Ysbyty Gwynedd. Substantial redevelopment started at Llandudno general hospital last week. A new subsidiary renal unit is being established and managed for the health authority by Travenol Laboratories. All these developments are being funded by the Welsh Office.

Gwynedd health authority's provisional revenue allocation for 1985-86 is £46·45 million. This represents growth of 4·7 per cent. over its 1984-85 allocation and includes the balance of the revenue costs of Ysbyty Gwynedd. Additionally, £991,000 has been allocated to it from capital funds for its discretionary use.

Mr. Best: My hon. Friend will know of the great concern felt by the people of Gwynedd over two issues. I refer first to the ambulance service and to the need for proper provision, given the particular problems of Gwynedd, where there are many remote rural areas. Will my hon. Friend say something about the funding for that? There has been a very good initiative from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State over the renal dialysis unit, but does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a cruel deception if the people of Gwynedd, who want it so much and who rely so heavily upon having such a unit, found that it did not come to pass?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend asked about the ambulance service, and I assure him that the revenue resource allocation formula takes account of the district's topography. I understand that there is no case for a special allocation in respect of Gwynedd's ambulance service, but the matter is being considered by the resource allocations working group. It is looking at the effects of sparsity on the formula. There is no question but that the subsidiary renal dialysis unit will go ahead. A contract has been concluded between Travenol Laboratories and the health authority, and it is very much hoped that the unit will open this summer. Of course it will be very much to the benefit of NHS patients in Gwynedd.

Mr. Wigley: May I press the Minister further about the ambulance service? Is he aware that the pressures on it are very great and that some ambulances have done far more mileage than vehicles with such duties should do? Moreover, is he aware that the greater centralisation arising from the opening of Ysbyty Gwynedd puts greater pressure on the service? It is vital that there should be additional ambulance facilities. Will the Minister give that matter his urgent attention?

Mr. Roberts: I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but that is very much a matter for the resource allocations working group. That group comprises representatives of the Welsh Office and of every Welsh health authority. It is very much a matter for it.

Dr. Roger Thomas: Is the Minister satisfied with the cervical cytology recall system in Wales? When can we expect the system in that part of the world to be fully computerised?

Mr. Roberts: We are looking at the system as it operates in all the authorities in Wales. We have set up a special group, which is examining the matter. Whatever changes are required will be made. Of course, we look forward to computerisation.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

4. Mr. Hubbard-Miles asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the average pupil-teacher ratio in schools in Mid-Glamorgan for each year from 1978-79 to the latest available date.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: From 1978-79 to 1983-84, the average overall pupil-teacher ratios for Mid-Glamorgan schools year by year were 18·7: 1 in the first three years and, thereafter, 18·9, 18·3 and 17·5.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply, which shows that resources are being made available not only to maintain the standards of education in Mid-Glamorgan but to improve them. Is he aware that the district auditor's report showed that Mid-Glamorgan could save £2 million by reorganising its school meals service and its staffing in higher education?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: Yes, I am aware of the report. It pointed to ways in which savings could be made by education authorities. Only last week it was reported that a scrutiny of Mid-Glamorgan's school meals and further education services had revealed areas where significant savings could be found. I hope that the authority will act on the recommendations.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Is the Minister aware that it is absurd to harp on about the teacher-pupil ratio in Mid-Glamorgan when a recent Welsh Office report shows that many families there have difficulty in feeding and clothing their children so as to be able to send them to school in the first place? Is he also aware that they are further disadvantaged by poor housing and lack of public transport? What is being done about those basic issues?

Mr. Stradling Thomas: I welcome the improved education facilities. The report shows that standards are not dictated by financial resources alone. The inspector's findings suggest that a great deal depends on how the resources are managed. The rest of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question goes much wider than the main question.

Local Authorities (Expenditure)

5. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the final outturn of local authorities' current and capital spending in Wales for the financial year 1984-85; and how this compares with the Government's projections.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Final outturns for 1984-85 will not be available until early 1986. The latest estimates indicate that current spending in the year will exceed the Government's planning total by about £30 million. The provision for capital spending looks like being exceeded by between £10 million and £20 million.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State accept that those figures of £30 million and £10 million are relatively small in the context of local government expenditure in Wales and certainly would not have justified the draconian measures that were taken by the Government to curtail the powers of local authorities? Will he further accept that the major problem facing people in all parts of Wales is unemployment and that capital expenditure by local authorities offers a good tool to try to generate jobs? Will he go back to the Treasury to see whether further funds can be made available in terms of capital expenditure approvals for local authorities in Wales?

Mr. Edwards: I have on previous occasions pointed out that it is because of the relative constraint by local authorities in Wales on current spending that we have been able to obtain substantial additional capital provision for those authorities. That will continue to be the case, bearing in mind the relationship between the control of current spending and the amount of capital that we can make available.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the restriction to 50 per cent. of the capital receipts that local authorities may spend is causing a disproportionate amount of resentment? Will he make representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this restriction should be lifted as soon as the economic situation permits?

Mr. Edwards: We debated this question at considerable length in the House recently and I have nothing to add to what I said then, except, as I say, that there has been substantial additional capital provision in Wales, where the capital provision per head of the population is nearly double that in England. The accumulated resources, if they were all spent in a single year, would cause difficulties; they will be available for spending by local authorities over the next few years.

Mr. Rowlands: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen today's Western Mail, which contains a story about a secret report which his Department has on deprivation and need in the Rhymney Valley? Will he make that report, whatever it is, available at least to the authorities concerned? Will he then decide to spend the money necessary to meet the needs and deprivation of our communities?

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Gentleman should not believe everything that he reads in the Western Mail about secret reports. That report was commissioned by the Welsh Office and carried out by UWIST. Copies of it were provided to the local authority concerned and to the local authority associations. It was part of the work carried out by the Welsh Office to enable better decisions to be taken and for the future consideration of planning allocations to take proper account of these matters. As for the state of housing in the area, it is clear that much more has been spent by the present Government than was ever spent during the last period of the Labour Administration.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Bearing in mind that there are to be 1,000 redundancies at Courtaulds, over 800 redundancies at St. John's, Maesteg and 750 redundancies at British Petroleum, what additional resources have been made available to local authorities to enable them to cope with the heavy additional welfare problems with which they will be confronted?

Mr. Edwards: The total provision for local authorities has been announced. When considering urban allocations, the urban programme, urban development grant and other specific matters that arise from time to time we shall take particular note of closures of the kind referred to by the hon. Gentleman.

Dairy Farmers

6. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any further plans to help dairy producers in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The industry has already welcomed the measures announced on 28 March giving effect to a package of measures allowing greater flexibility in quota management. Over half—54 per cent.—of Welsh dairy producers will benefit from the measures taken to restore to base year 1983 levels quotas totalling less than 200,000 litres.

Mr. Howells: I am sure that the Secretary of State is well aware, although he will not admit it, that the outgoers scheme is a complete shambles and that the best thing his Government could do would be to scrap the scheme and start afresh. What advice can the Secretary of State give the dairy farmers of west Wales who are dependent upon the extra allocation of quota which is not now available to them?

Mr. Edwards: Far from being a complete shambles, the scheme will enable us to provide a quota for smaller producers at 1983 levels and also to deal with cases of hardship. It is because all the quota that we would like to include in the outgoers scheme is not included that on 15 April my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced that it would be reopened. Producers who did not apply in 1984, and those who did not accept the initial offer, will be able to apply. The scheme is to remain open until Friday 3 May 1985. I hope that it will provide additional quota. The more quota that we can obtain from the scheme, which has been continually criticised by the hon. Gentleman, who has alleged that in order to obtain this quota farms are having to be taken out of production, the better it will be for farmers. Some farms must be taken out of production in order to allocate quota to the many farmers who are in real difficulties.

Mr. Raffan: Will my right hon. Friend undertake to look into the particularly distressing case of Tom Stephenson of Sylvaen farm near Flint and get his Department to recognise that it was an implied term of the compensation agreement made with Mr. Stephenson that because of the effect of the Holywell bypass on his former farm his milk quota would be transferred to his new farm?

Mr. Edwards: As my hon. Friend knows, we have left these issues to be settled by the tribunal which has been established under the regulations. However, I shall look at the case that my hon. Friend has mentioned, especially as it apparently involves negotiations with my road department. We are considering very carefully whether further provision can be made to deal with those special hardship cases which do not fall within rules which have been applied so far by the tribunal.

Rate Capping (South Glamorgan)

7. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what penalties he has imposed upon South Glamorgan county council as a result of the rate increases in 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A local authority incurs rate support grant penalties, not because of rate increases, but only as a consequence of spending in excess of its expenditure target. South Glamorgan suffered a grant penalty of £234,532 in respect of the financial year 1981-82. It has incurred no penalty since.

Mr. Jones: The penalty in 1981-82 mentioned by my right hon. Friend is hardly surprising as, coincidentally, the rates for that year went up by 54 per cent. South Glamorgan county council's latest rate increase is the highest in south Wales. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the massive rate increases in South Glamorgan during the last four years have been a very significant factor in job losses?

Mr. Edwards: South Glamorgan's rate increases have varied from year to year. What my hon. Friend has said may be right, taken over a period. However, there have been individual years when the rate increase has been kept down. Nevertheless, it is unquestionably true that high rate increases make it more difficult for industry and business and deter job creation.

Job Creation

8. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new jobs have been created since 1979; and what are the job prospects for the next year (a) in Wales and (b) in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Comprehensive information on the number of jobs created is not available. Since May 1979 projects for which offers of selective financial assistance were accepted, or which were allocated Government-financed factories, promised to provide over 72,000 jobs; but that figure takes no account of the substantial number of new jobs not involving SFA not taking place in Government advance factories. The latest published figures show that between March and September 1984 there was an increase of 12,000 in the number of people in employment in Wales and between June 1983 and June 1984 there was an increase of about 24,000 in the number of self-employed in Wales. The recent announcements by BP and Courtaulds represent a very severe blow, but that has to be seen in the context of rising investment throughout Wales. In Clwyd alone SFA offers made since the beginning of 1983 promise over 4,800 new jobs and in Wrexham projects involving over 1,500 new jobs have been announced in the past year. Only last week I opened the latest in a string of new high technology companies which will provide an increasing number of new jobs in the Vale of Glamorgan.

Sir Raymond Gower: I thank my right hon. Friend for that information, but is he satisfied that the Vale of Glamorgan area is receiving a fair proportion of the grants which have gone into the Principality, particularly those from the EC, of which the Vale of Glamorgan area does not seem to have received a fair share?

Mr. Edwards: That really is not true. There is no doubt that the number of new companies coming into the Vale of Glamorgan area or sites immediately around it is considerable. There have been a large number of recent announcements and new openings. As I said, I opened one such factory only last week and I know a number of other cases which are under negotiation.

Dr. Marek: Is the Secretary of State aware that the total amount of dicell acetate yarn production in the United Kingdom is about 14,000 tonnes per annum and that the Courtauld plant at Wrexham produces approximately half of that? Is he further aware that if that plant closes the company proposes to increase production by 33 per cent. in its remaining factories in England? How much longer will the right hon. Gentleman allow the dismemberment of our industry and infrastructure in Wales? What will he do to try to help keep acetate yarn production in Wrexham?

Mr. Edwards: When the hon. Gentleman talks about dismembering industry in Wales, he must also take account of the 1,500 new jobs in Wrexham from projects announced within the past 12 months. The loss of the Courtauld plant in Wrexham is a sad blow, but a large number of new factories are opening. I have discussed with the chairman of Courtauld the measures which the company can take to help. In particular, I have expressed the view that the company should support the local enterprise trusts and the enterprise zone with senior personnel, in the way that the Thomson group did so successfully in Neath. We shall also be discussing with local authorities any further special measures that are needed.

Mr. Harvey: I entirely reject the Opposition's approach of throwing money at jobs, but is my right hon. Friend aware that there is concern on the Conservative Benches, too, about the level of unemployment in Wales? Will he consider making representations to Courtauld to see whether the decision on the Wrexham plant can be reconsidered?

Mr. Edwards: I have already discussed the matter with the chairman, and I cannot hold out any prospect that the company will change its decision. We have given substantial financial support to previous investment by the company. Again I must emphasise that we have only recently given substantial financial support to companies such as Sharp, Laura Ashley, Metal Box and F. W. Bender, all of which are setting up in the area and taking on people, and all of which will make a positive job contribution in the months and years ahead.

Mr. John Morris: Since the Government took office, has not the number of jobs created or projected for west Glamorgan been dwarfed by the job losses? Did not the Government, like Pontius Pilate, wash their hands of the proposed closure of BP Oil at Llandarcy? Will he now give an assurance that BP Chemicals at Baglan Bay is not in jeopardy? How far are those plans affected by the Government's change of philosophy about regional assistance for capital expenditure?

Mr. Edwards: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that the area benefits from the highest levels of support under the present regional policy. I am told by the company that the works at Baglan are not immediately affected by those measures.

Mr. Morris: Immediately?

Mr. Edwards: I cannot make forecasts about industrial changes that may take place many years ahead. We are talking about the immediate consequences of that decision. I questioned the company's senior management on that point. We have recently made substantial investment to assist the plant, which is doing good business at present. I have no reason to believe that the decision at Llandarcy will affect the position at Baglan at present.

Mr. Best: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the prospect for further jobs in Wales is inextricably linked with small businesses' prospects of prosperity? Is he further aware that those businesses want access to venture capital more than anything else? Will he report on the development of the welcome addition to that access of the Welsh Development Agency's institutional and venture capital unit?

Mr. Edwards: We must certainly encourage the development of new small businesses. We recently had a successful venture capital conference in Cardiff, which was attended not just by the Welsh Development Agency, which has launched its own fund, but by a number of other major venture capital organisations. I am glad to say that there is a great and rising level of interest by the growing venture capital market in what is going on in Wales.

Mr. Abse: The Secretary of State for Wales talks about incoming investment. Will he explain why the LSI Logic factory, which was due to come into my constituency, has been whipped away to Germany, with the loss of 1,000 jobs, because of his incompetence and failure to deal with the Treasury and obtain sufficient funds to allow the company to make a commercial judgment? How dare he tell us that he is looking after inward investment when, in the light of the blows now descending upon Wales, he lacks the confidence to stand up to the Germans and to obtain for us a factory which had almost reached the point of coming into Cwmbran?

Mr. Edwards: I shall give the company chairman's answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. The chairman wrote to me:

"Our conclusion, to site this first European plant elsewhere in Europe, was arrived at, after much debate, as the Welsh site and proposal were very attractive. The final decision was based on a combination of market, commercial and financial considerations. I wish to emphasise that for our company, this is only the first of several plants in Europe, and Wales will rank very high in our future plans when we are ready to decide on the next European location.

In particular, I appreciate your personal involvement and commitment to bringing high technology industry to Wales. You are clearly on the right path, and I anticipate a similar revival to what we have seen here in the State of Massachusetts in the past ten years."

Mr. Raffan: Following the devastating announcement of a further 595 redundancies at Courtaulds Greenfield in my constituency, in addition to the 202 announced last autumn, will my right hon. Friend do his utmost to impress upon Courtauld that it cannot just up and walk away from a community and a work force which it has described as first class and which has served it so well over 50 years? If the company will not reverse the decision, will my right hon. Friend impress upon it the need to phase in the redundancies to lessen the devastating impact on the local community? Will he consider the possibility of a joint venture with the company to generate local employment? Will he accelerate the urban aid programme to clear derelict land and accelerate SFA applications from companies thinking of coming into the area? Will he impress upon the WDA the distinctive needs of my constituency and urgently consider the designation of Delyn as an EC textile closure area?

Mr. Edwards: My hon. Friend has, I know, fought gallantly for the plant for a considerable period. We are dealing here with a capital reduction by Courtaulds which goes back to 1977 and has taken place stage by stage. I have already made representations of the kind for which my hon. Friend asked to Sir Christopher Hogg and have pressed on him the responsibility that the company owes to the area. I particularly hope, as I have already mentioned, that it will appoint senior personnel to assist in the development, and that the company will play its part in making land available in the enterprise zone. When we examine the urban programme, SFA applications and the other matters raised by my hon. Friend, the needs of the area will be very much in our minds.

Mr. Ray Powell: How can this industrial and commercial rapist of Wales come to this House and say that he is on the right lines when, at the weekend, he announced that 700 jobs are to go at Courtauld, and 830 jobs in Maesteg will be lost by the closure of St. John's colliery? He talks about the Laura Ashley company coming into the area, which will mean about 500 jobs in the pipeline in a few years, but on the same day he announces the closure of Borg Warner in Kenbig Hill. Yet he can come here with his usual incompetence and talk to us about new jobs coming into Wales. An investigation needs to be conducted into the closure of factories and units throughout Wales, and particularly at Maesteg in my constituency.

Mr. Edwards: The new overseas investments attracted to the hon. Gentleman's constituency in the Bridgend area in general last year include Invacare, Aerian, Align-Rite, Biomet—and the Chronar corporation, which I opened last week. Between them they promise about 1,200 jobs. Those people will owe nothing to the hon. Gentleman's assistance and encouragement. Indeed, he encouraged a coal strike that did great damage to employment prospects in Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones: Do not the losses of Clwyd textile jobs, west Glamorgan petrochemical jobs, Gwent microchip jobs and south Wales coal jobs—2,300 job losses in nine days, according to a BBC commentator—point to an urgently needed change in Cabinet economic policies?

With regard to Courtauld, why did the right hon. Gentleman not protest strongly at such sudden closures, with their distressing social consequences for Wrexham and Deeside? What is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to do to secure a change of mind by Courtauld, which seems to have acted without any regard for the generations of loyalty by the people of north-east Wales? We feel let down. Our workers, who have responded magnificently on both productivity and demanning, have been betrayed. We look to the right hon. Gentleman to fight to help the people of north-east Wales on the Courtauld redundancies. He should show more care for rising unemployment throughout Wales.

Mr. Edwards: I would have been rather more impressed by the hon. Gentleman if he had reminded the House that in 1977, at the time when he was a Minister in the Welsh Office, the Castle works at Flint closed with the loss of 1,500 jobs, and almost simultaneously Courtauld closed another plant at Dowlais, Merthyr, with the loss of 400 jobs. The hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that the decisions are taken by companies which have to deal in an internationally competitive world. They are not taken by Governments.

I protested to the chairman of Courtauld about the way in which the announcement was made. In fairness to him, I have to say that he had warned me over several years that the future of the Courtauld plant was at risk. Indeed, the hon. Member must have known that perfectly well if he was doing any sort of job as a Member of Parliament. About a year ago, the chairman of Courtauld, when lunching with me, told me that the future of the plant was hanging by a thread. None the less, Courtauld made a massive investment in the plant over the past two or three years. Unfortunately, that investment was not enough to save the plant in a fast changing world market.

Council House Sales

9. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in Wales since May 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A total of 41,166 council dwellings were sold to sitting tenants in Wales between May 1979 and 31 December 1984. In addition, 2,374 dwellings were sold by the Cwmbran development corporation and Mid-Wales development.

Mr. Knox: To what extent have local authorities benefited financially from those sales of council houses?

Mr. Roberts: Between March 1980 and December 1984 net receipts from sales amounted to about £177 million, which has enabled housing investment programme allocations to be increased and has given local authorities the scope to enhance their programmes from the portion of receipts that they are allowed to retain.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Minister not feel just a little annoyance at the Conservative party's obsession with the sale of council houses and its lack of concern about the construction of council houses to meet the great demand that we have in Wales?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman knows only too well that the sale of council houses does not affect the totality of the stock that is available. He also knows that those who are buying their council houses would otherwise have remained as sitting tenants. The success of our campaign to sell council houses clearly shows the desire of people in Wales to own their own homes.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Stipends

21. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, how many members of the clergy received stipends for the first time in 1984 and in each of the preceding 10 years.

The Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners (Sir William van Straubenzee): There were 404. Information is not available for all of the preceding 10 years, but for 1983 the figure was 423 and for 1982 it was 385.

Mr. Greenway: I thank my hon. Friend for those figures. Do they not represent a disturbing but slow decline in the number of clergy available in this country, and does that not have serious long-term implications for the life of the Church? Secondly, will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that divorced and separated wives of clergymen are living in penury because proper provision is not made for them?

Sir William van Straubenzee: Courtesy to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) means that I must not answer the second part of my hon. Friend's question. I am sure that we can make quick progress.

With regard to the first part of his question, my hon. Friend asked me in his original question to give the number of clergy receiving stipends for the first time. That is not necessarily the same thing, as he already knows. Of course, I would very much wish to see a sharp increase in the number of men offering themselves for ordination.

Mr. Cormack: Does my hon. Friend agree that vocations might be increased if certain right reverend prelates stuck to politics rather than straying into unsound doctrine?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am certain that it is very much better for a good shoemaker to stick to his last.

Listed Buildings

22. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if the Church Commissioners will initiate discussions with the Secretary of State for the Environment seeking the removal of the ecclesiastical exemption of listed buildings belonging to them.

Sir William van Straubenzee: In July 1984 the General Synod, by a large majority, expressed the view that the ecclesiastical exemption should be retained. The commissioners are of the same view. They have made it clear that they are ready to explore ways of improving the existing system.

Mr. Chapman: As a number of much respected environment groups have expressed reservations about the workings of the ecclesiastical exemption system, may I welcome my hon. Friend's reply and encourage the Church Commissioners to have talks with such groups, including the Victorian Society, as there seems to be at least a lack of information and perhaps quite a lot of misunderstanding about how it can be shown that the ecclesiastical exemption system has strengthened rather than weakened the protection of particular Church buildings?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. Through the Pastoral Measure of 1983 the House gave oversight of these matters to the Church Commissioners in the belief that pastoral as well as heritage considerations were involved. In support of what my hon. Friend has said, it is interesting to note that the National Heritage Monitor of 1983 points out that a listed Anglican church has a three times better chance of avoiding demolition than a secular listed building.

Widows

23. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what financial provisions are made by the Church Commissioners for the widows of clergy; and how much financial support was given in each of the past five years.

Sir William van Straubenzee: A widow receives half the pension entitlement of her husband. For full service, that amounts to £2,175 per annum. The commissioners' support for widows' pensions annually since 1980 was £3·6 million, £4·2 million, £5·2 million, £6 million and £6·7 million.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my hon. Friend for that very detailed reply. Does he agree that the work carried out by the wives while their husbands are in situ is a splendid example of dedication, and that provision for them in the unfortunate event of their being widowed should take account of those many years of unpaid work? Will the Church Commissioners seek to improve the amounts paid to widows?

Sir William van Straubenzee: It is the continuing intent of the Church Commissioners to make money available for improvements. The entitlements—I stress that they are entitlements—now turn upon two thirds of full service pension for a serving man. My hon. Friend will be aware that, in addition, widows are eligible for an augmentation grant if their total income, excluding state benefit, is less than £3,625 per year.

Church Land (Molesworth)

24. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the Church's land ownership at Molesworth, and the progress made in selling it to the highest bidder.

Sir William van Straubenzee: This is glebe land belonging to the Peterborough diocesan board of finance and the commissioners' consent would be necessary in the event of the diocese putting forward proposals for its sale.

Mr. Hamilton: Has not CND made a higher bid than the Ministry of Defence for this land? As the proceeds would go to the payment of clerical stipends, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is deplorable that the Church Commissioners seem to be in political alliance with the Ministry of Defence in a rather disreputable way?

Sir William van Straubenzee: Untypically, the hon. Gentleman seems not to have grasped the situation. At present, no decision is before the Church Commissioners. With respect, therefore, the hon. Gentleman is not entitled to make any judgment about the commissioners' view, because they have not yet had to form a view.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: If the Ministry of Defence bid did not succeed, would it not become a matter for compulsory purchase, and would that not be to the detriment of the clergy?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am afaid that I do not know the answer to that question. It would be for Ministers at the Ministry of Defence to say whether there would be a compulsory purchase order. Personally, I am not aware of any such suggestion at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mr. Frank Field.

Mr. Field: Is the hon. Gentleman aware——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was calling the hon. Gentleman to ask question No. 25.

Mr. Field: I wished to ask a supplementary on this question, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but I am calling the hon. Gentleman to ask question No. 25.

Clergy Marriages

25. Mr. Frank Field asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, whether the Church Commissioners were invited to submit evidence to the working party on the break-up of clergy marriages.

Mr. William van Straubenzee: No, Sir, but representatives of the commissioners have attended all meetings of the working party and have offered information and advice as and when required.

Mr. Field: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when the report is published on what the Church should do about the broken marriages of clergy, the commissioners will have to provide funds rather than mere advice? Will those funds be forthcoming?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I think that we must wait and see what the working party recommends to the House of Bishops and what action the House of Bishops decides to take. I remind the hon. Gentleman, however, that the commissioners are statutorily bound by this House in terms of the objectives for which their funds may be used.

WALES

Wages Councils

10. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the effects of the abolition of wages councils on employment prospects in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There is substantial evidence to support the view that a freer wage market would result in more jobs, especially for young people. There is no reason to suppose that these findings do not apply in Wales. Any evidence submitted contradicting this view will be taken into account in our consideration of the responses to the consultative paper.

Mr. Thomas: Clearly, the Secretary of State's Department is innumerate in this area, as in many others, though not that of education. Does he accept that no more than 450 jobs will be created, that they will be low-paid jobs, and that the whole intention of the scheme to abolish the wages councils is to create sweated labour among young people in Wales and elsewhere?

Mr. Edwards: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's figures. I do not know whether they have the smallest validity. The hon. Gentleman will be able to include those figures in the representations that he may make on our consultative paper, and they will be given due weight.

Sir Raymond Gower: Have wages councils been successful in maintaining high wages?

Mr. Edwards: No, they have not. In addition, they have prevented the creation of many jobs which might otherwise have been brought into existence.

THE ARTS

Musical Education

26. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what information he has as to assistance currently available to enable children to continue learning to play musical instruments after they leave school.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): The Arts offer a wide range of amateur and professional opportunities to enable children to continue learning to play musical instruments. Local education authorities provide courses at sixth-form colleges; and support is provided through the mandatory grant system for those taking degree-level courses at universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I know from previous exchanges that the Minister is sympathetic towards my point. Is he aware that many good local authorities, including Leeds, assist young people at school by providing instruments, but that there is no provision after the young people leave school? The problem is shuffled back and forth between the Department of the Environment and the Department of Education and Science, on the ground that it is a leisure facility and an aspect of continuing education. Will the Minister take some responsibility for drawing the matter together and helping young people who wish to continue to learn to play an instrument after they leave school?

Mr. Waldegrave: As the hon. Gentleman recognises, this is a matter for either the Department of the Environment or the Department of Education and Science. The role of the Office of Arts and Libraries can only be that of a co-ordinator. However, I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's suggestion to the attention of my noble Friend.

Billericay Arts Society

27. Mr. Proctor asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts what Arts Council funds are available to Billericay arts society in the financial year 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Arts Council funds only activities of a professional nature; but the Regional Arts Association will consider sympathetically any request for project funding.

Mr. Proctor: Will my hon. Friend encourage, help and advise the arts society in its attempt to transform a historic building, 108 High Street, Billericay, into a modern and thriving arts centre and in particular to gain private sector sponsorship for this worthwhile venture?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall be happy to give every encouragement that I can. The scheme is admirable. The expertise required probably rests mainly with the Regional Arts Association or with the Arts Council; but if there is anything that the Office of Arts and Libraries can do to help, it will be delighted to do so.

Mr. Cormack: So that the honest burghers of Billericay and other places north and south of Watford may enjoy performances of a high professional calibre, will my hon. Friend discuss with our noble Friend the somewhat shortsighted attitude of the Arts Council, and indeed the Government, towards the National Theatre's touring activities?

Mr. Waldegrave: Wide though my brief is on the affairs of Billericay, it did not take fully into account their relationship to the National Theatre. I have repeatedly defended the Arts Council's general strategy. The citizens of Billericay have benefited from this strategy, because the Regional Arts Association has had a 29 per cent. increase in its funding this year. Devolution to the provinces really means something.

Concerts (Pensioners and Children)

29. Mr. Greenway asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State answering in respect of the Arts if the Minister for the Arts will make money available for concerts of artistic worth for pensioners and children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is for the Arts Council and not for my noble Friend to allocate funds to arts bodies. Funded orchestras and other arts bodies normally put on concerts that are open to all who wish to attend; but most venues offer seats at concessionary prices for children, students and pensioners.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not sad that some concerts for children and pensioners have been cut out as a result of reduced spending? Does my hon. Friend agree that those two categories should have priority? Will he consider the possibility of direct funding for concerts for pensioners and children?

Mr. Waldegrave: Experiments in encouraging the access of specific groups have nearly always proved less effective than the ordinary system of concessionary tickets. Most concert halls and theatres have such schemes.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Will the Minister be making representations about the proposed takeover of the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra by Bristol?

Mr. Waldegrave: The right hon. Gentleman might feel that I have some interest in this matter. The Bounemouth Symphony Orchestra has always been partly funded by Bristol and I know of no firm proposals to change that. I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman about the latest situation if he would like me to do so.

Sir David Price: Is not the point that, uniquely, the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra tours the whole of its region and goes in for community music? Is that not the answer to the question of my hon. Friend the Minister for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway)? We think in terms not of pensioners or school children but of the community as a whole. The more our big orchestras get out into smaller communities, the better for the purpose behind my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Waldegrave: I agree with my hon. Friend. When the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra comes to Bristol, there are normally concessions for the types of groups to which my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) referred.

Mr. Faulds: Will the Minister try to get home to his noble Friend the enormous value of concerts for pensioners and children, in a recreational sense for pensioners and in an educative sense for children? Will he add to his representations the value of taking concerts and other artistic manifestations out to factories and such areas, as was done by one of our late lamented Glasgow friends with great success?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am happy to agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have been to one of the children's concerts which are occasionally held at the Colston Hall, Bristol. They are marvellous occasions. There is nothing in the present arrangements which makes it impossible to have such occasions.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Why are concerts and events for the ethnic community funded, when concerts for children and pensioners, certainly in Leicester, seem not to be?

Mr. Waldegrave: A local authority might choose that as the best local priority. Some interesting West Indian artistic things are funded in my constituency, and many of them are funded under the aegis of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Buchan: Does the Minister agree that the most interesting artistic development in the House for a long time is the fact that every Tory Back Bencher is now beginning to feel the squeeze arising from the Government's policy? Does he further agree that pensioners and children are not alone in suffering under the present Government in regard to concerts, as the entire musical and threatrical world has suffered? As for taking the arts to factories, why are trade unions being excluded from the pound for pound scheme in sponsorship?

Mr. Waldegrave: I was not aware of any properly organised project being excluded. If any is, I shall look into the matter and write to the hon. Gentleman. I do not think that, as the project is funded, anyone is excluded because of who he is. The hon. Gentleman misinterprets the questions that I have been asked by my hon. Friends. I detected no fear or trepidation, but the normal Conservative party and Government interest in these matters and a proper relationship between the spokesman and the Back Benches.

Mr. Cormack: Can my hon. Friend encourage two birds with one move by discussing with his noble Friend the possiblity of a special grant for the National Youth Orchestra to give a tour of concerts for pensioners?

Mr. Waldegrave: That would kill or, rather, entertain two birds with one pipe. I shall report my hon. Friend's suggestion to my noble Friend, who will undoubtedly say that such funding is a matter for the Arts Council.

WALES

Home Improvement

11. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the number of outstanding home improvement grant applications made under the provision allowing payment of 90 per cent. of the cost of the work.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: During the two-year period when 90 per cent. rates were generally available for repair and intermediate grants, 141,000 applications for grants of all types were submitted. Local authority returns indicate that 50,000 of these are still outstanding.

Mr. Rowlands: While most authorities are able to do something about statutory intermediate grants, are not thousands of elderly people—some of them in their 80s—who are awaiting basic repair grants receiving letters stating that they will have to wait two or three years? Will the hon. Gentleman think about a special additional fund to unlock repair grants for old people's properties before it is too late, or does he want to go down in history as the Minister who gave guarantees relating to grants but that people died before they received them?

Mr. Roberts: The rate at which this backlog will be cleared depends to a significant extent on the action of individual local authorities. Considerable sums of money are being spent on grants—£80 million last year and £107 million the year before—and there is scope for substantial expenditure within this year's gross capital figure of £147 million. Over the last three years we have spent £230 million on private sector renovation—four times as much as the total spent during the whole period of the last Labour Administration.

Mr. Foot: In view of the huge backlog which has now built up in the home improvement queue, will the hon. Gentleman review the matter afresh? This is an immediate way in which some assistance could be given to deal with desolating conditions in the Rhymney Valley. Other valleys are similarly affected. At the same time as considering the possibility of a much larger house improvement scheme, will the hon. Gentleman also consider restoring the full housing programme to its 1979 level, which would mean many more houses and people in jobs?

Mr. Roberts: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that during the Labour Government's period of office the average spend was £29 million per annum over their five-year period, compared with our £72 million per annum over the last five years. However, I take the right hon. Gentleman's point. We are reviewing improvement grants and will be publishing our proposals shortly.

Mr. Harry Greenway: On a point of order Mr. Deputy Speaker. I rise respectfully and deferentially. You called each of the questions set down for the hon. Member answering for the Church Commissioners. However those questions began a minute late and finished a minute early, even though some hon. Members still wished to ask supplementary questions on that important subject. Will you take account of the fact that questions to the hon. Member answering for the Church Commissioners are now held once every six weeks instead of once every three weeks? Will you also consider the possibility of allowing those questions to run full time on another occasion, because the spiritual health of the nation is important? I am not sure——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point. The frequency of questions to the hon. Member answering for the Church Commissioners is a matter not for the Chair but for the usual channels. No doubt the hon. Gentleman's remarks will be conveyed to the Leader of the House. The hon. Gentleman must recognise that every hon. Member who tabled a question to the hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) had his question answered. There were many other questions on the Order Paper awaiting oral answer, and hon. Members were waiting patiently for their turn. I must have equal regard to their interests and rights.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: On that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the same point of order? I thought that I had dealt with it.

Mr. Bruinvels: While in no way seeking to challenge the ruling that you have just given, I merely wish to point out that in our country a terrifying number of clergymen are now getting divorced——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not ask me the question that he would like to have asked the hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee).

Mr. Frank Field: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A large number of hon. Members wished to ask supplementary questions to Question No. 25, and I wished to ask a supplementary question to Question No. 24. I do not wish to challenge your ruling, but is there not all the difference in the world between getting an answer and supplementary questions being asked by other hon. Members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point but he had one question answered, and for him to want two questions to be answered consecutively when other hon. Members have waited throughout the whole of Welsh Question Time without having a chance to have their questions answered is not reasonable.

I remind both the hon. Gentleman and the House that it is a matter for the discretion of the occupant of the Chair who is called to ask supplementary questions. I hope that hon. Members will not challenge my discretion. I am trying to do the job as fairly as I can to make sure that the time is shared out fairly. We should now turn to the main business of the day.

Opposition Day

[10TH ALLOTTED DAY]

The Welfare State

3.35 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House calls upon the Government to withdraw its plans to abolish the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme and its proposals to cut back other key benefits as part of its callous dismantling of the welfare state designed to provide even bigger tax handouts for the rich.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have to tell the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Meacher: The motion sets out the demand that we place before the House on behalf of 10 million pensioners, 3·5 million unemployed, 3 million disabled persons and millions of others who may suffer sickness, bereavement or other misfortune.

The welfare state, while it needs genuine reform and improvement, remains for the British people the ideal of dignity and security against want in the face of economic and other adversity over which the individual has no control. It is against the destruction of that ideal, the intensification of the means-test state without dignity and the dismantled security that we raise our voice today.

In reply to our motion the Government's amendment is astonishing, not only in its unbounded smugness but in being demonstrably inaccurate and false from start to finish. It begins by noting "the Government's commitment to improving the . . . Health care systems in this country as shown by increased spending on the National Health Service".

I have news for the Government. Spending is going down, and that is official. Sir Kenneth Stowe, the permanent Secretary at the DHSS, confirmed last week to the Select Committee that current expenditure on the NHS in the last year fell.

The Government's amendment continues its self-congratulation by noting

"increased benefit levels for pensioners and others".

The truth is that by ending the earnings link in the uprating of pensions the Government have lowered the pension for a married couple by £5 a week, every week, below what it would have been if Labour's formula had been continued.

The Government's amendment then refers to their

"reducing the burden of taxation and National Insurance contributions".

That is a rum one. In fact, under this Government, the rate of national insurance contribution has increased by 50 per cent. and the burden of taxation has increased by the equivalent of about 9p in the pound on average for the whole population, except those earning over £20,000 a year.

The Government's amendment, obviously unable to find anything to say about the Government's social security and health policies that is both positive and truthful, falls back on the Goebbels lie by referring to "the Opposition's plans to end mortgage tax relief".

As I made unequivocally clear at the time, and since, the paper that I presented last week was a discussion document and not a Labour party policy document. It is only malicious and fabricated press reporting that has implied otherwise. For the Prime Minister to reiterate such scurrilous misrepresentation is despicable, and it demeans her office.

It ill becomes the Tory Government to raise hackles about mortgage tax relief when, in the so-called Fowler reviews, they are about to abolish not only housing benefit for almost everyone in employment but all supplementary benefit mortgage payments for the poorest families struggling to buy a home. There could be no better proof that the Tory party was founded by the rich, of the rich and for the rich.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that many low wage earners in my constituency are buying their houses with mortgages? What can possibly be scurrilous about the Prime Minister drawing attention to the hon. Gentleman's outrageous suggestions even though he did not particularly want them published?

Mr. Meacher: I made it absolutely clear that we would continue with a system of housing aid, both for those in rented accommodation and for owner-occupiers struggling to buy a house. The only difference between our two parties is that the Labour party would aim to improve the level of housing aid for the poorest families, while the Tory party is apparently determined to abolish supplementary benefit mortgage aid.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The House would not want the hon. Gentleman to be misrepresented. He has a wonderful opportunity to set the record entirely right. Can he tell the House that in no circumstances whatever would a Labour Government tamper with mortgage interest relief, particularly for those on above average incomes?

Mr. Meacher: That is a remarkable statement. The hon. Gentleman has some gall in raising that point when we know that because of the recent, 4 per cent. rise in interest rates monthly payments for those with a £30,000 mortgage increased by £57·60 a month. If the hon. Gentleman wants to assist owner-occupiers, he should have a word with the Government Front Bench and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have made it absolutely clear that we would continue the system of housing aid both for those in rented accommodation and for owner-occupiers.

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has entirely answered the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow). What precisely was the status of the considered report which the hon. Gentleman put forward? What is the hon. Gentleman's personal position? Does he actually support the proposals that he put forward a week ago?

Mr. Meacher: The status of the document has been made absolutely clear, as the right hon. Gentleman would know if he had listened to what I have said, as opposed to listening to what has been said by certain members of the press, who have been determined to misrepresent my statement because of their hostility to the Labour party. That is scarcely new. I have made it absolutely clear that it was a Green Paper, a discussion document, for serious discussion of a serious issue. I put the document in that vein, and I hope that it will be treated in that vein.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does my hon. Friend realise that there is considerable support from the Labour party for the ideas that he outlines in that discussion document?

Mr. Meacher: I believe that that is so. I believe that, when people know the purpose of that document, which is to take 8 million people who have been reduced to means tested poverty out of that degrading system, and realise all its implications—anyone is free to see that document, and I hope that it will be treated seriously—they will take a different view. I believe that electorally it has substantial vote winning potential.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) rose——

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North) rose——

Mr. Fowler rose——

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way, except to the right hon. Gentleman..

Mr. Fowler: Does that mean that the hon. Gentleman stands by the proposals that he made a week ago? From what he has just said, he does.

Mr. Meacher: The Secretary of State should listen to my words. I should like to know whether he intends to abolish supplementary benefit mortgage payments for the poorest families struggling to buy houses and who are on supplementary benefit. That is a rather important question for millions of people who may otherwise lose their homes.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way, as I would rather get on.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has said that he will not give way. I hope that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) heard that.

Mr. Meacher: The Government have sought to justify this attack on the welfare state on the ground that the social security budget is growing out of control. It is growing, but not because of higher benefits—quite the reverse—but because the Government's other policies are forcing huge numbers of people into dependency. There are now more than 8 million people in supplementary benefit poverty in Britain, which is double the number in 1979. Nearly half of the increase in costs comes from the trebling of unemployment. Huge cuts in housing investment have greatly increased homelessness.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall not give way at the moment. Homelessness has swelled the budget for board and lodging payments. Supplementary benefit board and lodging payments have also been used improperly, and on a substantial scale, to finance an explosion of private sector homes for the elderly. The administration of all these and other claims has added a further £250 million to the budget.

The real answer to the growing social security budget is not to cut benefits. Indeed, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) could not even live for a week on supplementary benefit, and that is before it is cut even further. The real answer is to change the Government's policies which cause the poverty in the first place and which are multiplying the number in poverty every year. Nor need there be a lack of funding for the welfare state if the Government were so minded. Public expenditure constraints did not prevent the Government from finding another £2·5 billion with which to fight the miners, from finding £3 billion for the Falklands, or from finding another £12 billion over this decade for the defence budget, for Trident. It is all a matter of priorities——

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: For this Government, perhaps more than any other Tory Government, the welfare state and the abolition of poverty always come near the bottom of their list of priorities. Nor, contrary to the Government's constant propaganda, is Britain even a high social spender. Indeed, according to a parliamentary answer on 19 November 1984, it is, with the exception of Greece, by far the lowest social spender on health care and social security in the whole of the EC. Moreover, a recent OECD report also shows that the growth rate in welfare spending overall in this country has been one of the lowest of all the 24 countries that make up the OECD.

The real motivation behind the Fowler reviews is the obsession with redistribution from poor to rich, which is the indelible hallmark of the Tory hard Right gathered round the Prime Minister. Two months ago I asked the Library to calculate the total value of the social security cuts since 1979. I have its letter with me. It estimated the value at £8,200 million. In addition, by taxing unemployment benefit for the first time, the Government have clawed back another £2,700 million from the unemployed since 1982. Therefore, since 1979, social security has been cut altogether by no less than a staggering £10,900 million—enough to provide every pensioner with an extra £22 a week every week this year and to provide every unemployed family with an extra £62 a week every week this year.

The money did not go to the pensioners or the unemployed. It went to the rich. In every Tory Budget since 1979 the higher rate tax band has been raised disproportionately, capital gains tax and capital transfer tax have been eased and the investment income surcharge, a tax exclusively on those with Stock Exchange holdings in excess of £100,000, has been reduced and has now been abolished.

Using the Chancellor's Budget statement Red Books —any hon. Member can do the same exercise as I have done—it is clear that the cumulative value of the tax handouts, almost exclusively concentrated on the richest 5 per cent. of the population, can be calculated at £12·9 billion. The closeness of that figure to the total of social security cuts is no accident. Pensioners, the unemployed, the sick, widows and the disabled, all the have-nots, have been squeezed to provide further enrichment, on a truly massive scale, for the haves, who were already rich. It is a despicable philosophy, of which the Conservative party should be ashamed.

Mr. Kennedy: There will be much sympathy among the poorest groups in society for the hon. Gentleman's attack on the Government in that respect. Will he clarify a point on the question of finance, as he is arguing that money is available to alleviate poverty? Why was the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer unable to come out with a costed, agreed programme on behalf of the Labour party at the time of the Budget, and why did the hon. Gentleman not provide a costed programme when he launched his semi-official document last week? How much would his programme cost?

Mr. Meacher: My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) produced a far more detailed alternative Budget than is traditional. It was provided in very considerable detail indeed, and the hon. Gentleman might care to study it. I wonder whether he has even read it. As for my statement, I presented as a consultative document a 50-page paper, and detailed costings will certainly be presented. If the hon. Gentleman wants independent costings, he can find them this week in The Economist. The costings are not entirely accurate, but they are approximately right—a subject to which I shall return.

The Prime Minister, far from being ashamed, is no more capable of shame than she is of compassion. That is why this anti-welfare state drive of robbing the poor to pay the rich is now being brought to a climax. The Treasury wants £3 billion to £4 billion of tax cuts out of these reviews, and it will get them. The Secretary of State has been about as effective in defending the welfare state as General Custer was in his last stand. The Chancellor wants £4 billion to dole out as tax reliefs in the run-up to the next election. That is the whole purpose of the Fowler reviews, and the Secretary of State has been a pushover in letting the Chancellor have exactly what he wants.

The reviews were fixed from the word go. Three of the four major reviews were chaired by Government Ministers. So much for independence. The fourth was led by the chairman of the London Brick Company — presumably chosen because of his intimate knowledge of housing benefit. Of the so-called two independent members of the review into children and young persons benefits, Mr. Parry Rogers, of the Institute of Directors, was forced to declare an interest when the institute gave evidence recommending the abolition of child benefit. The other, Mrs. Barbara Shenfield, just happened to have contributed to an Adam Smith Institute pamphlet opposing the welfare state. The Institute of Directors features again in providing one of the two so-called independants on the supplementary benefit review — presumably chosen because of his vast experience of poverty.

So much for independent reviews. They were packed with Tory members. The nil extra cost constraint imposed by the Treasury enforced a pure cost cutting exercise and the short time scale precluded serious analysis.
